"Why there has been much interest in the effects of the disasters and the floods, and conflagrations upon our own and the foreign insurance companies operating in many of our big cities and towns. All of the foreign Companies have strong disaster clauses of all sorts in their policies, and the most queer part is all insurance agencies were wiped out many were slain among the members, and no one can do a thing. The disaster has hit us altogether too bad. In spite of this fact the English and German Companies have been reported also wiped out, so that the loss sure is immense. The principal Abbeinnian St. Stock and Insurance Companies were in Angelina Agathia, with the same names, and they alone survived and the companies have to be held. The Austrian companies, which had closer relations with us, operated generally in that city, and the buildings are in ruins and everything wiped out by fire. Even with the insurance companies that may be surviving the most serious effects are feared among the life and death companies, as the deaths and missing are so far never found out, and only two hundred thousand bodies have only been said to be recovered and this means many heavy claims. While most of the were poor people, countless numbers of wealthy merchants in all the cities are believed to have died under the ruins or in flood and fire, and it is believed countless numbers of tourists lost their lives most of whom would carry heavy insurance."

"It is strange," said Gertrude "how the ruin could have reached so far across the street as to meet in the middle from the buildings of both sides."

"It does seem strange and cannot be explained," said Radcliffe.

"Doesn't it seem as if the debris had been flung by the concussion more than thrown down?" said Joy.

"It does. And it is an unusual custom of many nations to erect their houses, even in the smallest villages crowded and huddled together as if space were so valuable that light and air must be therefore sacrificed to it. I've been in some of these foreign cities when I was small and observed that so called streets are nothing but narrow strait lanes giving passage to single wagons, and without provision for persons to pass up and down. This is not seen in our cities."

"I should say not. Our narrowest alleys average less than seventy feet, the buildings including private dwellings are sometimes having even space between them. I'll bet had these concussions happened at night, a devoted day declared. Gertrude "There would not have been such loss of life, and the people would have been able to escape into the wide streets. Squares and open spaces are rare in foreign cities. Not so here. We have many, and large ones too, such a construction in an earthquake country like foreigners have is a death trap. To their way of forming structures, more than to the violence of the earth's vibration is due the proportion of the death lists."

"Our Lake Sololia region thought she suffered a disaster of the first magnitude," declared Joan.

"Well it was child's play compared with this extensive cataclysm," said Gladys.

"It's a positive proof there was no real earth convulsion," said Radcliffe.

"How do you believe that?"

"Because for places nearest the explosions, the damage was the less, and about a hundred and further away yet the damage was terrific. That goes to show there were explosions doing it all."

"I don't doubt that," said Gertrude. "An Angelina Agathia is two hundred miles south of Abbeinn, and was shaken as a reed, until she dropped bleeding and lifeless into her own dust. Cities that distance north of Abbeinn suffered the same. As we have seen in Abbeinn that survived the flood only the highest buildings, and those mostly of wood came down. The force of the nearest explosion and not the vibration damaged her."

"How did the concussions seem to be?" asked Angelina.

"Why some say that for every time there was the sound of the booming in the far distance there was an incredibly violent and swift yanking from side to side."

"Was there not any rapid upheavals, and depressions?" demanded Joy.

"No," said Gertrude herself. "When I was in Abbeinn what astonished me more, there was nothing felt on the ground as any convulsion, and yet the cars we rode jumped up and down as if they were mad dogs. There was no up and down motion of the ground, and when we escaped, and were on the ground with our own feet and buildings continued to tumble down we felt no sensation whatever, and yet were flung from one side to the other. The rails of the tracks were not affected in the least."

"That verifies it was caused by explosions."

"One of the most unusual things about the Angelina Agathia part of the disaster," said Radcliffe, "was the length of time many persons lived entombed in the ruins."

"I have heard of that," admitted Gertrude "and had the proposition to burn the place or cover it with quicklime for the destruction of the decomposing bodies been carried out, an enormous number of persons would have been destroyed who were finally rescued long after all thought of any one surviving surviving under the debris had been abandoned."

"Yes, and more than once the search had been given up as hopeless only to be renewed again when chance led to another rescue," said Joy. "I saw one rescue in La Polama where a man was having soldiers digging for his wife and children. They had selected what seemed to be a safe and most favorable spot and there began digging as if mad. They toiled on for a long time the husband frequently stopping to shout into the ruins. After about five hours of it he said to the soldiers that he had heard a very faint reply. Therefore they delved frantically into the vast heap, and shortly before evening found the wife and two children who just lived and they dragged them out. I saw them summon help, and the stretcher bearers came. They gave the poor wife and children brandy and milk and they revived a little. The joy of her husband can only be imagined as he strode back beside her as the sailors carried the two little girls and finally gave them in charge of the Red Cross Nurse in charge of a hospital ship, van on the thirty first of the month of July strange as it was an aged woman was lived from a living bomb, he was found to be still breathing but unconscious and how she managed to live that long under the debris was a mystery, and many more of those found still later were many children, who survived the horrors of the disaster better than their elders despite the flood, these we found in the midst of ruins too high to have been reached by the flood waves. A five year old child a girl was found alive and well five weeks after the calamity. Three girls and two boys and a man with them lay for thirty seven days under a pile of ruins of a deserted prison home. They had a supply of food somehow from the home's storeroom in which they were buried which helped them to fight off starvation, and then they had finally dug themselves so far out that their cries were heard by some passing rescuers."

"What will be the fate of our destroyed cities and towns?" asked Angeline Pichee.

"That is a question question that is exciting much attention," said Gertrude. "I believe it has been wondered whether all should be left a ruin after the floods finally go and the region deserted until the war is over, or should they chance all dangers and rebuild the ruins."

"When the material can be secured the places might be rebuilt in spite of all things," said Radcliffe.

"You are positively right," admitted Gertrude. "We cannot blot out twenty centuries of these historic and righteous towns. The towns I'll bet anything will be rebuilt in spite of the war and the horror of the disaster as soon as possible, to show the foe she is defied to the last."

"It surely would be impossible to leave deserted the spot where so many beautiful cities and towns flourished, even if an unestimated number of the inhabitants had perished. The survivors will surely refuse to abandon their native cities and towns forever. It would be too much of a sacrifice for them, and they'd be all homeless."

"And grant loans without interests spread over a great number of years will surely be made to all landowners. I should consider all cities as still existing even if only three houses remained," said Gladys.

"And I am full of hope to see Abbeinn rebuilt within two years in accordance with modern ideas, and following the example of other countries who did the same abruptly after a disaster. There will rise I am sure another Abbeinn, with at least fifty thousand inhabitants to begin with. And with many years to come I'll bet it'll be the same as ever and even though its sad days would never be forgotten."

"I have heard that the final decision seemed to be," said Angeline Pichee.

"That the ruin covered site still existing should or would be abandoned, and a new town grow up on a new and unnumbered site, several miles distant from the old, thus escaping the great cost and toil of removing the vast heap of ruins."

"That won't be," said Gertrude. "The fifty thousand survivors will refuse to leave the site of their homes on any conditions, as it'll appear as if they're running away from Our Lord's foe, and I'll bet as soon as materials can be brought there, light and water will be restored, the water still other the other sites will be forcibly drained out, and the shipping of war materials will be resumed. I look to that coming sometime next year. She was right."

She was right..

Reflected 2 counts
FAMOUS EFFECTS OF THE DISASTER FROM ITS LONG PROGRESS AND ITS RESULTS, PREPARATIONS FOR ACTION NEAR ST. ETIENNE ON ARRIVAL OF THE FOIL.

"It seems to be," said Gertrude when they were returning within the christian lines again "that because of so many battles, so many big explosions and so forth, the earth is never still. Quivers and slight tremors have been caused by the tremendous cannon duels in our awfullest battles, I suppose however not perceptible to us and discernible only in the delicately adjusted seismic instruments and these no doubt are of very frequent occurrence but they have never been strong enough to produce any concussion of disastrous consequences. And yet that that is many scientists call this disaster "eruptions and earthquakes."

"It does seem strange," said Radcliffe. "It is surely only in certain limited regions, usually of volcanic character that any earthquakes occur at all, and in some such regions the occurrence of a quake of this kind is sufficiently frequent enough to keep the inhabitants in a state of most nervous uncertainty as to the security of their lives and homes. One such locality, dismally famous for its many disasters of this sort is that they say surrounding Mt. Etna, Vesuvius, and St. Helens, while various others exist in the more remote volcanic regions of the globe. Of course we have some pretty dreaded Volcanoes in Galvernia, Mt. Galvernia is one, Mt. Andean which is always active is another, and out still more active ones Mt. John, Helen, Crowley, Catherine, Vivian and others, but earthquakes have been very rare near them and never have been of any severe nature. And they or not any one of them is responsible for this disaster, and Galvernia which is the nearest is about three hundred miles away from Abbeinn."

"Our countries disasters in this unusual war is unusually numerous," said Angeline Pichee. "And these are largely those which have occurred in the earliest area of the war, those of older date I believe because of so much communication being cut off being far from fully recorded. Emperor Hanson's catalogue covers a list of between seven and eight thousand instances, ranging from April 1912 to April 1913... Several of these are of the Abbeinn character and which Hanson believes are worse than those of Bible history, and all of these disasters including that of Abbeinn according to his idea is a problematical issue as to what was their actual character and whether they could really be blamed on the enemy or not. The first greatest of these we are all well acquainted of, and that is the disastrous explosion at Jennie Vivian city, ascribed to the time of the battles of Sumbum Creek or Evanrollini Canion. early in November... A second case was the disastrous convulsion of the battle at Delight's Junction, when our divisions of armies under Mindermine, Richard Greatheart, and general Vivian were almost destroyed and a third suggests an explanation of the destruction of certain enormous Dams, and levees and so forth."

"Did the Scientists say that the disaster at Lake Belicia was caused by an earthquake, as they did at Abbeinn?" asked June.

"They positively proved it was caused by mine explosions under the levee of the inland sea. At Abbeinn," continued Radcliffe, "as I was there during the investigations, the scientists rather disputed the real cause of the disaster. One claimed it was the most remarkable kind of an earthquake on record, and that the horrors of the destruction of Sodome and Gomorrah as described in the Pentateuch could not compare."

"What did the other say?"

"According to another one it was accompanied by a violent volcanic eruption around Abbeinn. At first some said the eruptions upheaved a district several hundred leagues, and caused a subsidence of a large tract of land not less extensive, and that the whole water system of rivers and the levee of the sea being altered by the destructive disaster. However extensive investigations proved that no such thing happened, and that out side of five hundred miles of country being split up by the force of the supposed eruptions there were nothing but eighteen huge craters in the ground, some filled to the brim with water, and many others entirely empty."

"It was too bad it occurred whatever it was," said Gertrude. "The south country of Abbeinn County, before the date of the terrible disaster, was as a paradise, heavily forested and dotted with cities, including Violet, Paul, Violet Lancelin, and many others where our armies recently in the first part of the war fought and lost decisive battles. Whatever was the cause of this disaster that hurled so many of our cities to ruins and spread desolation to such an extending land Violet, and her sisters though determined to find out yet have had not further time to do so. It's too bad they had to go when we thought they could go ahead. And we cannot try anything without them around. I must confess without their presence we are a little afraid." "AAABDF"

"One peculiar scientist recorded his this disaster of explosions to occur at midnight," said Gertrude, continuing on with a smile, "and we who witnessed it at midnight. That Scientist must have slept in a sock."

"One of them tried to give our Government to understand," said Radcliffe, "that the ground opened into a yawning chasm from which the eruptions occurred."

"But we ourselves, and Violet and her sisters have not witnessed any real or effects of any storm of red hot cinders and stones having fallen, or any volcanic ash or lava flows," said Gladys, "That Scientist must have had Volcan on the mind."

"Maybe Mt. Calverine blew up and let down a big storm of fire upon all of the land which turned into water and dust and mud, and gold," suggested Joy.

"Her blow up was an unusual one for she still stands there," laughed Gertrude.

The verdicts of some of these scientists puts me in mind of a man we have heard of called Roscovitz," said Angeline Nichee. "He writes that a great volcanic horror destroyed sodome and other cities of the plain. I do believe there had been terrible convulsions of the earth all right, there is and has been proofs of that, but as to volcanic activity there is none. All I have seen the Bible Record is that; "The Lord Rained Upon Sodome and other cities fire and brimstone from heaven, and overthrew those cities and all the plains and all the inhabitants of the cities, and burned them for their unrepentant sins, and that which grew upon the ground. But Roscovitz cannot really prove that Volcanic eruptions occurred, nor that the Dead Sea ever came into existence from such a convulsion when it may be a probability that that sea was at the same time of the creation. He says writers may have been wrong in the causes being purely supernatural. That is saying the Bible lies. Well, these scientists here seem to be about as out of their wits as Roscovitz is. They say that Abbleann and other cities were thrown down by the concussion of volcanic eruptions from the level ground and there is no such evidence, not even a handful of lava dust to give any evidence. All the debris thrown by the "craters" in the "Bible" as they call it, is clay, sand and mud and limestone and granite, each substance which is under rock layers of plains. This is such a description of the catastrophe as might be expected from scientists who are unfamiliar with such dread consequences and are therefore apt to attribute the great events to natural causes, and not by any other. The evidences discovered discovered clearly indicates the nature of the cataclysm, even if one can yet find proofs against the enemy. Some even write that lots of cities were covered with volcanic ash and silt and which made her turn into a pillar of salt. I believe some people in the world who claim to be scientists and so forth, are crazier than those in asylums. Violet and her sisters are bound to discover the cause and humble those foolish now it all scientists, who are foreigners and have no right here at all. Our own scientists are afraid to go and investigate."

"Our own knowledge of this great Abbleann disaster however is not confined to any historical account yet so far," said Gladys.

"Maybe it is and maybe it is not," said Gertrude. "But I myself have made up a record of this great catastrophe. I was told by some scientists that the great Lake Mic-Hollester bursts its levees after the great concussion which formed the great flood after the terrible terrific concussions and explosions and that many cities were swallowed in the floods, but I have been by the Mic-Hollester Sea as I'll call it, and there is no evidence of any inroad from its waters and no levee to have burst. The real origin of the flood is now found, but no one is allowed to tell of it until it is found whether the enemy did this, or it was a movement of nature as the scientists say. In the eyes of all our most religious people and some of our own Abbleannian Scientists, and those familiar with such occurrences it is regarded that this event is a visitation, not either from Nature or from the Heavenly Powers to try the faith of the country and its people, but there is something suspicious in it that makes these scientists look sort of strange at Glandelinia. Strange it is that our country of Calverinia suffers for what Glandelinia should receive for all her super crime and wickedness, but all we too know of it from other sources indicate that it was the result of some secret hidden means that I'm sure Glandelinians did which we cannot find real evidences of."

"Of the valleys watered once by the Lebanon Stream," said Radcliffe, "that of Bonbon was the best and best densely forested and most populous. On the day of this great disaster as they say there is reason to believe that all the northern part of this valley with its woods, its fields, its towns and cities, its broad river was swept clean by a part of the flood. On the southern plain the land seems to have turned into a stationary sea at which this part of the flood seemed to be have been arrested and damed. Of course all investigators have found the aspect of the country strangely altered. The Valley of Bonbon has vanished, a vast sheet of water covering its former location, into this the stream flowed, and beyond the great body of water this stream still remains. As the country appeared then so it appears now. We could see there the vast body of water and were it not a remembrance of the terrible calamity we could call it a beautiful lake. This disaster has made this country the most desolate upon the face of the earth."

"Who is the evidence of disaster so great as this not to be found in any of our newspapers?" said Jan.

"Evidence of this disaster is not to be found in news papers because it is not allowed," answered Gertrude. "Many others of our war disasters are found in the annals of our own records but not this. This of the Abbleann however must have surely been a prodigious disaster to go as far and to maintain in the flood as long as it has. This which seems to center in Bengal State, the explosions of which occurred in the vicinity of Abbleann, has now always been believed to be of volcanic character, for some who witnessed the explosions said that flames had issued from the earth. But we have not seen any evidence of lavas or volcanic ash. The part of the flood that still covers the lower sections of Abbleann and refuses to drain out almost appears now as a splendid and limpid sheet, the blue waters reminding one of the Michollaster lake itself. Yet it is covered with floating debris. Some have said that the lands of that portion had suddenly sank downward with the forests and towns and villages upon its surface, and into this the flood waters had poured and had failed to find an outlet. But I do not believe this is true. Of course I don't doubt that the concussions did demolish a big huge levee on the eastern shore of the Great Mic-Hollester Run River its waters pouring in an overwhelming flood upon Abbleann, and drowning the whole population on the lower sections."

"It's singular however that any one could still make light of such a mighty catastrophe," said Angeline Nichee. "By saying Nature was the cause. Of course this flood has spread over a vast tract of country, and the concussion was felt nearly as far including in Ang Angeline Vine, and Angelinia."

What one scientist said is that the concussion broke down a levee of Lake Angeline further north than Abbleann, and also one of sea Mic-Hollester, and that the two floods poured in fury over so much of the land and therefore covered the whole of southern Central Calverinia with their waters and that the waters of Lake Angeline drained out, and they say that all the inhabitants of the flooded area had been drowned, with the exception of all those who might have had the chance to reach high elevations on time. The recollection of this part of the catastrophe has been found to be true on Lake Angeline but not in a Mic-Hollester."

"In another prediction of the flood," said Joan, "that of the famed city of Confection lying on the shore of Lake Angeline. We are told that the armies of christians attacked a Glandelinian position there during the night and that during the desperate battle which followed, there came fifteen terrible secondary earthquakes, and simultaneous dangerous eruptions, which in that one night drowned all the army of christians, and at the same time engulfed the city of Confection which was swept away by the flood, and that the Glandelinians perished with them. This news given us by witnesses may have had to do with some remote part of the concussion to which witnesses gave this very problematical form as Confection is pretty far north of Abbleann. The report told also that the whole population of Bonbon was drowned by the inundation that followed the explosions and secondary earthquakes. We could call this the deluge of Calverinia."

At the same time this flood was said to have produced the overflow of rivers and that this part of the catastrophe also drowned all the people of Poverty but except the Mayor and his family who escaped upon a strong boat, which at the end of two weeks was borne down to Angelinia. Anathia by the flood. After their escape the Mayor when he was able to tried to save the disaster investigated. Yet it sure is strange how this flood extended throughout all the central part portion of southwestern Calverinia, and its principal injury being in Bengal State and Bengal County where so many towns and villages and even cities have disappeared, southern and lower Abbleann also engulfed in the flood seem to be an unusual thing, and I was told that when the waters are calm, the appearance of a "mysterious city" might be discovered in the floods depths. This, and once the superb righteous Abbleann its houses in ruins, its Holy Churches in fragments, and too the disaster was blamed on My Mt Catherine, Joan and Calverine. Neither have even been in eruption."

"In all of Calverinia's disaster," said Gertrude there is none part more destructive than that which has wiped out Abbleann, demolished Angelinia Anathia, Dorothy Gale, Big Gir-Knoel and other places. The latter city built by Calverinian pioneers in times far past, and which ranks after Abbleann as the third greatest city of Calverinia was apt especially subjected to the disaster, especially more so by the flood. There has been during the whole war so far fighting most frequent frequently. When the flood came so much damage at the city of Jessica. Had Emperor Vivian had seen two Abblemannia Senators to that city to investigate the state of the situation. Then he had decided to act as a preventive of any more such more disasters, he would have all levees and places strongly guarded by whole nations if need be. The most severe of all disaster to the cities seems to have been Jessica. At the time of the occurrence of this disaster the city was full of soldiers whom general Tamarline was then leading in a campaign up to meet Mylette and his Glandelinian army. The greatest danger destruction to buildings and life had occurred, the rivers were seas, and the Mayor of that city to escape from the falling buildings was forced to take refuge in a country tent. Here of all cities next to Abblemann the most destructive results of or to human life occurred. The city had been almost entirely destroyed and the loss of life was said to have been enormous, at least out of a population of two million people two hundred and fifty thousand were missing, and the presence of a Christian army added to the loss and also of the fact of so many being in their beds swelled great greatly the sum of the dead. And there were one million injured. In naming the other visitations of Jessica of fire and flood, the latter brought on greater loss of property but no lives however extra. At Mombi five thousand were missing out of a population of one hundred thousand. All these disasters, together with others due to the war, and the general conflagration throughout the country has been almost proving fatal to good sections of the country. There are many other desolating disasters which has put on itself too long a list to be named, and it may as well be imagined when we consider the number of severe ones within this short space of two years of war, what we can believe of the enemy if the Abblemann disaster is proved against him. I have heard that the destruction of Glandelinia city almost outrivals that of Jessica in the destruction of human life the loss of the missing being estimated at nearly one hundred and ninety thousand. The destruction at Polychrome city is credited with one hundred thousand missing. Coming to the loss at Roma Town it is believed to be thirty thousand, and Eva Town the loss is believed to be 90,000. Returning to Chamberlaine which was fearfully visited its death toll is believed to be estimated at 98,456. We can also find Little Girmoll or in little Girmoll and Henrietta and Ophelia exams examples of enorma enormous sacrifices to the great flood flood demons, the flood and concussion in the city of Henrietta one hundred and ninety five thousand of its people, and claiming one hundred and twenty two thousand in Ophelia, and ninety five thousand in Little Girmoll. But here we're in the camp now, and the bugle is just sounding. We'll be needed soon."

"CALAMITY JANE.."

BEFORE we go any further we can mention something about the girl scout little Jane Mellfort as of her history as she may be one of the main girls to be mentioned among the girl scouts. The story of Jane's life of adventure since she entered the Christian lines as a girl scout to this present time of the eve of this coming tremendous and destructive battle of St. Ethelreda, is one of the most remarkable on record. It was difficult for any of her comrades could ever conceive how so much affliction, suffering and misery caused by her daredevil braveness and rashness could have ever come upon her without inflicting death.

Her first experience happened on March the 12th 1912 when she suffered a very severe injury to her spine due to a fall from her horse while out scouting when it was almost riddled to pieces by a shell exploding under it. She then had been in the girl scout troop called the Fu Flamigoes. It was on a Sunday morning when this had occurred, and Jane had arisen at four thirty to go to the early Mass in the camp and receive Holy Communion. At about eight thirty that morning during a sort of battle then raging and despite Mildred's warning (Mildred is her guardian) went out scouting. She encountered a Glandelinian battery dangerously close and concealed. They let go, and the horse was brought down badly mangled. Not realizing what had happened through she received a spinal injury, and never having had a single day of illness she fought it out, shot six of the gunners, disabled one, and got away before a Glandelinian cavalry patrol could get her within their grasp though they pursued like fury. She then later that day strove to continue at her duties while suffering but was again in her back, numbness and weakness in her lower limbs produced by the fall, and strange disturbances in her abdomen.

The day too had been cold and snowy and her whole body was chilled from her drenched clothing, she having been thrown into a ditch when the horse was shot. She was unable to climb the stairs to her own bedroom in the Geneva headquarters at which she then resided, with the purpose of changing her clothing but managed to attract a guard in a sort of lame manner to the bed room, where she was forced to her bed much against her will although she was not rendered altogether helpless as many people have been who injured their spine through a fall from a horse.

She then was able to get up her feet again, but four weeks later she had another fall from her horse and was shot and wounded also, while assisting two of her companions to escape a party of Omarian Dragoons who were following them. When the horse was shot under her and she was thrown she landed back first striking her head on a stone. She was rendered senseless and besides two bullet scratches received a bad wound on her head which bled badly and matted her hair heavily in blood. A terrible delirium developed after this fall, which to use her own words "created a strange sensation within her head as though some one was trying to burn her eyes out every minute for the whole day. She lay in a hospital camp from April 21st to July the 30th 1912 without receiving any special relief."

About the second of August, she was able to get up, feeling better, and joined a company of scouts going to see the Camp Fire Girls. She and her companions were pursued again by foes who again brought down the horse she was riding. From this new fall she received new head injuries, her vision was further disturbed, and her spinal injury was aggravated, while sixteen of her girl scout companions were slain in the fight for safety and forty wounded while only six of the four were wounded. However the bed could not hold her captive, she being impatient to be useful to her cause as she always had been. But it did not pay for on November 25th she was out scouting with a party of soldiers. Glandelinian gunners saw them, and let loose a terrific shell fire. He was caught under her fallen horse, and it was all that six men could do to get her from under while shot and shell was whizzing all about them. Ten of the men were killed and fourteen wounded.

After that her failing eye sight became worse, the beginning of a strange enduring blindness set in. She was forced to bed again at a time when nearly the whole of the scout force was down with the measles. She then began a bed ridden existence, attended by severe suffering. The several severe injuries to her spine resulted in almost complete paralysis and her stomach would accept no nourishment outside of a little milk and water.

Near Christmas of that year she became totally blind, following two more bad adventures. These rendered her condition still worse.

She was now subject to frequent spasms on which account it was necessary to build the sides of her bed higher in order that she might not fall out during the night. There however was no evident danger outside of this spasm time, because she was unable to move herself in bed, unable even to turn over. After complete recovery, which came in April 1913, she had been far more careful, Mildred watch everything she did, and if times were dangerous would not let her go out under any conditions. She of all scouts seemed to have had the worst of all adventures, and from that they called her "Calamity Jane." About May she became afflicted with a severe throat trouble which made it almost impossible for her to eat or to say any nourishment whatever. Her throat was sore a long time and on frequent occasions she had nearly strangled because the aperture was almost wholly closed. To all this was added another calamity. While out with Mildred in another part of the camp, her horse got scared of a fire fly and she was thrown bad and injured her left arm badly. Up to now even her arm never appears to be quite better yet.

"AFTER THE STORM CALM COMES THE STORM." "Is a saying true in the case of this awful war. All of the girl and boy scouts agreed that sooner or later Tamerline would swing on general Vivian and then something would happen. Too Tamerline would desire vengeance because such a force of girl and boy scouts rescued in the face of vastly superior numbers three of their girl companions, and for their disastrous defeat by so small a body of men, and children, and when the storm would come none could say. Besides general Vivian was determined to get through and join at Maximilian, and no one was disinclined to even imagine this, or to think of it.

The main Christian armies were not therefore, able to give their whole attention to the movements of general Tamerline's army. The first operation was to slowly follow him in his advance, but also to remain hidden in the woods as they marched along. Four great intelligent men had been commissioned to do the main scouting to watch everything that Tamerline's army did, and then to come and report as soon as possible. Colonel Charles Beare rode over toward the van of the Christian troops with Captain Aldro Hardy, and his two lieutenants, Colonel Gardens and Francis Huber on remaining within the lines to aid in forming plans--the latter however laid up with a wound in his left leg. Sometimes during the halt of the advance Christian cavalry would dash into some portion of the Glandelinian camp at night, and it would be a amazing sight to see three or four hundred horses belonging to the enemy and many provisions wagons driven under fire to the Christian lines, and a number of prisoners with them. These raiders were accommodated according to the number of horses and wagons and prisoners captured, and these raiders were very expert, one man one time through a scheme of his own securing a hundred wagons in one day. They were rather rough with the one way in their raids, for the raiders often cut up the enemy counter attacker badly... 7.7.2

Each Raider, and because of their habit of hiding mostly at night they were called by the enemy as the "Night Riders" or the "Wooded Terrors" each man had an fast horse as any Glandelinian cavalry man had, and therefore the Glandelinians also had to put on a "night" in extreme strong of sentinels and pickets. A certain privilege and even a certain was stopped from their part for every time those sentinels would from lack of watchful near by allow raiders to come in without warning, and although this made them very careful to a certain extent, the raiders still would come out of the adventure successfully.

A much more exciting movement of the Night Riders was to try and break through into the quartermaster's section of the Glandelinian camp, which took place usually at midnight. Sometimes even a lot of horses would be used here and the animals would be quietly let out one by one from the enclosure, and as they passed a long a sort of line formed of hurdles they were driven on out into the open. The enemy sentries would sound the alarm, and the Glandelinians would charge the raiders. Therefore some caution was used in this process, and they would have to hastily leap over the hurdles and mount their own horses and driving the others onward escape to avoid a close engagement. From so many raids frequented upon them the Glandelinians were rather wild, and the number of sentries would be redoubled every time.

General Vivian himself had by this time been long enough in Bengali State to feel sure of his own position. He therefore determined to move forward to press on toward the great city of Santa Ethelreda which had been on such a state of round as to escape most of the disaster. The population were warned of the nearness of the enemy but they as yet did not move, and fearing a terrible scene if the enemy hit got there first general Vivian was determined to race Tamerlane for the place and cut his off. He engaged ten of his most reliable generals, and sent to extend his divisions over a great territory and to have them move at once. Ditches in front of the Christian positions were deepened and strengthened and widened, and side channels cut so that in case the enemy would try to start a night surprise on at onset the Glandelinians would be trapped. Besides general Vivian decided on that the work of diversions could be carried on over the whole of the low lying land. Forty thousand cavalry were kept steadily at work on constant scouting tours and men were placed in fortified positions as fast as they were put into condition. General Vivian was resolved that until the country beyond him got so strengthened by his various armies that there could be little danger from the excited incursions, he would not increase any number of refugees within his trooper camp and that in case of a battle pending they must go elsewhere for safety. He also decided upon entering extensively upon all military operations that was necessary. He had already ascertained that a ready reinforcement could be obtained, as O Abbiannians under general Ismarie and E. Puenos were close at hand, of any amount of ammunition that could be brought in from the northeast, and that anything other military power could be given to him. Up to the present time any new troops that had arrived had been obtained from the north only, and being equal to that of Tamerlane he determined to try the experiment upon a large scale. This he decided to do on October the Fourth. A movement of the left wing toward Ethelreda was first to be made. This was to partially occupy the side of a low slope called St Ethels Hill, and to team it with the best available batteries, that would cover quite a stretch of country.

Behind the battery a trench was to be constructed, and earth piled above to form the position of very great strength. Strong beams were to be placed across the trench and in front of the position were to be placed a considerable heavy amount of rushes. In this way, a good secondary position was made. Then preparations were made for a new and stronger defense in front of the position. A sort of strangely formed lane was made of two strong fences of barbed wire and of wood. This lane though long was in the shape of an immense funnel, narrow at one end and to little more than to let an average man squeeze through. At the end of this was a machine gun, that though a single one sprang enough bullets to mow down a whole regiment at one discharge from the cartridge belt. Often half a dozen scouts would be selected from the soldiers and sent out on patrol duty. One by one they would approach the foe lines, and when one or the other had received any news or observed anything, he would come to his general and report. They brought the report that the enemy was not neither advancing or retreating. Then at this news one of the military detectives began cautiously and quietly to approach the enemy lines, and could come and tell the same.

Since a big battle seemed to be impending Gertrude had advised all of her followers for their safety to remain out of the fighting zone. During all this time the girls were taught a few new things in the army of their own part of the camp and that was how to milk their few cows, goats and Dolores and Mildred who were suffering from the effects of their injuries though they were not sent to any army hospital as Jean and her friends had been nevertheless remained in camp but had nothing to do and had to remain idle while the rest were busy. John undertook to wait upon these two, while all the rest of the girls did what was customary for mail scouts to do. In the mid day even some of the child scouts, they had secured from an enemy's market master store, butter and fresh cheese. Penrod who had returned with plenty of information after telling how after his escape he literally cried on the enemy all that time, returned with a light cart and two horses one pulling it, and one in the rear, and it was loaded with ammunition boxes. With it were two milk cans. Pulled along with the horse all lashed together were twenty pigs, a calf, and a calf bull. Penrod mentioned also in the cart was a crate full of quite noisy hens. When Penrod goes out he doesn't "bring anything" NO, and how. Although some of the other boy and girls scouts who had been new to the job had not a good start they nevertheless had driven in a surprising manner, and one of them also went one raid, and came back loaded down with nectarines, peaches, apples, oranges, apricots, a canned goods and plums, all in a good size army bag which was to afford a pleasant change and addition to their diet.

However there was one trick that the Glandelinians played on some of the child scouts. At a certain spot the enemy allowed them to get in easily, and cart off a certain amount of stuff without hindrance, and later when these things were brought back to the Christian lines Angelina Riccos had asked of them "Where in the world, did you get all these darn frogs. These animals having got loose were a very great nuisance. They after getting away literally swarmed. Do what they would the boy and girls scouts could not get rid of them. If they would but stay out of the headquarters, and the tents no one would have minded them, indeed as they destroyed a good many unwholesome insects, they would have been welcome visitors in the camp, but this is just what they would not do. The door because of the heat had always stood open and they would come in by hundreds. They would hide behind bureaus, wardrobes, behind boxes, or get into and under beds and cots, and into their clothes, caps, hats, and into water jugs, and canteens, and in fact into boots, shoes, into socks and every possible place. The boots too had to be shaken out before being put on. It was at first quite a matter of difficulty to know what to do with the plague of frogs after they were caught, to harm them they didn't have the heart to do, but after a time they had secured covered baskets and into these the frogs were popped and brought as often as they were caught and emptied it into a stream.

But the darn things would only return. Worse of all one of the raiders had by being fooled by the enemy brought with him a box full of different different sort of insects scorpions, and large centipedes. These creatures escaping from the box were a great trouble to the girls in their own dairies especially the frogs for the frogs and toads would climb up the walls and fall squashed into the milk cans. The only way they could really be forced to remain out of the house was by having the door as seen as under three feet from the ground, so that the lower half could be shut while the girls busy in the house were engaged inside. However in spite of the utmost pains the little ones would crawl in through the crevices or leap in at the west window, and at last the girls who understood how to do it, had to construct wicker work covers for all the plans, and this was the only way they were able to keep the milk clean. Another scheme the enemy played which was quite as bad. Three of the girls had a great scare when they came upon an iguana which never before had ever been seen in Calaveria, and this the enemy had put among the provisions secured by the raiders, though where the enemy got it is not mentioned. They really understood what it was, but these great lizards almost dragon like in appearance are a little over five feet long, and are ferocious in appearance and are very savage when attacked. Then they will defend themselves and can inflict a sharp crushing blow with their tails, claw you, or inflict a severe bite with their teeth. They were very common on the Pampas in South America, and how this one got here was a mystery to them.

By tricking it the boys managed to capture it, and placed it in a big wooden box intending to get it to become tame, and have it as a pet as they all knew just what it can be fed. In the meantime several new divisions of troops had arrived and the very fact of their presence near to the main army gave a feeling of companionship and security.

Very frequently that day a number of new officers would arrive with letters of commendation introduction. General Vivian's army also received an increase. A young General named Hindernine Borden, had written expressing a very strong desire to join his army with his own command as a reinforcement, and requesting general Vivian's advice in the matter. Several messages had been exchanged, and general Vivian agreed to receive his help, and general Vivian never afterwards had any regret having received him. That afternoon however a change had come over which deserves mention. Sally one day came to Gertrude and said that the enemy threatened an engagement toward Sarah Junction west of St Ethelreda, and that the child scout camp might be caught under the zone of fire. Gertrude had long suspected that such a peril might spring up but she only smiled and said:

"Well Sally, and what do you believe the enemy will do. Do you believe it is necessary for us to move to some other quarter?"

"Oh Miss Gertrude but I don't wish to see the camp move unless the army does. That is what I just told Terence. If we have to though we cannot say no, but I'd rather see the camp stay, as it were as it is in a beautiful location."

"I have no objection at all Bally, and I believe I can get a battery to protect us. Terence is a very good boy scout, good and steady, and I understand Violet, and her sisters have a very high opinion of him, so if it is not necessary for us to move we won't. We would be very sorry to have a bad loss among ourselves however, and if we have to move we have to, but I hope this is only a false alarm and we then shall have the satisfaction of remaining here."

And so it was settled, and after dinner, Terence and Bally went on a scouting tour to watch developments, while the rest of the camp went back to work as usual. By this time the boy and girls had begun to find out which of their signal drills peculiar to their commands would pay and which would not---or rather---for they all paid more or less---which was the most suitable. The flag drills had proved a complete success. The flag drills had always been looked upon as great fun, although it had proved hard work before they had mastered it. And its results had rather exceeded Gertrude's anticipation. The progress of learning the peculiar cries drill, that is to say out as of different sorts of birds, cats, and owls and so forth had proved for them all a long and tiresome operation, and had taken an immense time. All however had to learn that or couldn't have become scouts. However judging by the progress they at first made with it, many had really begun to despair of ever finishing their course, but with practice they finally became more accomplished.

Still flag drilling too had been found to be too great a labor during the heat of the summer days, and too cold for winter, and therefore in winter had been carried on indoors. It had been slick work too, and it required bright well developed minds to be able to accomplish it. Their first teacher had been Miss Dorothy Gale, an accomplished girl scout woman, and if it had not been for her help many would have got sick of the job. Although the success in the drills had been considerable, there were many who for some reason had not been able to grasp it, and couldn't learn, and therefore instead of being rejected after all had been put in as "later class scouts."

Gertrude herself had never carried out her idea of joining in with the Camp Fire Girls Scouts, the duties of her own regiment having been required for other purposes, she had not however ever abandoned the idea, but now it didn't seem possible to move a junction as the two sects were too far distant. Indeed the drilling of boy and girls scouts required considerable care and skill, and new recruits have to be drilled by another party before they can enter the troop of those well disciplined.

The nearly two years which had elapsed since the boy and girls scouts more better known by the readers had effected a considerable change in their appearance. Penrod ten years old was now eleven (a few months older too) a squarely built sturdy but very rough appearing young fellow. He was more freckled than ever. From his life of exposure in the open air and his many adventures he appeared older than he really was. He too had a strong idea too that before he sees another year the Christians will win a magnificent victory. He had all the dare devil recklessness of any boy and was so persevering in his efforts of anything he attempted that his friends and comrades, and even all generals, and the Vivian Girls named him "Johnny Do it." He too a lively interest of all he did, of all that above or under him, and gave his mind to everything and was very religious. If he went out shooting he did so to get game for the table. Sometimes when he went hunting for game he caught a number of wild ducks and so forth and brought Glandolinian prisoners back with him also. Ask him to do something that seemed impossible, and he did it. He enjoyed the sport and entered heartily into it but he did so in a business sort of way. He was also a imaginative boy. He stuck to all work as conscientiously as he did in his duties as a scout, and he concentrated his mind on any thing. Being appointed by the Vivian Girls he was the main super head of them. To those who were a little careless and who didn't know him, they would or he at first a little dislike for him, as he really is severe. But otherwise especially when he becomes more acquainted with the party and they with him all misunderstanding passes. A new adventure would be more irresistible to him and not unfrequently when he went out scouting alone he would come on the return in a high state of triumph with some curious Glandolinian trophies. Usually he was the sort of boy too who was in cases of extreme necessity so fierce, so wildly ferocious and vicious vicious that Glandolinians never bothered him unless they were in the overwhelming majority in number. Then sometimes they were sorry for going for him.

Angelina Riches was of the same age and so was Gertrude. Angelina Riches was highest next to Penrod and Gertrude came third. Their own constant out of door adventures, scout exercises and so forth had made them as nimble and as active as if they were little fawns. They loved to scout, and for Angelina Riches to even hear or see the fact that a Christian army was worried in battle was the most precious pleasure for her.

Dolores wanted three months of eleven, and appeared to be under twelve. She was quite the home bird of the Christian camp and liked nothing better than doing all her military work and going out adventuring. The time was now approaching when any moment a Glandolinian one may be expected. It was apparently still and quiet in the direction of the Glandolinian army, and Gertrude Angelina, hearing of the increased number of general Vivian men had not the least fear of the enemy delivering a successful assault upon any part of general Vivian's army, but she had heard that general Vivian had resolved when the time came to deliver a grand thrust himself as he was bound to pass through the enemy lines and go on toward Maximilian. He had ordered nevertheless an extra number of sentries to be out, especially at night. He looked forward with some little anxiety to the danger of general Hanley making a junction with Tamerlane, because when he had ridden out with general Julio Benligan and two of the others to the scene of the encounter of the Christian cavalry and the child scouts who had rescued Dolores and Mildred, and they found that the Glandolinian cavalry had fled so precipitately for the loss of so many of their men and of the escape of the rescued and their rescuers that they had not buried the bodies of their comrades, and that short as the time had been, wolves and foxes had left nothing but a few bones remaining of these, and vultures and Griffons had also feasted upon the bodies. From the shoes and from the weapons of the dead soldiers strewn about and cart-tridge boxes, general Julio Benligan had pronounced that hundreds of thousands must have been engaged in the fray, the Glandolinians having been Hunghood and also the fierce Hic-Hollistians, the latter although ready to fight most bravely against any real attack upon a really too strongly prepared foe, and the other the Hanguabos of a far more native and courageous character. The former of the enemy, Benligan affirmed---and others agreed with him, would not of themselves have been likely to attempt a fresh onset upon antagonists who had proved themselves to be formidable against overwhelming numbers, but the latter would almost be certain to try some most desperate attempt to wipe off the disgrace of their defeat. Under these circumstances although confident of general Vivian's power to beat off any onset it was resolved by all the generals that every precaution should be taken when the time approached, for if Tamerlane was afraid to attack, Hanley wasn't.

The plan was to fight past the two of them and retreat toward Maximilian. Late that afternoon however, Angelina Riches, had gone out to scout with Gertrude Angelina, and a large party of Abblanlian mounted Dragoons. Jane Melfort, Calamity Jane was much all right, had come down to the rear portion of the Christian camp with his arm on her shoulder to do some guard duty of her own plan as she was too much at leisure, and wanted to do something, and Gladys and Joy had ridden to the front of the Christian position to a small pool in a stream at some slight distance off where she had the day before believed she had observed a young Pileated Woodpecker. Gertrude which she had believed to be a new note and she wanted to see it. The cattle of the scout regiment had just been driven in by Colonel Andrew Jameson's command were in the field below still at their military drill, conducted with a loud band. Ethel was in the camp sitting on a log, trying to learn a new prayer in a prayer sheet, while Bally was in the edge of the camp picking some flowers to decorate the table in her tent. Presently the occupants of Gertrude's headquarters were startled by a sharp piercing cry from Bally, burst in the door without she was just fairly throwing herself up the steps, burst in the door without ever knocking or in usual way, threw her hat violently to the floor, rushed at a bound to a bunch of stacked rifles, snatched one and crying: "Quick everybody your rifles for heaven's sake!" was gone in an instant.

Angelina Jennings, and all who were within the room sprang to their feet too surprised for a moment to do anything, and then Angelina Jennings repeated the words "Quick" every one of you, your rifles." They seized their rifles and revolvers slung them on their shoulders and rushed over their shoulders in a hurry, and with Angelina Jennings in the lead ran out every doorway there was into the open. Then they saw a light which brought a scream from all of them. After a moment's pause they grasped their rifles and ran forward pell-mell to a stone wall though their limbs trembled so that they could scarcely carry them on, and their hearts beat loudly. The night was indeed a terrible one. A distant distance of two hundred and fifty yards some three child scouts, and not belonging to Gertrude's command, and who appeared by their gaily colored and colored uniforms to be the "Fu Flamigoes" were riding for their very lives. One was a boy, the others were girls. His hat was off his gun was gone, his face was deadly pale. The others still were armed but had no time to fire. Behind them rode about one hundred and thirty three Glandolinians, and the fiercest fiercest of all, the dreaded Zimmerman. The nearest one was immediately behind the little boy at a distance of two horse lengths, the others also about thirty were close to their leader. The two girls were some distance

The low trencherous wire fence was not observed, and in another moment more than a hundred men and horses were rolling in a confused mass on the ground, while the foe infantry was still some distance behind.

"Now Penrod said 'Every barrel we or mine have' and from the building a rain of lead was poured down upon the beleaguered Glandelinians, while from the wall a rifle and pistol fire streamed added by those of the machine and sniping guns. The horses of those nearest the noise frightened and wounded, and many of them again straddled and kicked dreadfully and did almost as much in harm to their masters as the deadly bullets of the Christians, and when the fire ceased not more than half of them remained their seats and galloped off leaving the rest in a ghastly heap. Seeing them in full retreat, but seeing the Glandelinian infantry coming on as if it were a wave, Penrod and some of the others descended to relieve Gertrude and Angeline.

"Well done boys well done. Very well planned George Gertrude said as she reined in her horse. 'That was a near escape.'

"Not as near a one as three other children had, by a very long way indeed Gertrude."

"Indeed Gertrude said anxiously. 'Well we can hear about it when this danger is over. We'll have to fall to the rear. Everything will have to be abandoned as the foe is coming in overwhelming numbers and not only our selves, but the whole Christian line at this section won't be able to stand. It'll be a fierce onslaught in a few minutes. But when did the other happen?'

"It occurred only a few minutes before your own. The girl and boy scouts behaved most splendidly; but they are rather upset now, many are wounded and some slain."

"If you will retreat up to the house we can get them out if the danger is so great," said Penrod.

Then just as soon as all this was accomplished and just only getting time to remove only some of the wounded girls and boys out, the building went to pieces before the explosion of a terrific shell and hundreds were killed inside including many other boy and girl scouts and many men and officers. The Glandelinians despite the terrific fire they met were coming forward now with a tremendous yell as if they were a perfectly large army of the wildest Indians and portions of the Christian line was avering.

"Lopez," cried Penrod, "Carry out what I told you before, see that all is out of this location. Lose no time our loss is big enough now. Tell every one to hurry to the front, for the enemy will be on us soon otherwise. You Jane there's your opportunity create some confusion by bringing down a couple of those Glandelinian officers that appear to be generals. All the rest retreat as soon as you can. Terence remove your column of signal Corps before shells land on the spot."

Having seen that his various orders were obeyed, Penrod went up to the house to see if any one could be rescued, but the wreck was all afire and rescue work was impossible. Another shell exploded and hurled the flaming debris all about him leaving a narrow escape. The boy and girl scouts had retreated, and as Penrod rode swiftly forward he found another line of Christian troops in position in the rear with batteries and machine gunnery. The girls who had been so trembly had not quite recovered although they still appeared pale as the noise of the conflict increased. Every body was retreating, and under Dorothy Gale's direction all the remainder of the child scouts were escaping bravely enough now and then they would rally and pour in such a fierce fire upon the enemy that they inflicted dreadful losses. Dorothy Gale absorbed in her attention to their safe retreat to a strong and high position behind the line of battle had fortunately heard nothing of Gertrude's danger until Penrod told her. As soon as they were safely lodged, they watched to see the proceeds of the battle and as the enemy was still doggedly pressing on, and there was yet time, George S. Zimmermann now said:

"Gertrude dear, you give us your account first. That'll give us a sort of clue how to form a diversion in case we are all greatly imperiled."

"I have not much to tell George and the rest of you within hearing. Angeline and I had ridden out with our fifteen hundred men some distance five or six miles I should say, when we heard noise and saw a small party of the enemy coming. I and Angeline fired with our revolvers but the Glandelinians increased in enormous numbers. In the conflict that ensued our scouts were all slain wounded or captured, and we had the lead in getting away, though we stopped a moment after the horror had occurred to give them our barrels with minnie balls, and then believe me we rode for it with hundreds of them after us. Unfortunately we had been foolish enough to go without our revolvers. The Glandelinian soldiers horsemen and cavalry pressed us hard, but I was never in fear of their actually catching us, not those especially on foot, our only alarm was that one of us might repeat my disaster of my or her horse being shot under us, so I and Angeline tried our best to hold our own thirty or forty yards ahead. They made lance at us and fired shots but missed. However I made sure that any one of you might see us coming, and we should have shouted loudly enough, I can tell you, to warn you as we came up. Besides we understood that that at the worst our troops might help, or that in the arms were hanging above the fireplace in our headquarters, and that we wanted time enough only to run in, catch them up, and get to the door to be able to defend the house until the rest of my troop could help us. And now that is your story to the boy, and the girls who had been rescued.

"I have even less than you have Miss Gronburg. 'We had been detached from our own command from another army in scouting. We were persued for miles by Miss Gronburg, let our rescuer. Pointing to Penrod tell his first and I'll finish mine. He is entitled to it.'

"Well said Penrod, I too had just started out to go scouting with quite a force of my troop, and was planning a better arrangement for it when I heard the noise of many horses galloping and the sound of terrific firing. It was followed almost directly by a tremendous volley, and my comrades rushed into a concealed position, and saw the remainder of the enemy coming along on a retreat at full gallop. By the direction they were going they would pass only a little way from where we were concealed, so I gave my orders, and then all my followers including myself gave the enemy a hot fire from all our weapons, and many a horse and man went down almost simultaneously. The Glandelinians who survived raced on more confusedly but I gave them another fire and repeated the loss. Then I reached the place I saw that three strange child scouts had a narrow escape of it, Angeline Jennings had fainted from loss of blood, and others were in a great state of cry. But I had no time for questioning for I ran up to hoist the danger flag, and then saw Gertrude and Angeline coming along with the horde of devils after you. Now boy let us hear the finish of your story."

"Well comrades as I began we got detached from our own force in scouting to see what foe was before us and three of us rode out to the small slope in hopes afterwards of getting on the return and that our troop might still be there. I left my horse and telling the two girls to stay and watch I crept on very cautiously through the reeds till I came within sight of a sort of clearing. Sure enough I saw far away a vast Glandelinian position rather on the other side of the Lebanon Plains. I waited for fifteen minutes and wondered who whose Glandelinian army he was it was it was:

"Both the Glandelinian position boy," George Zimmermann put in "We don't care about the enemy position, we want to hear about your experience."

"Well I'm coming to the pursuers boy pioneer," the lad said "at the position must have been Hanleys, for all that. Well after examining the enemy position I went out from the bushes to my horse and called to my friends. As I got to them I heard a shout and the shout command in a man's voice:

"Surrender you little Christian Spartans, the jig is up."

The sudden command almost made me tumble down it startled me so, and not a hundred yards away and rising to cut me off from home, were thirty Glandelinians, on horses far in advance of another set of forces about one hundred and thirty or five hundred strong. I was not long as you may say, suspect climbing into my saddle, and I and my two companions bolted as if the forest fire was after us. I was not able to go straight for my home, but had to make a big sweep to get round them. I and my companions were better mounted than any of those Glandelinians except the thirty, and these gradually gained on me, while all the rest in turn lagged some distance behind, but four of them galloped lances, and we had no time to even fire a shot in defense. They cried at us again and again to surrender but we didn't answer. Our horses did their best, and I encouraged mine to the utmost, but I believe it seemed all up with us for I was fully convinced that they would capture me and the two girls before we could reach a place of safety. When we were a little more than three hundred miles from your camp I saw a line of boy and girl scouts followed by soldiers come dashing down toward a stone wall with rifles in hand and a little afterwards many more came too followed by a whole troop of soldiers. The thirty Glandelinians came nearer and nearer, and I expected every minute to feel a blow from a sabre or get shot. I could not at first understand why none of you had fired, but I supposed that did not feel sure of their aim, and I had the consolation the rebel soldiers nearest could not be going to sabre or shoot me or they would open fire at once at an cost. On I and my companions went, and three of those thirty foes came so close that one of them almost rode alongside of me and I could feel his horse's breath, and the idea came across my mind that the rebel was trying to catch hold of the calf of my leg. At a hundred yards I could see the girl's face who was lanced in the shoulder, and seeing more coming I felt I and my two girl companions were safe. She herself seemed to me as steady as if she had been aiming at a cloud. Then there was a frightful yell almost in my ear as I heard one of the girls cry out:

"Stop, for heavens sake boy stop." I was stopping before but my head went down to the horse's mane I can tell you. Then there was the sound of shots from two rifles and a yell of pain. Then came a crash of all the rifles and though I could not glance round, I felt the horse behind me had stopped and that I and my two girl companions were safe. That's my story as far as I remember except when the foe leaped the stone wall and the fierce fight happened."

A few more questions elicited from Gertrude by Perrod all that she understood of her own experience and then the warmest commendations were bestowed upon all the girls and boys who had been first to go to the rescue. Angelina Jennings however generously disclaimed all praise, as she said that she and the others should have done nothing at all had it not been for Sally's sounding the alarm.

The action along this portion of the Christian line progressed with unusual violence in fact it could be said that within a space of five miles it raged with the fury of Gettysburg and Waterloo combined to gether in three days time and yet lasting only from two till six in the evening, but the fighting was equally as savage along a thirty mile front, and climaxed with a violence that put it into thirty of such battles, or with the same equal loss of the battles in such a short space of ground. The losses of the enemy was terrific, but the foe were somewhat successful, and at nightfall the Christian line had to change its position, and the main section fell back toward the city of St Etheldreda, (not the ruined one mentioned before as this one is farther away and only a town. The Olandelinians had maintained during the whole progress of the onset the stolid stolid stubbornness of their race. As wicked as they are and as wicked as their cause is they are as glutious for terrible punishment and too they are very difficult to beat if they rush against you in such great numbers and in such violent force and fury. The wounded too never express any gratitude for being cared for when within the Christian hospital tents, and very often even to the Red Cross Nurses who bring them through in when almost at the point of death the rascals especially when they're Omandians are treacherous as little slaves.

Indeed they are very evil in human form, however when they're Omandians they are very inferior to the more noble appearing Mic-Hollett Indians, and Turnerianians, and others, but they are the fiercest of all Olandelinians to contend with, and the most difficult to defeat. They are generally hairy & all of them like the Zimmermannians tall girlish looking men, wear hair in all sorts of fashions as little girls. Their complexion is usually an ivory color, and many of them are generally extremely savage and brutal and cruel looking, though all have fighting faces and fierce fighting eyes.

In the course of the approaching night after the first storm of the battle that was to follow on the morrow, General Vivian rode over from St Etheldreda, and was greatly surprised to hear of the fierce attack, and of the sad results. He stated the Olandelinians had not been seen or heard near the city, though the population were apprehensive, and the so fearsome starting an exodus, and the general and all his staff, were ignorant of anything having occurred until his arrival. He regretted that the girls and boy scout force had been so caught in the sales for Gertrude reported her loss in dead as one hundred and five hundred wounded. All the officers desired to hear of the particulars, and to offer their congratulations for the narrow escape Gertrude's hands had from annihilation. All the other officers were particularly alarmed, and it was proposed at once that the part of the line that had been worsted must be heavily reinforced and that efforts must be made to recover the lost positions. General Vivian decided not to sleep that night. He went over toward Beasie to attend to the concentrating of troops, and threw in by signals and whistled commands a long battle line of artillery of four square leagues long forming it in immediate join his own position outside and within Etheldreda giving the same care of pushing in strong bodies of infantry. The reinforcing troops placed him into position near the spot where the disaster had occurred were under the Two Edwards, and by an Englishman who though a foreigner had long been in the Christian army and was the same sort of a fighter as Wellington might have been had he been here now. His name was General John Marcher but he had been so long in Abbiegria even when a boy that his Abbiegrian language was the same as his own in knowledge. He was accompanied by his two divisions of Abbiegrians and a strong cavalry force, and a friend who was also a general. General Hardy who had fallen mortally wounded in the battle was superseded by General Sub White. General Vivian had made the acquaintance of this Englishman when he first entered the army under his command and pronounced him to be a very good man and a staunch militant Catholic. General Marcher had brought with him a strong force of volunteer troops long in the service, who had won many a battle and were some of the toughest fighters of the army. General Marcher promised General Vivian every bit of assistance. There was great pleasure at the thought of such a good reliable general in the command, and Violet, and her officers had ever at first been especially pleased, as such a fighting man would be a great advantage to the Christian cause. The plans of General Edwards and Marcher were excellent. It was decided that General Gorman and Don Martinez should join together to form a sort of resistance toward Vanston and fell the foe in that location. 2.2.22

It was so that a good portion of General Vivian's army was about nearly six miles away. It certainly could have heard the firing and should be very close by. Therefore a conversation on the matter too of an extensive portion of the Christian line between Vanston and St Etheldreda. This ought to show that the Christian line was stronger than at first supposed. Indeed with the exception of General Marcher, who had brought up all his own troops, the other divisions did not as yet arrive. It was a few days before when General Marcher had arrived with his command and that of course some of the boys would have heard of it. And General Marcher had accompanied General Marcher and the staff officers, and it was with him that they were powerfully built men and could accomplish a great deal. General Vivian suggested that the Christian position should be improved, the new position was forced some distance from those from which they had been driven, and the troops which were brought up consisted of Angelina's.

During the progress of the fight no new arrivals from the enemy occurred, but the danger of the danger of one nevertheless every possible precaution was taken to avoid a surprise. Troops were now established upon all endangered spots, for many miles upon either section of St Etheldreda, and even beyond the twelve miles which the city stretched to the south, the army was placed in position. One large section of the army occupied the city to defend, but General Vivian considered that all danger was in that locality more than any other. Two hundred acres of cultivated land was a position for a deadly string of machine guns, and the city itself was covered by a long range battery. The position was now north of defense and offense, the interior line of battle having been moved fifty yards further off during the night, and the defended line of troops to a greater distance to give them time to reform.

During the night most of the boy and girls were devoted plenty of time to the number of their wounded, but it was feared for many that the time would soon be approaching when their leader and guardian leader was to return to the army from which he had come and that was Concentrian Arkonaghe. He had been very popular to every one, he had done well, as Perrod bent help, adviser and leader too.

"I believe Iudcliffe is almost as much here as every other place," George Zimmerman said one day. "I heard he is dreaded by the not told of the enemy. I shouldn't wonder if he wasn't Gertrude's brother. He looks so much alive, and don't hardly appear to be a boy."

Perrod happened to pass Gertrude's place one day, and noticed she slightly frowned at George and a bright flash of color came to her face. She said nothing at the time, but at eight o'clock that night called George to her room and had a long conversation with him that was strictly private. "How can you see my dear Gertrude's friend?" she concluded. "For those good reasons we don't want anything to be said of Iudcliffe that I would care to mention. But that he is he doesn't want no one to ever find out. If his real secret is found out it'll frustrate his plans for the cause."

Later on she took up this matter with Perrod. "I am sorry for this," she said after a pause. "We could or ought to have foreseen the possibility of this thing. For that it is mentioned, I wonder we did not foresee this before. My friend Iudcliffe has done much for us and I did not ever hear that his being was a mystery to all of us. We all simply love him extremely. His principles are good, and he would and does in all ways be something of an asset for our cause. At the same time you acted right, and we cannot permit even our best friends and companions say anything about Iudcliffe that might be heard. Of course George didn't understand the danger. Concerning the secret being out among us, wouldn't be so wrong whatever, but the fact is we can't tell whether all are friends within our lines or not even among scouts. Many scouts have sometimes been employed within our lines, and we have had the case of a fine getting them captured or put to death. On the other hand had only been a short time here, and understood nothing of our cause yet, and though good in all the things he had accomplished is altogether a perplexing experience with the things he had accomplished. I therefore approve of it Gertrude that he must be any of our secret says. I therefore approve of it Gertrude that he must be turned over to us as a warning for his own good, for if Iudcliffe ever was angry it's just as bad. He I believe is going to return for a while to General Arkonaghe and so will be the presence itself to our y. I know who Iudcliffe really is. At the end of the present time however Iudcliffe is willing to give up his identity or shall then of course offer no objection that he said and indeed should rejoice much at every thing that you must be as Iudcliffe was. If he ever found out of any thing that was of his real identity, and knew it but I wouldn't care what he said. And that's that."

Gertrude throughout agreed with Perrod. It was well with Perrod, and George too that the former had been told by Gertrude, for as soon as the interview of Perrod was over, the topic at captain had George summoned specially to his headquarters, and then he appeared. Perrod went at once into details regarding whether George had said something about Iudcliffe and received the confession promptly from the lips. Perrod heard him quietly to the end.

[illegible][illegible]

17. Here many big righteas and religioas millionaires, and church members of the sect, and as generous as in receiving had put millions also into their mansions one building alone being said to have cost over twenty two million dollars. These righteas millionaires were generals now in the christian army, having given such a support of the cause, and Red Cross and I other works during the war. The said man was General and Ch. Churcher had gone up here because of the goodly support of these naidly Millionaires. One religious institution of art contained inviolable objects of art and was the property of the St. Gertrude Church adjoining. Father Iohann had been at the St. Germs Church which alter cost more than I $1,000,000 was one of the most chcy residncs chriches on this hill because of the extremely white and pink walls, and heavy gray chate elite roof, rest of it being a Millionaire home and farther west an enormous

On 11/11/68, the FBI advised that the above information was obtained from a confidential source who has provided reliable information in the past. The source stated that the above information was obtained from a confidential source who has provided reliable information in the past. The source stated that the above information was obtained from a confidential source who has provided reliable information in the past.

[illegible]

When the burning of the school about 1 1/2 blocks away commenced and the flames reached toward the house a farmer and farmer's wife from the north, General Vivian next six of the best men from the Christian Union with orders to stop the dreadful conflagration at any cost of property or the little country in this locality would be ablaze. With them they brought many tons of burning material, dynamite and the terrific power of the explosive was equal to the leisure extermination of the dreadful fire. Captain Van Allen was in charge of the squad. Chief James of Barrett placed the charge and the third man met them off. Stationing the selves on G. A. N's street toward which the fire conflagration was approaching from district to district this regular regular fire sea from the burning and where section of the city, town, sent a brilliant electrically at his desperate fight, and when they had ended a broad open space occupied only by the almost total ruins of a hundreds and dozens of buildings remained of what had been a long row of handsome structures with or which with all their costly treasures of furnishings and articles of decoration had been consigned to heinous ruin.

The many thunderous detonations were astounding if the city was bombarded again - which the terrified population of the city all too readily thought, the name of day not mentioned meant much to those whose bare feet felt the flames. A hundred million dollars' worth of property and residences were destroyed, some smoke and drifting dust, but it seemed absolutely hopeless now for that destruction apparently broke the fire storm and sent the raging flames on from McClellener Avenue, to Bendale Avenue, a distance of forty four blocks or over three miles was dismantled a block deep though most of the structures had stood unscathed by blast or cinder.

If one large wall failed, and not one building a wall upon its foundation, it could not even for one instant nullify the force of nature in reversing the direction of the wind sign of the southwest wind, it would have been possible that the more powerful wind at street corner northeast, joined with fleeing flames and undiminished by the thousands of barrels of the river front, would have been safe. Ever, found of the fire had done its duty, but the indestructible hard, and shifted from southeast to west, and the fire crossed the wide part of wide street at another section which had not been anticipated. That was at Centralia Street. There the flames rolled on in clouds of fire before the significance could reach the ordinary citizens. They made their way desperately to the foundations, calling their explosives, despite the hellish heat and

The charges had to be placed so that the fuse lit in such a hurry, that the explosion was of quite so successful from the trained view point of the panelist that nothing could be done to stop the progress of the flame. The men realized that the last stand would be hopeless except on North Avenue, their decision thus coinciding with that of the authorities. They dared to force their explosives farther in the burning region, and again with was the result and the ruined districts of the city thereafter found a trench through the clustered structures, that it was hoped the conflagration would as it was could not. In the place, pushing water from the river in that section had hoped to complete the little effort that the government had been had left, but the fire turned up, consuming a once beloved and beautiful city and for three days more the burned and fire-ridden buildings the terrible conflagration. It had turned up to a final, destruction of the city where it was divided by a broad river, and there it was finally halted, its way after the battle the desolate waste straight through the heart of the city remained a place fit more to the most heroic and effective work of the whole capability of the war.

After three days battle six men did this, and when their experience told them that the remainder of the city was equally for the first time, they started out, and they did so, and they had come, were ordered to have a one dreadful three men. They finally moved the advance of the fear of conflict, and the critical line to the river, leaving the river to spread except along the river bank in the critical line to the river.

[illegible]

The U.S. government has extracted the heart of the Chinese nation and hundreds of thousands of the poorest peasants are victims, much of the saved area is being used for the benefit of the rich people. The people are being sold to the world to work and the nation has no money to immediately aid, though this was hard to do, as the money was very much greater than even the percentage of the world's population. The people of the world could indicate.

It is, naturally for all, that in saving the population not counting those engaged in battle within the city, the loss of life was considerably small, compared with the awful extent of the frightful disasters, and with the records of other cities similarly overthrown during the same time in other actions.

other activities simultaneously. Over a period of six days, approximately 1000 persons who were instantly killed or who died of their injuries, it was impossible because of the confusion caused by the battle, the flight of the refugees, the time required to return to their homes and so forth, to really estimate completely a full and complete statement. However, we fear a hundred and fifty bodies had been recovered at the end of the second week after the battle or one could estimate how many lay buried under the ruins, to be discovered only as the work of excavation continued, and how many more had been utterly consumed by the raging flames and the use of their weapons.

The estimate of the probable loss of life ran up to 11,500 or more while the injured were greater or very numerous and dead. The great or number of the inhabitants escaped, fleeing to the unengaged portion of the Christian army, to other parks in the city, and to the ferries leading to the A. I. O. Open Area river, which met with little damage. 2-2-2 The loss of life however among the soldiers of both sides who fought desperately for three days in and out of the city had been immeasurable, the losses of both sides for every hour, covering that of Waterloo, and yet going without intermission day in and day out, and the number of wounded was frightful. Though at some points the enemy encroached in a portion of the Christian line they couldn't maintain possession of the city, and the battle thereore locally ceased elsewhere with mutual fury along the Christian lines. The losses determined columns with machine guns along the front. The christian generals were determined to hold the third day, and at last the christian generals were determined to retreat to retake their last positions, but a moment was to be lost, as it was also all important to reclaim the city of St. Pierre, and so by setting off the heart of the Glendallian army to show the glendallian armies all over the territory and through Silverina that not one of the christian armies had any idea whatever of giving up the cause despite the progress of the dimensions. The main force of christians had come off during the night under general Charles Brown, and Robert Brown, and Col Ronald A. Grund and also under general Pen. Counterforce of strong calibre was hastily massed and the glendallian position, and this moved forward, while general Brown divisions advanced to affect a location which it. With this latter force were general Harrington's regular troop division which had come off just the evening before. The troops as soon as it grew daylight moved forward to storm

The Glardullian position to the left of the city of St Etheldreda, and where there was a large and lengthy stone bridge across the stream. This led him into the fight, revealed to him not important in his results as the very very severe, therefore the Glardullian had lost all their way. For of battle, with of honor, assistance, all however had gone on with of being stopped but not in the side of battle was to turn hoped never to get again. To fill the Glardullian army as doomed in a sea of blood, however since the had held the city of St Etheldreda for three days, and had destroyed it by shell fire, and had reached a portion of the christian army the Glardullian armies under Tamerlane were confident of success. They seemed to be greatly a superior in force, they had been carefully drilled in the very christian and ever american (United States) system they were led by their best reliable officers and generals, and they had been pampered for years and indulged by their governments, and they too regarded themselves as being no less than fully equal to the christian in fighting quality if not a superior.

[illegible]

"Gertrude is married. Marry or Perish is a story in which the mother and daughter move up here with her mother, and the father is a very rich man. Do you believe it can be done."

"Well, no." "Dear old Pa," said Lancelotti, "let her go. I'll be there she-don't delay no time in making a man."

At 11:20 P.M. Dennis began moving, off to the right. The Christian band led by Greville moved up a few paces, and up some lines, and nothing unusual had occurred, though the darkness was at some locations was still in a general action, and some of the Christian soldiers were firing, and some from a light battle placed near a captured flag staff were firing away, that was the right. The main body of Calvinists cavalry had moved up and were now in the position assigned to them. The rifle fire of the Gendarmes had now ceased, and for the rest of the night all was still.

General Viviani army during the whole night apparently lay "basking in the calm warmth of the ~~the~~ darkest night ever seen. General Viviani army was the giant of Apollonian State military careers, and because of the frequency of its violent battles and its numerous victories it was known by one of the strangest and most known of all the christian armies the "Giant of the Glandelinians in pitched battle. No inoffensive christian armies of the smaller species, such as is sometimes frequently retreating instead of advancing, but a giant danger of its sort, a terror of Glandelinia. As well before it: us in the location of still burning St Etheldreda. Neither have one, or sometimes as it is also called a "current has suit as well as much as "Rift" the main part of the christian armies under this famous righteous Alexander the great and Joseph in one the army was up and ready on the morrow, and with the approach of day only to be in an all day whilst the battle was on again. The Glandelinians made a fierce effort to regain the lost position. The force of the foe came forward in an onslaught of astonishing violence. It this time carried the warning flag of its sort, showing it was the coming of the ended Nic-Hollesian Infantry supported by a huge division of Glandelians and an all day fire of severe internal pierce in fighting. Glandelinians had other Glandelinians, feared by even the mightiest christian generals. The Nic-Hollesian soldiers are one of the grimmest sort of brave demons of the Nic-Hollesian army. Only christian armies had always had a wholesome dread of them, for they a christian army has been destroyed by the attack of this monster of Glandelinian Nic-Hollesian troops, whose force of advance has enabled them even to pass through the stoutest christian line founded.

Christian line approached to the morning, the fire of the christian guns on the left of the morning have nearly been early a little, but the rest came on. The whole christian line in this territory was instantly attacked, but the attack by desperate defense beyond description was repulsed proving the christian troops to be invulnerable. It was the case a little later, when another great blue gray column of troops came crashing upon the slowly waving motion of all columns of Zimmermannian troops was attacking against the christian position. It was a dreadful assault this time and though it was a dozen times the bulk of the defenders, and a dozen times the force of the former assault, the assault merely glanced off the main christian position, and the christian fire of machine guns and artillery rose like a wave of fire against the assault. The assault was the flaming waves of a hurricane had swirled over and back from the position. The wave after, for a time had pushed a portion of the christian line apart, but the gap was restored after the foe harnessed a deadly counter attack, and the christian position seemed to be invulnerable. It seemed to him that the christian position was literally immune to even the largest and most fiercest of his assaults no matter how well supported the storming armies were. Once the christian troops were in position the fiercest wave of assaults had a single most desperate to make an impression upon them. He did not now him general livians army and himself himself was a mystery like to the enemy according to their knowledge of him was neither a conqueror, not even an Alligerman, Calverman, or Angellman Angellman, let he had the fighting qualities of an American General of the highest order. Though he seemed quiet as if he could not stand a line against the enemy fire of anger like that of a roaring lion, and Gertrude had concluded that she had seen a lion in action, Gertrude had ever retreated, whether he failed in his object or not. In this part the terrific battle had been fighting so fiercely with the burning of the city, and the enemy was equally as at Bern. General Vivians army was like a battle, with its back again in the end, yet invulnerable, and invulnerable. In many cases, however, along could tell of the events of the battle in proper detail. The enemy after a few more terrible calls to go to, and recover the positions had lost like a fearful artillery storm, and saw the of his battalions batteries fly in face of the return counter fire of the reinforcements. Headquarters are demolished by shells, and he had a face, slight, it seemed to be a soldier. Even there well showed that he had been a general in a general's uniform.

Over his shoulder of "off" and while the carnalistic positions seemed to appear and disappear from the back boards of the cart, and the brave, fighting, responsive, in league selves, and needed affairs, corresponding in the configuration of the city, general underline and his generals had been holding conversation, wondering how to plan to attack this Napoleon of the Caribbean. By the time the christian fire was actually heavy at all in the field this year, and he felt an overpowering urge to try and sort of and he could conceive of a defeat a good seized christian army with a much loss of life among his own armies, and therefore he decided to have a "christian" army under general leadership and for the rear of St. Elizabeth where a good vigorous flank attack might be made when any unsuspecting portion of his own troops christian army. At the same time he has been to sacrifice this portion of his troops army, but the abundant melting from the christian battles was doing so much damage that he was desperate, and already he had delayed the plan longer than a day.

At about the time that at one point the Christian troops were coming at his line as if a psychotic running amok had struck his lines like an insane bull, and was going through as if no resistance was there at all, he received a final assignment to delay his desperate plan no longer. Had he had these two dissensional commanders rode together for another short interval in scouting the treacherous scene of discord, and then general Hagedorn turned away as if in an answer to an irresistible impulse, and he had to order his whole command to follow him, he would have been successful in his purpose. He was not, but he would have, and he would have been able to do so, had he had these two dissensional commanders riding with him.

Straight aheadward, through the parklands where he and his divisions of troops held their course, his army bearing through the forest with the regularity of a vast machine and apparently as without getting nearer and nearer all the time. All that time the Glendellian army stopped for nothing going at the speed of a fast trot, sometimes at a walk and sometimes at double time.

Aspen or a Glendinning army could approach that city for days on end when occupation arose. Conservation is perhaps the best. Because of Glendinning Army existed no Glendinning war, because as it may be in their adversary has never existed an ounce of necessary strength. Hence it seemed on this occasion that incredible stories of heroics were in these fierce Zinner Christian soldiers. They soon guided by the Lord came within sight of the burning city to the north, and where the rear of General Benigne and General Percival A. Glendinning was.

This needed action, as the rear is as dangerous as the front when on guard, and all late food needed to move himself to immediate action. A sense of great peril to his army assailed him. He believed months must pass before General Vivian could be forced to move from this spot and leaving that the "what might happen. All of it was due to the shame of the war, and the Yats' personal animosity as shown marked on by some inner outrage, which neither victory nor defeat could scathe. He went seeking first to know the position of the Chinese army and then the Japanese. He was raised aloft by it. He was reaching for something in reality he was fearing about with his senses for the answer to how he was going to sustain a rear of an army which, however grand not a rear, but an army with two fronts, one front active the other inactive, but still active.

Presently, to plan, came and sent him home to his former position. He gave his various officers secret orders, and the army deployed into several columns, traveled on steadily, following what impulse, as can tell, as the night deepened the air in the direction of the battle a line of flames illuminated the vast stretches by coming something as if with five, as if were sudden silver shafts, light, darkness waxed and waned, until a flare of light was not only that the light came from the front, but from the right, and the light.

For planning armies however, regardless of their size are a different type of organization, their will through words or plans alike.

Chandellinian availed me to go out to assist in the fear of a christian position though mightier in a. There are ever in fear of Concentinian cavity and the Abymnifilian Winkles, and other dangerous christian cavity that move and about a long, hard, ve. And if any proof of this were needed it was furnished the next fifteen minutes, as the firing was beginning to extend along broader proportions. Old General Hategod caught sight of an immense squadron of the fiercest Winkle Abymnifilian dragons that ever was around guarding the seat of a christian and Hategod succeeded in striking his blow, there would have been a terrible time for all of Geratide band as they were in the danger zone. Speeding through a high grassy plain as if they were a terrible long was a muscular and yellowish high almost shaped Cardinal like face, their long trailing forest of terrible horns held forward toward the air, they came forward at a thundering gallop that shook the ground, these fierce Winkles which are the terror of the Abymnifilian Winkles. The black and white and before them, no how can infantry. Seventeen hundred thousand in number, they were"urtering the fear of the christian. How much to for many can there.

...the left 1. He stepped down on old General Hategodu's army with a thundering
...a fierce fighting, light...2.

Some of the Glandelinian columns seemed to lose all sense in their terrible proxy of fury and sometimes when lunging straight through the tangle of the christian columns instead of recoiling as was hoped for and expected, sometimes there was so much smoke from the battle that everything was lost to sight.

By this time however general Tamerline believed he had enough of this sort of experience. Obeying his own impulsive instinct he launched another force of troops forward to reach the christian line before it was too late. While he did not ride on the return to his own part of the command to have a council with his general officers. He realized his army was not to escape from this battle haunted again how without a notion of his own to remember long that day.
 It was his first battle in the war, and it was a terrible one. As he sped onward, he saw a new scene close up around the horizon of battle.

The advancing Glandelinian reinforcements was a suddenly barred by the troops of the terrible christian Napoleon under the dreaded Charles Brown, who to the Glandelinians had been always an abiding nightmare, when all was said and done of all the fearsome forms of christian divisions that was under the leadership of general Vivian.

He was forging swiftly along through a forest of trees at first unseen by the appalling Glandelinians, and he hurled his troops with frightful fury upon the Glandelinians in front and rear. The Glandelinian column or wave was bent double, and swung apart by the violence of the impact and seemed twisted as it fought this new peril with the utmost desperate valor and courage, but another division of christian troops under general Ben Logan appeared suddenly and gradually joined that of general Charles Brown. The Glandelinians realized they were in the grip, and at grips with two of general Vivian's most desperate fighting generals ever seen. Gloriously, inexorably they were hurled backwards by the triple impact. General Tamerline knew many of the christian generals, having heard heard and read so much about them, he had hunting the christian armies who had not dared to oppose him. But none of these was anything compared to this "Monster in purple". Frenzied as were the struggles of the Glandelinians opposed to this new onset of Charles Brown and Ben Logan, they availed them nothing. Bayonet met bayonet from nearly every man fronting each other in a hand to hand conflict too terrible to even exaggerate and which brought out dreadful slaughter on both sides, but trying in vain to cut through the tough wall of Angellians the Glandelinians before the pressure was driven to the rear and over the position.

Saying to himself "My luck has not yet run out" general Tamerline sent a messenger to call to the general of one of the big separate part of his army to come to his assistance as soon as possible and to communicate the news of his danger to the others so they would all sooner or later combine against general Vivian. But as the Angellian army was, Tamerline felt sure it was not of the largest, and his army was therefore incapable without Hansons help of engulfing the whole Glandelinian army, neither would all its titanic strength avail him against the adamant strength and desperation of the Glandelinian column.

As a result Tamerline threw in others of his reserve divisions, and as a result now general Vivian's army was swept by an assault of the most terrible fury and savagery he himself had ever witnessed. Furious with rage, and with a desperate defiant staring them in the face before aid could come to them the Glandelinians rushed pell-mell upon the christian position, with all the crushing force of all their available numbers but the christians still moved forward, hurling everything onward to ruin, and devastation. Because of the insane noise of the battle "maybe the infernal regions was silent compared to this" small creatures fled to safety from far distant woods, deers, too, wolves, bears wild cats, and small burrowing animals.

All of the resistance of the Glandelinians availed them nothing. Less than nothing for the pressure of the christian side was irresistible.
 General Ben Logan was wounded, but retained command and urged on his men.
 For general Tamerline he might as well have been a mud turtle and drawn in his head and flippers within his shell and prepared to hide himself for safety. From the outset it was plain to him that the mightiest struggle of his army in this vicinity was as nothing against this righteous "Purple Monster", whose troops had seemingly the strength and fury of St. Michaels Host against Satan and his followers.

His own hope was that his troops would hold out until general Vivian tired of the game, or until the time of night would stop the horrid commotion.....
 But once general Vivian has fastened upon anything only death for his army, or doomday can cause him to let go, so that was why always general Vivian and his brother were called "Abbeinnia's two big Devilfishes, with armies for sucker arms."

All Glandelinian Glandelinian troops finally fell back to all their positions as fast as they could, and the battle began to die down. General Vivian's army for a time began to "cease its wild" tantrums and had fallen quieter, more behaving, deadly quiet as it seemed as if exhausted. But two of his columns were in possession of the Glandelinian positions, and one was still like a tentacle wrapped inexorably around a portion of the Glandelinian encampment a mile off from burning St. Michael's. General Vivian no doubt expected the Glandelinian army to break or disintegrate in time, nevertheless his embrace of the city, and camp, never relaxed an instant and he was seeing troops from another location to recapture the city. It was now ten o'clock in the morning. Meantime he was shelling the positions from other sources, his "Night Riders" hunting through the teeming forest region and capturing other scouting parties of the foe. Thus the long hours of the bloody morning had passed, and each of these hours had been taking a terrible toll from the foe.

Ordinarily as had been said Tamerlane could remain in an action a long, long time, but this tremendous assault of the Christians and its pressure, combined with the struggle it had put up against it, was a different matter. The endurance of this portion of the Glandelinian army had been taxed to the utmost, for hours the army had been dwindling by thousands per minute. Already in exhaustion he had drawn heavily upon his final resources, and even if something did not turn up when the conflict was renewed the Glandelinian army would pay the utmost price for its rashness, for starting a battle without waiting for a union of the other section. It was then when the end was but a matter of hours away that help arrived for Tamerlane in a strange and unexpected form.

The Christians were now rushing on to renew the onset. In that time a new and strong body of Glandelinian troops under general Stanislaw came up to restore the shattered gray line. To the Christian generals it was but another welcome Titbit. The assaulting wave struck with a violence as if they were colliding foot ball players, and it was apparent the Glandelinians would be compelled to close with them. Just as the army was thrusting through, a startling thing occurred. At the last moment the Glandelinians generated all their strange power into one violent counter charge. There was a blinding flash of rifles many miles long on both sides simultaneously that illumined the clouds of battle as if they were lightning sheets, and during the closing of the two sides the Christian wave of assault was rent and torn almost to pieces. Next moment the Christian wave was torn and mutilated amid clouds of dust and smoke.

Out of the turmoil, out of the very jaws of this monster, the Glandelinians rushed, and behind the first fighting column appeared another column of the speedily arriving new troops, tearing through the Christian columns terrible convulsions. As this occurred the Christian soldiers released a most terrific fire of rifles and rifled machine guns the noise of which hid them from view.

Now with the Glandelinians again the assailants the din became fiercer and fiercer, and the whole seemed to be an animated picture of an array of immense numbers of embodied spirits conjured up by a supernatural power. It indeed was a great field of bloody battle, where now the Christians and the Glandelinians were engaged in the deadliest conflict. They closed again, and there was the clash of swords, the ring of bayonet against bayonet, the tumult of shots at close range, the tramp of steeds, the blazes of bugles, and the storm of distant but thousands of cannon rolling as if they were that many drums. Finally the Christians began to give way before the foe, the Glandelinian troops with shouts of "See, they're beaten at last, hurrah, at them, give them all the fight they want" pressed upon them, and put the Christian assailants finally to a rout. The standard of the Cross, was captured and recaptured thirty times, the banner of Abbleanna was trodden under foot, only to be recaptured and re-erected, the air resounded with shouts of triumph triumph from countless throats of the Glandelinian soldiers, with yells of fury, blasphemous and terrible obscene words, and with groans of an immeasurable number of dying men.

In the midst the flying troops could be seen an officer who was mounted on a white steed. In the confusion of the flight, the soldier was shot and fell, and was no longer to be seen and the horse galloped wildly through the field of battle without a rider. General Hindermine stayed to watch no more but rushed into the ill fated field follow followed by his apprehensive attendants to restore order if possible. Some of the columns were rallied and faced the yelling foe, but others whole regiments fled through a glen, and to cover their retreat set all the trees on fire. A gigantic figure on horse with a whirling mass appeared, but he felt with a shot in the heart. As the retreat continued several of the soldiers found two officers who were Christian generals lying dead near a lane as though they had been crushed by a mighty blow. An eruption as if from a volcano occurred carrying a tornado of death and destruction in all directions by its force. Shells were exploding everywhere and the sky was dark with smoke. It seemed as if all nature was in a wild uproar. The heavens were darkened by heavy clouds from bursting shells, and from the burning of the city, and other confagration. A loud burst of thunder rent the air from high explosives, and every time an explosion occurred earth was deluged with debris and rattling stones.

Seeing the repulse of his army general Vivian ordered that the heaviest batteries should be brought into position at once, for he and his officers were dismayed by the tremendous tumult and the mingled shouts and groans that continued to prevail without the battlefield. General Vivian hastened to the front, though he was pelted by a tempest of debris hurled about him by distant explosions. A frightful eruption with a crazy detonation banged carelessly close to him about a hundred yards away, and his horse fell mortally wounded and six of his follower officers died right there, but he escaped unhurt. The distant hills shook and echoed with the thunder of cannons, explosions, roar of rifle fire, and yells of combatants, trees were uprooted and blown down, and the hurricane noise of distant yelling was beyond description. It was more like a fierce storm than a battle. It seemed to the slightly frightened courtiers of the general as if phantom legions of hell had issued forth and mingled with some frightful supernatural hosts for amidst the claps of salvos of shell thunders, the drum drum roar of so many cannons the sea wave noise of firing, and the howling of the soldiers the sounds of drums, the shouts of reinforcements and the rush of steeds and men continued, and the retreat continued. Thus threatened to be beaten by this tempest of Glandelinian onset, and overwhelmed with horror as to the result general Vivian and his staff, arrived to the nearer front, and clattering across the bridge of the stream near Vantum, sent orders for his other divisions to hurry to arrest the confusion, not far off a big building had burst into flames as though it had been built of rosin and the flames catching than many thousands of trees mounted into the air with a brilliancy more dazzling than the sun. The confusion was gradually arrested, and the cannons that were brought on, in ever increasing numbers. General Vivian massed his iron strength of the army into position, and now began to hold the exultant foe at bay.

In the meantime because of the wildness of the conflict the Glandelinians would force of Child scouts were improvised and trailed, surrounded by the enemy and had to fight for their very lives. They were assigned at the station assigned to them, and the roar of battle seemed to be all around, the rifle fire in the small gardens and glen and grove on ground near their position being very heavy to the extreme, and a large body of the Glandelinian soldiery was seen extending into the plain with the intention of pushing forward on the right of the rise of ground, while backgrounded against the sky horizon momentary was a long line of terrific eruptions that rolled like the loudest crashing thunder and shook the very ground.

They were close to one of these awful lines of battle as previously mentioned, and they saw one of the generals ride up to his under officer Andy and say: "You will charge the Glandelinians at once, but be on your guard, as it's the fierce Mc-Hollisterian, and Elmsommanian you'll be contending with."

With a cheer the whole line of troops before the very view of the boy and girl scouts dashed forward. Evidently the way they acted it was the moment they had longed for, and the fury with which they made the onset was so seemed too much for the Glandelinians confronting them, who although enormously superior in numbers at this section, halted and opened fire before the Christian assailant reached them, and then recoiled slowly with the Christian soldiers mixed fiercely with them in a confused mass of desperately desperate struggle men so that the contest was a fierce at this spot as at any hand to hand fighting witnessed along a twenty mile front simultaneously of the battle of the World War. The Glandelinians at this spot recoiled to their positions, and the Glandelinian artillery opened a heavier fire, forcing the attackers to fall back. The losses of this big brigade was not yet found out, but among the great mass of the injured was lieutenant general Jullen, a most gallant young chief officer of general Hindermine's staff, about a mere lad, but a general and beloved favorite alive with all general and men. He was hit by the fragment of a bang, and his horse was hopelessly from the first, but he kept up his spirits to the last, and said with a smile to some of the boy and girl scouts who came to bid him a sad farewell: "Well dear brave children I go to see my God."

Indeed such was the spirit which animated every officer and man in this tremendous battle of St Etheldreda, and it is no wonder that for those four days of exceedingly fierce fighting, they were able to crush the enemy with fearful assaults, and repulse the fiercest onsets of the ever increasing enemy. The boy and girl scouts surrounded by this insane battle surely now needed protection from the fire of the enemy. At five, ten and eleven o'clock that frightful morning they had witnessed more fiercer onsets of the enemy in counter charging the assailing Christians than they ever had witnessed before.

Their main excitement seemed to have come when general Vivian's assault had been so frightfully repulsed at about two in the afternoon. During the repulse and all the frightful clamour clamorous scene as written before, a large force of the exultant counter charging Glandelinians, under general Child guided only and along moved forward quietly, and worked their way round to the left of general Meltonia Greatheart's troop or line, and came forward and made a most furious overwhelming assault on the four divisions of general Lord Bowen's Seventy Fifth who were holding the front of the Thirtieth Battery. If such a number for superstition was supposed to be called unluckily, it surely was for the assailant troop at this section. Before the mad Christian fire, three whole lines went down into slain within a few minutes, the main Glandelinian wave of attack was shattered and torn asunder, and the firing was simply crazy. On the Christian side general Curran Truller was shot dead, and two of his staff officers also generals were mortally wounded and ten others disabled. The Glandelinians though their whole wave of assault was torn and mangled pressed the attack to utmost victory and carried the breastworks, but the first line in rushing on top went down simultaneously into dead and wounded, and three of their generals were slain with them and twenty wounded. The Glandelinians pressed on and carried themselves over a mile of ground, and to the Christian line here a great disaster threatened. General Meltonia's army itself was in position not far from this scene, and general Jack Evans too and everyone was on their feet at the sound of the frightful discord.

"Forward to the front shouted Evans. We must restore the line of battle at all costs."

In less than fifteen minutes the men fell into long lines and in less than two minutes from the sound of the first crash the whole in a long wave were dashing up the slight ascent to the position where the tremendous blind fury and sound of the battle told them the Seventy Fifth of Meltonia's main division with Robert Bowen now also wounded were hard pressed...

"Remain in your line formation" was the command sounded down the line of counter advance. "Now get ready for a charge. go right at them hammer and tongs."

Don't fire a shot till you are within five paces, then give them the bayonet and retain your other munitions in case you too are pressed. Meldonia will come to our aid soon. If we are pressed out of this location it's all up with Gertrude's little band of heroes and heroines. Hurrah for God and Abbleannia."

With a thundering cheer that reverberated the air the gallant but most monstrous christian column of Winkle Abyssinilian Infantry rallied the other line and the whole at once fell and closed upon the victorious Glandolinian army many of whom had carried even the hehristian battery, and captured a portion of the camp, and was hell bent with fury toward the band of girl and boy scouts toward which the soldiers had been compelled to retreat. The troops were then defending themselves with utmost desperation when the help arrived. Still the Glandolinians pressed on, and would have swept this portion of Evans' army aside, had not the main body came up with the sight of Meldonia's troop coming at double time in the distance. Then Meldonia's batteries let loose a frenzy of shell fire, and that fell upon the Abyssinians in a barrage and threatened the whole with annihilation. Struck with terror and surprise at this sudden counter attack, and the violence of it from Evans' column especially with their all precautions to the winds, and by the shower of shells which torn their main line to smithereens, the enemy finally wavered and broke at the fierce onslaught, while the Seventy Fifth raised a shout of joy that was deafening, at the arrival of the new aid, too the offensive, swept before them the mighty Glandolinian storm, who nevertheless because of so many in numbers were compelled to retire slowly fighting madly all the way. The christians recaptured their battery, and all the whole line drove the insurgents astounded and panic stricken at the fierceness of the counter assault pell-mell before them and followed clean up to their own position, and even captured that.

Evans' troops had arrived just in time, for general Gales who commanded at this section, and nearly half his force had fallen before general Evans came to his aid. From the terrible sound, it was evident the counter assault of the enemy elsewhere was continued with ever increasing force and fury, each leader of the Glandolinians being equally as desperate as that of the christian side. Desperately the whole portion of the christian army cut off from the main body had to fight most cruelly and savagely to maintain their position, and the losses were becoming so serious, the numbers of the assailants so large, so rapidly increasing that it was clear to all that the most prodigious efforts would be necessary to enable them to hold on until the others of general Vivians army arrived, and that all idea of an early recapture of the still burning city of St Etheldreda must be abandoned.

For the time being general Meldonia's Greatheart's army had had no share in these desperate struggles, and now after the Glandolinian assault upon general Robert Bowne Bowen was repulsed Evans ordered general Greatheart to try and launch a terrific assault upon the Glandolinian rear immediately in front of general Bowne's line. Besides a note had been brought in by a courier to the effect that several Glandolinian divisions had been annihilated leaving a gap in the assaulting wave and if the rear assault would be successful, the gap could not be closed and calamity would befall the assailants. The instructions given to general Greatheart were that he was to crush Roberts' assailants, and that he was then to press on toward Vantura. Communications had ceased with general Great Love the officer in command of the battle line near there but it could not be found out whether he was actually besieged or whether it was merely a severance of the telephone and telegraph wire by the battle. If he could join with general Great Love he was to do so, if not he was to try and push on to form a part of the force which general Curran was moving forward with to restore the line at St Etheldreda. It would be an hours perilous march, but the troops were admirably armed and equipped, and as they would have the choice of routes open to them, and could and would travel fast, it was thought that the flank attack could be made upon Roberts' enemies in good time and with good success and their aid would be valuable to either general Great Love or Glide quibble, and Ben Ben Logan or to general Daniel Jones who had reported that he was hard pressed.....2

The battle elsewhere was raving madly when this big division started. It was in a blind fury during their aid to general Robert Bowne before they had profited by their intercession on time, and now they got rid of every access of ammunition that would make a noise. The water bottles of all the soldiers were encased in flannel. Nothing save the soft sounds of the marching feet, was to be heard as they advanced, and even those were muffled by the deep dry dust that lay on the road. Each man moreover more over carried extra weapons for precautionary measures. Under the guidance of two scouts, the troops made their way round the region without the slightest adventure. The country was forested, and the burning villages sparsely scattered. This troop before having arrived at general Vivians had always marched by night, and rested by day in the forests at a short distance from the main road. Upon a long march in this way before them it would have been impossible to maintain secrecy by marching by day. Food for men and the horses, by their officers was requisitioned and this could only be obtained in christian villages. The head men of the villages and towns willingly provided provender for the horses of officers while flour, eggs, and fowls were forthcoming in sufficient quantities for the men. The march for the rear of the Glandolinian army assailing general Robert Bowne was as successful as expected, and crossing a small stream by two bridges they halted to rest about two miles from the Glandolinian position which was the immediate object of their movement. They were now in for stirring fighting and they had since crossing the stream avoided being seen as much as possible, for they didn't want to chance being surprised themselves. The Glandolinian position was strongly guarded. The Glandolinians here are full of war and used to arms, and without surprise assaults even a small regiment of the Glandolinians could not be carried without considerable loss. They had not however rested many minutes when one of the scouts came to report that their movement had been observed by general Tamerline himself, and that the Glandolinian rear was being placed on its guard. This indeed was the fact. The Glandolinian commanders had at once started measures for defense. The first grand division was to defend the front of their rear position with their massed artillery against an assault. The second division was to move round to the extreme end of the woods, were to get into concentration there, and when the christians began to waver before the rifle and artillery fire were to sweep round and double in their rear. General Painter himself was in charge of the first grand division, and general Stubble posted his line of men behind a bank with a long hedge at short distance in front of seven pine trees. Then each Glandolinian soldier being acquainted with his place and position, they fell back out of the scorching radiating heat of big fires started much by the battle further to the front, and waited....

In half an hour the Angelinian forces were seen coming forward, two or three million strong and with battle tattered banners. The "Avengers" as the Glandolinians here called themselves, fell into position behind the long hedge and quietly awaited the assault. The christians first opened a heavy fire at long distance.

"Never with only a few shots or two, occasionally" their commanders had ordered "as they will then aim their assault at the hedge then at the position. We don't want our main rear position discovered until we fall back to the supports or all is lost."

Slowly and steadily the rifles shot out their death dealing bullets in answer to the heavy fire opened on the hedge position, and as almost every man of this Glandolinian troop was a sportsman and a good shot, very few shots were wasted. The Angelinians cheered more and more loudly and advanced fiercely. When they were within three hundred yards of the hedge the Glandolinian commanders gave the word!!!

"Fire fast, but don't throw away a shot. Let the machine guns play on them at short range."

Antonished at the accurate accuracy and deadliness of the fire which was poured upon them by their still invisible foes, the Angelinians however though stopping their swift advance did not waver. Their leaders were shouting loudly, and exposed themselves bravely in front, and called them on, as slowly and yet with heavy loss the main body arrived to within fifty yards of the hedge, and despite their loss in ever increasing numbers. It was evident to the Glandolinians in front of the hedge that to hold the position would be a great miracle. Those in front were falling now so fast before the very fire of the purple coated assailants and before their bayoneted bayonets, that no efforts of their leaders could get them to maintain the position any longer, and already a retrograde movement had begun, when there was a yell of fear, as another long line of troops in purple, hitherto unnoticed, charged furiously down upon their rear.

"Empty your rifles and then to the rear, for the protection of the battery" shouted their generals and other officers, and the Glandolinians retreated toward their main position. Some bodies of the Glandolinians were already in full flight, and a squadron of christian cavalry dashing through them, were cutting them down, or emptying their carbines and revolvers among them.

"Run for the positions. Run for the positions" their officers cried, "hurry" at full speed the retreating Glandolinians dashed across an small open plain to their position, just as a new body of christians were arriving. Great near sure was doing his bit. The Glandolinians gave a yell as this fresh wave of infantry fell upon them, and only half the number got over and behind the shelter of their position. They tried to maintain this position but three or four regiments scattered again in flight. The christian cavalry and infantry dashed down over the position, and were in possession.

"We have advanced so far successfully, and if we can hold it for the rest of the day it'll be our headquarters till to-morrow" general Meldonia's Greatheart said, as the waves of troops were now in possession. "We have secured an abundance of food for horse and man, and we will press on now and try to drive the whole line into dislocation, so the assailants in front will be caught between two fires."

"Well your Excellency what do you thin now of the situation?" one of the senior generals asked, as night began to fall, and the situation on both sides was about the same and everything had quieted down. The best house in the captured territory had been set aside for general Vivian, the army being on the rest. Many men had been placed on sentry duties and the whole region had now assumed as quiet an aspect as if the sounds of war had never been heard in the land, save for the groans of wounded and dying left out on the battle field. It was night and all was still. Life and animation. Thousands of great campfires blazed where the men were frying their suppers, others had lit their pipes of old cigarettes and chatted round the fires, while general Vivian and his staff sat together in their headquarters and started to discuss the best course to be pursued on the morrow.

"The situation is peculiar, and seems rather bad for both sides Charles."

100-443887-100

and negotiation among the foe.

The Glandelinian infantry fire however continued so fiercely and steadily that the christian pumors of another battery whose loading was not yet complete were forced to retreat from the guns or be annihilated. Six shells hit the wall and tore ragged breaches six feet in length.

"That has unraveled the christian dogs for the present," General Smith said. "I expect they'll do nothing more now for a few minutes. As they're coming on to charge, we will give them another good volley, this time a stronger one." Artillery and rifles again roared and were repeated in another terrible crash, but the assaulting column came surging up to the very foot of the stone wall, and closed with the Glandelinians in a titanic hand to hand contest until the wild confusion prevailed, especially among the Glandelinian horse and artillery men who were now trying to drag the guns out of reach of capture. After ten minutes of this blood curdling horror, the assailants mowed themselves in a stronger wave and would have pushed over the wall, had not General Cranter who saw the confusion at a distance sent a new force and the attackers were soon thrown backwards and hurled back to the rise of ground with great loss.

The Glandelinian artillery again opened to hasten the repulse, and then during the short lull one who survived was signalled to lie down and keep cool till the "Christian Dogs" made another assault.

Even at this time another train of horses, hundreds of them with more guns came from the direction of Vantum and proceeded to a extra position to about a mile from the Glandelinian position, and with the train came an immense wave of the first division of the christian infantry. There the panic filled horses of the first division had gathered after the stampede, and presently a great tent was raised in the rear of the christian position.

"Those christian dogs are going to do it in fine style," General Richard Slater laughed to his aide-de-camp. "Indeed I shouldn't mind some nice local cream at present, if that Federal general has got any to spare."

"Look General Richard, there is a strong movement, they are getting the position on that large knoll a little to the west, and a hundred yards or so in front of their line of horses. I wonder what they're intending to do!" General Richard took the field glass which his aide-de-camp handed to him.

"Yes we shall be under severe fire presently, but I'm sure they won't destroy our position this morning at that distance."

Two hundred more guns from this new position opened a thundering fire upon the Glandelinian position, and to make it worst a storm of shrapnell tore the air overhead with their terrible "Shrap--Shrap--Shrap" noise raining down deadly fragments, while bombs tore the ground up into perfect eruptions in front of the position, or tore up with heavy booms against the wall, dealing death and destruction immeasurable, while high explosives in so instances crashed through the rear positions. The Glandelinian artillery however replied very effectively also, and after an hour's firing the christian artillery grew more intense, as new batteries came into position and finally grew so terrible that it was a curtain fire upon the grounds in front of the position, and believe me everybody remained lying as low as their bodies could hug the ground while a cloud of debris at times swept across the wall threatening annihilation to all exposed to it. It was at this spot alone an artillery fire ten times as severe as that of the big cannon duel at Gettysburg, as ten times that number of artillery were in action. The results of the terrible cannon fire indeed was tremendous.

Half an hour later or so there was a severe movement on the part of the christians again, half of the number of cannons being pushed forward to a point about a thousand yards or so from the Glandelinian position while the hundred others were taken round and placed along the road at about the same distance, so as to command the angle of the position and give the enemy a severe cross fire across fire. Again the tremendous cannon fire along the christian line was renewed and with redoubled vigor, and this time with great effect. Again the troops were called to the other positions, and the greater portion of them armed not with Glandelinian government rifles but with sporting military and hunting rifles of tremendously long range, short barreled as to be as good as carbines upon the christians the fiercest rifle fire ever on record during a battle before. Ten of the best armed men were told off against each cannon of the battery, and the slow steady fire, was very effective, for with the field glasses men could be seen to fall with unusual frequency at the guns, but the christians must nevertheless have had very str steady nerve for the cannon fire was not at all hurried, and though it seemed wider in fury and more numerous in reports as to sound as a continuous roll of drums as low as cannon the fire was more accurate than it had hitherto been, and the shells were aimed more at these rifle men than at the position, and scores were slain or maimed by them every time for a cannon report.

The main line of the Glandelinian infantry with the exception of ten regiments told off for special duty, were in position at the trench behind the stone wall to stop if possible the next assault of the christian troops whenever now creeping daringly and with apparent dare devil fury and bravado to within a short distance, and started up a rolling rifle fire of great intensity and fury upon the portion of the Glandelinian position. For that time however the charge didn't come as expected, but during the artillery storm about five hundred of the men mostly military engineers were removed from the Glandelinian position, and set to reform a position four feet high, and to have half the troops withdrawn from the stone wall which was being gradually demolished by the christian artillery fire. Two or three cent houses had been demolished rapidly by explosions, and great masses of stone were blown up. A rough earth position was being rapidly constructed, while a long trench five or six feet deep, eight feet wide, and as long as the the position was simultaneously dug, in front and under cover of the fire of the more vigorous of the Glandelinian batteries. During the height of the assault artillery storm, and just as the trench was finished, an unlucky shell struck an early constructed wooden barricade of the position, and without exploding fell upon a munition "Quint" behind the artillery, and there was a most terrific explosion, followed by a series of tremendous outbursts of volcanic eruptions of explosions that tore everything before it, cut the forest aflame near by, and disabled twenty five big cannons, and wiped out six regiments of men, sixteen hundred to each regiment. One great big tree fell only before the concussion though some distance off, dragging down half a dozen with it, and adding to the loss of life and the number of wounded.

A distant yell of surprise and triumph came through the air, as also the wall was terribly breached by a volley of shells simultaneously.

The rate of the fall also fell, dragging the two posts with it. It fell partly across the narrowest part of the position.

"Hey you lads!" cried one of the lieutenants amid the confusion "push them back if you can a little bit! if not knock the part over the ditch to pieces, if it's half smashed already."

It was however easier to demolish the gate and knock it already splintered with shot to pieces than remove it.

Then in the meantime one of the generals summoned his lieutenant, General Rose.

"General Rose to it that as many of your men as can, will fetch what is left of the munitions of that exploded 'cant' put it all in the trench, with a long train. You attend to the train, and when I give the signal you see to it that it is fired. Have your men also bring up or form many big cans or canteens and pots of boiling water which is still boiling in the big boiling pots to the highest position. Have general Kent Stephen sent forth one million three hundred and thirty three thousand of his troops to hold the inner position, but if any of you hear our superiors loud shrill whistle, every reserve is to go into position at a run. Three million men will man the outer wall. Pushing behind those immediately assaulting. The remaining reserves will fire from the upper positions as long as possible and will then form at the positions and defend them to the last. I've got word hammering in sending us heavy reinforcements and it'll be here at any moment. I'm positive as hard as we fight, the enemy will push over the stone wall this time and hurl themselves upon our second position and therefore those in the upper position when the enemy tear our line up and come within their range will lay down his rifle and while the short range machine guns are busy will attend to the boiling water. Let them each have a small pot as a ladle. But let them pour the water on those pressing toward the second line of positions, not those who have reached it in advance. Those are the affair of our infantry and machine guns."

In half an hour's time each division of troops was at its respective post, and a withering fire of rifles and artillery from every section of the line of battle along the extensive front wall upended fearfully upon the onrushing tidal wave of purple coated soldiers moving down whole masses. However the left of it sort of swung forward as if it would have been an opening gate formed of human beings, and came swarming toward that section of the position with the wildest fury. The effect on the assailants here was very severe, the fire mowing them down many thousands strong, for indeed every volley told, but the Glandelinians are unusually courageous probably because they are so unusually good, and the rush toward the position continued.

They were however also covered by their own artillery fire, which told fearfully on the desperate defenders bringing them down like the grass before the tornado. Yet as fast as they themselves fell more were in their places but it was the same along the assailing line. Fast as those in front fell the gaps were imperceptible in the swarming wave, and getting within range the survivors opened a sudden fire with a noise like a tremendous explosion of a heavenly planet, and the foremost of the whole teeming line of Glandelinians fell dead or wounded. Major general Watson Turner Glandelinians were forced to recall from the angle of works near Warrens Creek and at this moment while trying to rally them the general fell mortally wounded.

Another portion of his line was drawn up behind the main ditch, and as the head of the assaulting column moved up toward the position in an extensive heavy line volley after volley rang over many miles long simultaneously and not only swept away great platoons of soldiers but even many of the christian leaders. The charge of the christians was about eighteen times as fierce as the whole battle of Waterloo in this space at this one time. However despite the dreadful losses they inflicted upon the Glandelinian assailants it was apparent it was impossible to hold the long stone wall, despite despite even the support of their many machine guns which had been action like playing the stream with the hose as long as the guns would permit without getting too hot, and therefore when the dense wave arrived within thirty thirty yards of the wall, the signal to fall back was given, and a retreat was made until the whole defeated line swarmed into position behind the breastwork....

On and on with a hurricane storm of the wildest shouts of defiance and derision came the christian assailants, and it happened as was not expected, the storming wave of men must have been conscious of the deep trench, but although they all leaped it yet it was soon full with those who had fallen before the terrific Glandelinian fire, but yet the survivors returning the fire swept on without even being checked in the least. The defenders finally to make it worse for the situation ran out of ammunition for their rifles, and had to resort to their revolvers and bayonets. The artillery too grew too hot to be so continuously discharged and had to cease, even many of the light machine guns, and therefore hand grenades had to be resorted to and the boiling water and pipes and bayonets and sabres and daggers. The Glandelinians now were divided into two long lines who were alternately to take places in front and fire, while those behind loaded their revolvers. The din now, as the first line of position was covered by the onrushing assault, was prodigious beyond description, the sharp incessant roar of countless revolvers, the sound of rifles for those who still had ammunition, the strange droning whirl of many machine guns, the roll of musketry from the angles position, the bells of the enemy, the cries of the assailants, the shrieks which often arose outside the second position as the men in the one high up scattered the boiling water broadcast upon them formed a chaos, while was added the ring of bayonet against bayonet or the thudding sound as a clubbed rifle met. With the fury and despair of cornered wild beasts, the Christian soldiers fought striving to get over the long stone wall which so unexpectedly barred their way, but their very numbers being reduced so heavily, the increasing numbers of the Glandelinian soldiers, and the pressure from behind hampered their efforts.

The machine guns still in operation swept them out of existence by hundreds per discharge, and if many men in the front line of defenders had emptied his revolver or rifle, before the one behind him had reloaded, and the assailants were too near to for the use of hand grenades, they held their position with the bayonet and with tear gas bombs and so forth.

"The wall's giving way from the pressure," came the cry among many of the Glandelinians, and then was heard the shrill sound of the generals' whistles high and loud above the uproar. A minute later the whole front of the stone wall tottered and fell. Then came the signal for the blast, and those who were assigned to do so fired the train. There was another thundering explosion as fierce as there had been along the Glandelinians before when the "coat" blew up, there was a cloud of fragments, fragmentary bodies and whole bodies by many hundreds through the air, a fearful eruption as if a volcano exploded from beneath the ground, a yell of anger, surprise and dismay from the Christians, and then as though those already rushing triumphantly through the breach stood paralyzed with amazement and surprise, the Glandelinian soldiers fell upon them with the bayonet and the abra sabre, the men from the other positions came rushing up eager to also be in the fray, but all this, and the renewed sweeping machine gun fire, tear gas bombs, stink bombs, tumult of bayonets, hand grenades, and counter pressure, and how more great explosions could not check the wild Christian advance, and the enemy inside the first line of breastworks were either cut down, bayoneted, shot or driven across and from it.

The strong wedge of Glandelinians behind, already shen on by the fury of the assault and the murderous counter fire that the forces now in possession of the stone walls set up from the captured artillery, and from their rifles, while they almost were unable to move from the jam of panic-stricken refugees in front, had recoiled slowly from the second line of breastworks. The Glandelinians were terror-stricken because of other great explosions among them, and the sight of even the handful of survivors in front flying from the captured positions, and the Christians advanced pell-mell after them completed the effect. Their generals saw to say it that way that apparently all "Hell" couldn't stop those wild "Christian dogs." One witness of this awful scene compared it to the dog chasing the cat, and Glandelinia was the cat. With yell and rage and discomfiture, each regiment of men more exposed appalled at the frightful slaughter among their comrades turned and fled, while the defenders facing Vantura hum also recoiled and the whole line of battle was completely rolled up, and cut to pieces and General Smith was badly wounded, and captured, and with six of his lieutenants.

The Christians however could not pursue too far, as there was danger of being too far advanced without the support of the main body. "Thank God and His Blessed Mother it is all over for the moment and we've won in the face of all obstacles," Major General Paul Marcus said. "It sure has been terribly hot while it lasted. Have we any casualties among our officers or generals?"

No one could answer just then, there was no time for any roll to be called, though later it was found that the Christian side though having suffered immeasurable loss in privates escaped marvellously in the loss of officers, compared to that of the enemy. One young general had been cut through the head by the fragment of a shrapnell shell. Thirteen other officers, some generals were wounded with machine gun or pistol, rifle or shell shots and fragments.

No one could tell why, but now it was rapidly becoming dark, probably from the clouds from forest fires far away, and General Calhoun who was put in unaided command rode to the summit of one of the lower hills to have a last observation of the movements of the victorious Christians.

The Christian Christians he could see were in possession of the trenches and other positions, and two fresh divisions of troops and Abyssinians and Conventinians at that were to be seen approaching from the distance, while Glandelinian promises of help didn't yet arrive.

"That's all right I am," he said to himself while his brow was as dark as a thundercloud. "They will wait until the new reinforcements come, and when the assault is in hand if help doesn't come, St. Etheldreda will have to be abandoned as its impregnable hold it without help. These Christians are a bludge in strategy and nothing can stop them."

In the rearward the battle had raged again elsewhere, and it was the fiercest around the location there. Glandelinian force of boys and girls were in a desperate struggle to be able to see what was going on, and to prevent themselves from being captured in case the enemy could repulse a Christian charge and pour through. Glandelinian and many of her followers had a most heroic and daring plan to take the position that place as high as a pilot house, and to increase the effect they had set a number of houses in the country around the place of the battle and in their care a high instant and they had secretly revealed an advice from one of the camp fire girls to retreat from their precarious position as soon as an opportunity presented itself, and come and join their camp which was considerably some distance from the terrible and storm battle.

"That big bonfire and the burning houses will burn for hours," Gertrude said. "Quite long enough for our purpose. We are besieged by the battle but we'll get through some how. We'll all pray before we start however..."

Other great fires could be seen scattered all over the side of the immense half forested plain, some of the conflagration coming up close to the camp, the air smelted of powder smoke, they saw hundreds of distant eruptions, and listened with disdain to the awful fearful sound of the battle, the wind sound of yelling, and watched with sadness the enormous canopy of cloud dark, roll, and heavy that rose high in the sky from the burning city of St. Etheldreda, and now that the danger was pressing. Their camp once already had been under shell fire. On the road in front still strewn with many dead bodies of the enemy which had been left there since last night, but far enough to be well beyond the conflagration raging nearest, many voices among wounded soldiers could be heard.

Evidently too by the stranger sounds mingling with the thunders of battle, the Christians were beginning to win at many sections, and that to day a larger number were in action, and probably enemy guns had been brought much closer and Glandelinians too may be stealing forward in large numbers to prevent any attempt on the part of the besieged to dash through their enemies, and get through any gap of the battle line. The blazing bonfire throwing in the strange twilight as it did a bright light upon the nearest scene showed that at present at least, the besieged beyond girl-scouts had no idea of trying to escape that way.

At nine o'clock that morning, the whole of the child scout regiment stood to their horses, not only had their feet been muffled with the leather shoes, but cloths of which there was plenty in the camp had been wound round them until their footfalls would even on the hardest road be absolutely noiseless. And then Angelina Riches led the way to the spot where forty of the soldiers had been at work during the afternoon of the day before. At this point which was on the side much further from that upon which the enemy was pressing an assault upon the Christians, a stretch of trees and bushes grew close to the camp on the outside, leading to a hidden glen, and a clearing had been made in this mass of brush wide enough and high enough for a horse to pass through easily. There was no word among them, every one had received his or her orders, and understood absolutely what to do, and as silently as ghosts the child troop passed through, each boy or girl leading his or her horse. On the outside the bushes, they formed in twelves and went cautiously forward, still leading their horses—these were it less not in danger of snoring with their mantras and mattresses at their heads.

Twenty five minutes passed and they were convinced that they had little to fear, and that there were no Glandelinians or anything dangerous to them on that side. The troop now mounted and trotted quietly away, going in a wide detour, and then going straight toward the direction of General Vivians center. The flames from some other big fire had been, and when about half a mile in front, they could see the battle, far away, and the Christians being progress too, Perrod, and Radcliffe, who with Colonel Angelina Riches was riding ahead, held up his hand. The signal passed along, and the whole, the troop came to an immediate halt.

Where was a Glandelinian wagon train ahead moving our way. "He said to several of his aids—do you remove the muffs from your horses' feet and ride on by yourselves, and see what is in the wagons, how many are guarding the train and where they are going."

The two boys did as they were ordered, but they needed no questions. The wounded were full of ammunition going to the Glandelinian army. He the boys being disguised as the Glandelinian scouts passed on with a good word of greeting, turned their horses when they reached a good distance in front, and allowed them to pass, and then rode on the return to the boy and girl scouts.

Other wagons full of ammunition going to the enemy lines, and guarded by a squadron of sixteen hundred cavalry men armed with lances and carbines.

"The very thing," Gertrude exclaimed, "no longer to be more lucky."

"What are we going to do," the possession of blow them up?" Demanded Radcliffe. "We'll take possession," said Perrod. "We'll need the millions ourselves."

"Why not blow them up?" repeated Joy St. Claire. "Both sides down our way."

"Yes and the police of the British will bring them to our own lines."

Orders were passed down the line by Perrod that they were to ride along until the leaders were abreast of them, then to assault the cavalry column.

"The cavalry quarter," shouted Perrod. "They can't give a children any."

"What about the drivers?" said Perrod. "They can't give any wounded in the wagon."

"I'll decide that after the contest," said Perrod. "I'll pay for the horses." This is usually done by the captives, but Perrod paid for the horses and then said:

"We'll see whether they're Christians or not." The driver of the Glandelian wagon, who were captured, were not the captives of the Christian soldiers, still more startled when they saw that the captives were not all captured without a struggle, and that some of the troop of child soldiers had been captured. Then the rest of them, who were bound, gagged, and laid down in the field at some short distance from the road, one of them however being unharmed and questioned before being finally left. There were no wounded found, as had been expected, but all the captives of the Glandelian cavalry were also bound and gagged and laid down on a meadow a short distance off.

"Swear not to pull for aid or to even say a single word should any one pass the road, for one hour or more," was the warning administered to every one of them, and all were forced to swear to observe it, feeling that after all they had received quarter, when they expected none from boy and girl captives. The eighteen wagons and all the captured cavalry horses, and weapons, the boy and girl captives proceeded on their way, but a large clump of trees a quarter of a mile from the rest of the Christian lines inactive just now at this section was reached, and they were forced to halt once more. The rest then dismounted, led their horses and the captives some little distance from the road, and tied them to the trees. Twenty boys armed to the teeth remained on guard. They had seen a large party of the enemy coming on horse and they had decided to capture them if possible to bring them into the hearts of the Glandelians. Sixteen of the boys dressed themselves as to appear at a short distance as Glandelian child scouts, while the others also disguised themselves as to the drivers' seats, and the rest crowded into the wagons covering themselves with their uniform coats to avoid being seen. When the horses of the wagons were again set in motion toward the party of Glandelian cavalry, they were again set in motion toward the party of Glandelian cavalry. They were not even challenged as they approached with the wagons.

"More ammunition, good...." The officer in charge of the cavalry said. "Yes," answered one of the boys.

"This is the fifteen with lot. We'll beat the Christian dogs now. General Turnerline must now be receding twenty of help from somewhere. Ah, Treachery indeed!" he cried, as the first wagon moving into the light beyond the shadow of a big tree he saw the white faces of the supposed Glandelian boys, and discovered some of the color of their uniforms. There was a leap from the nearest driven wagon, and he and the horse together were borne to the ground. But the other officer close by had heard the cry, and drew a pistol and fired to warn the cavalry lagging behind. Then the whole force of brave children leaped from the wagons, and they scattered through the meadow cutting down those who offered resistance, and disarming the rest. The Glandelian cavalry were terrified and not capable to resist so complete was the surprise. The captives were also tied and placed on the meadow near the road and a line of scouts were placed with rifles at the ready to guard them with orders to shoot them down at the first sign of movement. These they intend to bring along with them to the Christian lines as prisoners. 2.2.2.2.2.

The main body of this retreating scouting party of Glandelian cavalry had been alarmed by the arquebuss, the sound of which, and the cries of "I surrender" from the others, and loud shouts, curses and blasphemies were heard, and loud orders, and the main party therefore came up to assault the victim. They however received such a withering fire that their horses were drenched from that one terrible discharge, and too there was little time given them to even rally, for the rest of the child scout force came up on horses and they were forced to face away. Twenty of the enemy cavalry however had gotten possession of one of the mutton wagons, and they secretly lit a fire, and then ran back to the main body, who stood at a safe distance awaiting the explosion that would set the other wagons off and be fatal to the whole force of child scouts. However the fuse was defective, and though they waited for a full minute no explosion came, and the boy and girl scouts with a cheer dashed across the road, and deployed in such direction as to cover around the rest of the Glandelian cavalry. There was scarcely any resistance for they were suddenly by surprise a second time and being outnumbered greatly by their assailants, there being five boys or girls godly armed to one single man the frightened cavalry men either surrendered or tried to fight their way out of the encircling troop, but they were closed up, and speedily disarmed, and all made prisoners. As the Angelina school. He then informed by the others of the capture, she ordered that the prisoners should be made to march with them all on foot the horses to be used by members of the men too wounded to remain on their feet. With the whole troop of Glandelian prisoners they made their way straight toward the Christian lines. There was no time for explanation among the rest, though Perrod was surprised by the capture. The horses of the captured Glandelians were taken over by them, and then when all was ready for the starting, Perrod rode forward to meet some of his girl scout friends and leaders. Perrod was on her horse, surrounded by her attendants.

"Good," said Perrod, saluting and bowing as was his custom. "Angelina, riding the girl scout leader in highest command next to be beside me to tell you that this capture without a single loss to your side, after our capture of these wagons breaks all records. In spite of the fact the enemy wanted to give the wagons to the flames and cause an explosion that would have wiped us all out. Now in the world did you do this, this noble deed you have done should be notified to the Princes as it is the best ever yet on the enemy's side. To do this soon, and if you get a higher commission than even I have you sure do deserve it. All of us are brave boys and girls together, but you have accomplished this even against fate. This is sure proof our cause will prevail and it'll be because of our girl leaders." Then saluting he turned to the long group of fallen prisoners and added:

"You Glandelians say by brave men but you now say find it is wrong and futile to fight against us. We will and can always prevail against you even if you come in overwhelming numbers and all who have dared to resist us will be punished. Lastly, remember let no one among you try and schemes for whoever does so we will slay without mercy, for we generally don't intend to give any quarter, and therefore on this only occasion you prisoners should consider yourselves fortunate we left you off so easily despite your resistance to us."

Then turning round again, Perrod, and his companions returned to their own force. A few of the Glandelians however who had escaped, managed to get through somehow, and had brought the news to the Glandelian camp. At this time the Glandelians were getting ready to make an attack upon the prison portion of the Christian lines also, and the foe had been meeting fifty of artillery and three hundred and thirty six guns had already opened, upon the Christian position, ere the messenger reached the Glandelian position in this location.

The Glandelian general could not believe the news that the Regiment of boy and girl scouts had escaped the encircling battle, that a wagon train full of ammunition had been captured, besides a Glandelian cavalry squadron and his surmise and fury was great.

These little Christian dogs are an unusual sort of people," he said, stroking his beard. "Then jumping from his tent he communicated the news through the whole line. The news ran as wildfire through the whole Glandelian position, and their fury was unbounded. With a wild rush at the command of their officers they made for the spot where the boy and girl scouts had been camped, scoured the territory, and soon discovered the glen through which the besieged had made their escape. Then three thousand of them of the Glandelian cavalry set off in swift pursuit, but it was nearly noon now, and the fugitives had not time to rest even for a half a start. Perrod, Gertrude, or the other leaders of the child scout bands and their troops had no fear of being pursued. New sections of the foe army met wit with during their advance toward the other section of the Christian line, but with the wagons, and with two regiments of horses, and a number of prisoners and six horse start for they were confident that no pursuit could commence too soon because of the wild fury of the battle—they felt safe from the enemy from which they had escaped, especially as these could not find out even the direction which they were pursuing, and would believe that their aim would be to return to the Christian lines with their prisoners. Instead of pressing through the heart of the territory of Vantura Junction region. The party of Glandelians whom they had captured, consisted of Captain Hard heart who also of the enemy was a deputy commander for the lead of massacres of children, with his two lieutenants, and his aide-de-camp, of a captain Perrod, and his lieutenant, the former the son of some chief enemy general, who had been absent on duty because of wounds received in some past battle, and of Captain Hardman, and Major Jens who were also officers of the captured Glandelian detachment. The Glandelians glimmermanian cavalry, with an intermixture of some Mangabos and Turmetanians, and strangely to say also several negroes were also among the prisoners. They had dared to resist fiercely Christian cavalry, but all Glandelians seemed to fear the detachments of boy and girls because they're so like lightning in their movements and cannot be worsted.

Perrod and others had heard what was going to be done, both at Maximilian and Big Girl's pool. At the late latter place not only the Glandelians approaching them there but general Myette or Berge Evans, with Cannonia were said to be also threatening the city though their armies were quite a long distance off yet, and despite the danger the foolish overconfident inhabitants refused to start an exodus from the city. General Big Hughes Whistletail with the officers of the Turmetanian divisions, and forty or fifty Whistletail divisions having some eight thousand or so of women and children prisoners in their hands, were also moving forward to threaten Big Girl's pool and the danger seemed high. There occurred also an event at the place which was believed will color on, and that was a movement toward Big Girl's pool by another Glandelian army. No wonder general Vician was determined to smother Whistletail at Big Girl's pool.

At this time they had been all in camp, and had delivered their prisoners, and the boy and girl scout leaders were in general Vician's headquarters. The general had called all his generals into council to determine what was the bent on my to adopt under the circumstances of the battle. General Curran stood up and then demanded, "Ally!"

"What shall we do, shall we dash through the lines of the enemy left wing, and cut it up and haul a big force upon St Etheldreda, or should we hurl an assault upon Tamerline's main center, and send another to endeavor to join forces with the army now assailing the Glandelinian position at Warrener Hill? If it is impracticable to do that, should we send for Hanson and him get Tamerline in the main rear."

There came some debate to this position, and finally and very reluctantly the course of allowing the enemy to do the attacking was decided upon for the day. It was agreed that the truth of the conclusion of the others was proved by the fact that throughout the long battle so far there was no single instance of the Glandelinians so far as they were numerous and courageous, carrying a position held by Christians in the vicinity tent between St Etheldreda and Vantum held by any strong force of the Christians. And that even if the enemy if assaulted himself could hold the intrenchments near the city, against any assault that Christian troops might and did hurl upon them, that the enemy in the long run if not forced to surrender probably from want of provisions or men would be obliged to abandon the five ruined city anyhow.

In the attention as it was now, the arrival of Hanson's army would be a source of hindrance than either of help as the army would then be too big and both would be in each other's way. The reinforcement of course would be of sufficient strength to enable general Curran to crush Tamerline if it may come up in gradual union with him, but to come up all at once but be necessary and all probabilities would be that half the army under Hanson would be forced because of its size to remain inactive and see no part in the battle. It was therefore resolved to allow Hanson to continue his bulldoggedness toward Bunley, while general Curran's army was to remain the way of the action, to be attacked, and to counter attack, until Tamerline either got tired of it, or one side or the other was worn out. It was decided to finally direct most of the movements against St Etheldreda from the direction of Vantum, and to have the army of armed engaged avoid the forms of Edith and ally, and to have general John Bunley to advance directly toward Edith and Edith, while scouts would be sent to find out the news of the hoped for urgent strait in which Tamerline's army might be already placed, and of the necessity of for an instant advance to crush him before reinforcements, or any other section of his far divided armies would advance for or to his relief.

Vantum was but about twenty miles away from St Etheldreda, and Edith and ally were about the same distance but in different directions, and fortunately the battle lines were not stretched in that section, but they could distinctly hear the sounds that told of a heavy artillery fire in some other direction. At which section of the foe lines the fiercest assault should be delivered, so they could not yet decide, but in fact it was more necessary to do so near St Etheldreda as it was the main goal for both sides.

The course of the battle storm program had now been finally decided upon, and maps were consulted, and it was determined to sweep Tamerline's right wing across the Vantum Stream and to drive it toward Edith, and ally, close in and try and destroy or disperse the whole. It was agreed too that the assaulting force should move to storm the positions northward and try to smash Tamerline into "Humpty Dumpty" style.

Therefore at about one in the afternoon the plans were arranged and the movements started, while simultaneously the child regiments were again in the saddle, and on going forth to watch the result of the conflict reached and hal at the village of Edith. There were quite a few of the population there, but the men questioned there by the boys and girls told stories of the enemy that agreed the same, that they did not know the noise they heard so far away was a battle, and that they didn't expect the least danger, living also they learned that a long bridge by which they intended to cross was open to them, the troops of boy and girl scouts again proceeded on their way for the purpose to try and reach ally and warn the inhabitants there to move before the enemy came there in case they were forced out of their position leaving the village of Edith lost in entrenchment as to where so large a body of child scouts called the Rangers could have come from through such a dangerous territory as this. As the scout force was heading forward they heard the sound of galloping horses, and as fast as military movements could allow every one was hidden in the shortest space of time. A Glandelinian cavalry squadron passed, and so of the men who were the Rangers, one had and the other his brother, Richard James being on rearward riding together some two hundred yards behind the rest of the squadron. When the main column was out of sight these two came riding along. Then some three score of small figures suddenly rose from the ground and these were girls. Ned was hurled off his horse by a blow with a butt end of a gun wielded by one of the girls, whose name was Lucille Redwood, and Richard before he could or had time to even shout or show signs of resistance was dragged from his horse, his head wrapped in a heavy cloth, and his arms bound. Then he could feel himself lifted up and rapidly carried off.

After a time this Glandelinian officer came out on his feet, and the cover of his head removed. He found Ned beside him, and a word of congratulation as both were alive were exchanged. Then a rope was placed round each of their bodies and tightened, and surrounded by their captors, all of them to the surprise of the prisoners were child scouts and who rode horses, they were started at a run with admonitions from those around them that if they attempted to escape, or yell, or cry, or swore would be punished with instant death. For two full hours they were hurried along, and then the child scout squadron halted near one Christian line at the edge of the woods to deploy a little and try to get a view of the battle before returning.

17-0

The prisoners were allowed to sit down with their captors. Those who in the prisoners could observe the "hunger" under what they had heard the "dreaded" Wild cat Gertrude Angeline, who had been accounting so frequently during the battle. The sound of gunshot came bolder nearer and clearer. Had gathered from the conversation that their capture was the effect of pure accident. The scout force had moved the cavalry coming and had hidden out of sight on two sides of the road with at first the intention of surprising the whole force, when they had seen the troop of horsemen approaching. But their leader felt as if one intended to remain out a considerable long time and therefore didn't wish to be burdened with prisoners, and therefore the band had laid quiet until the troop as they supposed had all passed. They had then risen to leave to rummage their horses and ride on to follow the Glandelinian cavalry with the purpose to storm it in the rear and disperse it. When the two last Glandelinian horsemen came into view, and these Gertrude had determined to capture and carry off if possible, hoping to force some concerned news out of them about Tamerline's army and so forth. They had mentioned of turning them over to Penrod or Radcliffe. Radcliffe's name to these two prisoners had not as yet that terrible history attached to it which rendered it terribly dreaded wherever Glandelinians heard of him, but these two men had heard that he was the fiercest boy scout in the whole shobang that all Glandelinians and Abbotonia too there was something decidedly mysterious about him, and that he was therefore no sudden in his assaults actions, and mischiefous works upon the Glandelinians that he got the nickname the "Butterknife" and fighting as it were, with a rope round his neck at the handle of such a Glandelinian boy scout and so weirdly mysterious, they had no power to expect, and none from Penrod either.

"I'll be of no use to try and bolt for it, Ned!"
"Not the least in the world. We might escape Christian dog soldiers but there is like trying to escape from the fiends in hell. Six girls scouts mind you are appointed to watch us. Don't you see some of them are sitting with their fronts to us with their guns across their laps. Should we even get up a few inches we would be shot down in an instant. I don't even like the way they keep boring us with their dark glaring eyes. They're fierce I tell you. All Christian dog child scouts are fierce!"

There was going on a debate among the band whether to push on to the Christian line at once, or to try and watch the battle, but they had already made a long trip, and moreover thought that they could create a greater effect by driving with their prisoners any time. Anxious the two men watched in silent hope that their guards would get sleepy from the heat. They showed no signs however of doing so but sat at staid in conversation over the hope for defeat of Tamerline's army and of the restoration of devastated Glandelinia, and Abbotonia. The boy and girl scout guards were talking too how once when pursued and assailed by many thousands of Glandelinians they had been saved by a young Glandelinian enough creature, who had with a mighty scream screaming sound had rushed and flew into the midst of the Glandelinians scattering them in confusion slaying many and pursuing the rest for some distance. The party continued on now with their two prisoners, and had not gone far when they saw a Glandelinian of Glandelinian soldiers resting in a small wood some half a mile or so off to the right on a slight rise, and probably a guard being on the watch for a surprise attack from the Christians might come this way. At the approach of the child about regiment on horse there was a wild cry, men rushed over each other in their efforts to escape from the terrible assault threatening them, none considered, and others getting to their feet started off at full speed. For a moment some of them had lain paralyzed with the sudden appearance of the "Terrible Child" scout squadron and then had the name as the rest darted away.

This gave the two Glandelinians however a chance to bolt in the commotion and they did, but they didn't get far before me, when they were pursued and captured once more.

Never mind the Glandelinians who fled said Gertrude. To the Christian camps with these two, and in an instant they were on their way, the remaining Glandelinian soldiers having plucked into the undergrowth and were forcing their way at full speed through it. To them scouting squadrons of Christian children were all ready for and in order, and there was a little fear among these routed Glandelinians that another party might be going through the wood, and even had such been the case, they could have fought from behind trees. The Glandelinians therefore were safe as far as they were concerned. Presently in the meantime the child scout came upon a path leading through the woods the shorter route toward camp, and they followed it in five minutes they emerged on the other side, and were within sight of it. As they did so they heard the sound of terrible firing in the direction of St Etheldreda and saw that the Christians were attacking the advantage they had recently won in the first blood action. The first object of the child scout force was to get as close to the Christian lines as possible, however, and therefore the whole column decided to again allow them to a rest, and the two prisoners were again closely guarded. Gertrude was the first to speak.

"What on earth are we to do now, Angeline? We are close to our position and we have not accomplished nothing."

"Have not accomplished nothing? What are you saying Gertrude. We have not only not accomplished nothing, but we have lost our position, and on the other hand, to put out her searchlight. Angelina alone can read tens of millions of soldiers, and all Abbelesians have declared to her. Already Vivian Wacey is more than likely to be killed, and she is formed to march to the aid of the Christian army. Maximilian may be quickly killed, but in the end Calvernia will be recovered, her enemies will be destroyed, and her friends rewarded. But I know she went on to tell me the two girls' chief leaders, that it needs not a thought of this to influence you, and that in your kind heart's compassion alone will suffice to secure your protection."

Gertrude laughed, again. "You are only a very short distance from the Christian lines," she said. "We have surely learned to understand what dangerous expeditions are.... No tell us how you got here?"

"Gertrude" interrupted Angelina. "I had better have all the others get ready, for we will have to be moving soon and if the Glandelinians do not through the Christian lines near our own section they might surprise us. Let these two camp five girls come with us, while Mildred will go in, and give direction to your attendants. I will bring some robes of disguise to the two girls, that is if you believe we may need to. If you have resolved to retain them here as hostages...."

"I have resolved to do this," Gertrude said. "You have heard my camp five girl friends. You may for the time being sit in front of my tent. When preparations are made you will be notified."

With deep assurance of gratitude from Mable, the two Camp Five girls went toward the tent which was indicated to them, delighted with the result, of their interview....

"I do hope that one of them will bring us something to eat," Mable said. "Edith in English. I am as hungry as a famished victim of starvation. That girl scout leader is a good girl isn't she?"

"She sure does. Not see Gertrude Angelina, or rather, she sees ze famous Evangelina Aronbois, but she call herself ze Gertrude Angelina. She sees ze breech, she sure sees...."

Two minutes later a step was heard coming down the narrow road running through the camp, and a boy came who seemed to Edith to be a German boy who stood, glanced at the two, and again retired.

"What was he?" asked Edith. "He looked at us as if he wondered who we were. I'll bet he is a German lad in our service."

"He may be ze investigator. At least that what heem seemed to be." Ten minutes more passed, and two of the girls came who were of course Gladys and Joy St. Claire made their appearance. Joy said to the two Ediths to the one Edith:

"Miss Aronbois wishes you two before her right a way." she seemed puzzled as she did not understand Abbelesian, but Mable said:

"She says Gertrude summons us right away. You no compren, but let's make ze go."

In a few minutes the two stood before her. She was alone with Mildred who was able to be about despite her wounds. Mildred held out a basket of provisions, and pointed to a bundle of clothing....

She however spoke to Edith and said: "Put on these uniforms which is as ours. You must be as one of us now. You see, Edith...."

Edith was puzzled again and only shook her head. Mildred comprehended the situation at once, and smilingly said in surprisingly good English, (for she had learned it in a school she attended in her earlier years):

"You do not understand our language. Little girl I see. Well but these new uniforms on. You are going to be one of us. You are a little Irish girl eh. I can see it in your features. Well that's better. Irish are good fighters. Ever the devil can't lick them."

The two girls then retired, hastily ate some food, then put on the new uniforms, and went forward to Gertrude's tent. Gertrude then motioned to them to sit down upon two stools brought up near her, and saying: "It is very hot again. Then to the two; You sure can make very pretty girls. Only one of you are too white. She added pointing to Edith.

"Miss Aronbois, if we had some light colored dye we could pass as two Calverniaans. I believe Mable said, 'We have done so before this, since the war began'."

"Tell me about it," Gertrude said. "I also want to find out who you are and how you came here as if you had dropped down here from the heavens...."

Mable related their adventures which had to be omitted here. "How brave you two Camp Five girls are," she finally said. "We wonder the Glandelinians are afraid of children will be the real conquerors of Calvernia."

Glandelinians. No Mildred as you can see English tell both of these Camp Five girls what we propose."

"We cannot remain long here for the enemy is assaulting the Christian armies furiously and my fear through at our section at any moment and we are going to move. We therefore dare not leave you two here. You must have to be fed, and we must trust many friends. We go to St. Ethelreda or near there and hope to reach there by this evening if not sooner, and you must go with us. My ride-de-camp will bring you a horse apiece. You must be prepared for the same adventures we may face. He's a good German lad, and he will not question you, though at the first sight he had told me he had been suspicious and sized you up. The whole camp is prepared to start now. You cannot remain behind us either as even our soldiers will not understand who you are and will believe we have two prisoners. Here," to Edith is some stuff to dye your faces and hands a little. I will then later direct you what to do and I will see to it you are efficiently armed. You are to go first however, and you will see a road along the road. Don't go that way. We are now too hid to have had such a trying experience but the best will come of it...."

Everything being now arranged, Gertrude rose. Mable showed her expression of gratefulness from herself and her companion, and Gertrude quietly held out her little hand, whose size and shape any girl might have envied; and the two Camp Five girls kissed it. "Edith respectfully. Mable with a heartiness which made her laugh, and drew it away...."

"You are a darling girl scout leader," Edith said in English, "and I wish I knew enough of your language to tell you."

"What does she say?" she requested of Mildred.

"Mildred repeated the words she had heard."

"The little Irish girl is an unusually grateful child," Gertrude said. "Mildred," and I have a good mind to have her be one of us. Now good bye for the present. Mildred will prepare you for the trip."

INDEED of ann names probably connected with this year of the frightful Calverniaan Abbelesian War (probably except Calvernia) St. Ethelreda will always stand out very conspicuous especially in this tremendous battle, for it is a dark record of utmost or unusual and record breaking treachery, treachery horrible massacre, and the cruellest sort of bloodshed, bloodshed frightfulness of the battle, matter of endurance of both sides, insane stubbornness and determination, and strange record of ending, and its name therefore should, and will so long as this country ought to continue to exist in this story be regarded as the darkest in the annals of the Abbelesian nation.

It was not stated before it must be said that the city of St. Ethelreda is situated on the Ventura River one hundred and three miles southeast of the region of Abbelesian, and was a large city of the size of Chicago and San Francisco put together, extending for the same distance along the shore of the river, and from it on both sides. It stood on a large plain intensely hot and dusty in summer cold and snow bound in the winter, and because before war had hardly ever been expected possessed no fortified positions or fortifications or other building such as should prove the safety of the inhabitants and the city itself for the enemy.

The Glandelinians had at once got possession of the city as stated at the opening of the bloody conflict, and the Christian forces of a part of general Vivians army then stationed there consisted of only the First, Fifty Third, and Fifty Sixth Angelinian Corps. The Second Corps of Angelinian Cavalry, and about one hundred and fifty artillery manned by many invalid artillery men who had hardly recovered from injuries received in the battle of Glandelheim.

When the news of the danger of Big-Girl noon as written before had reached general Vivian, and it was too probable that the disasters of the war would spread to all other sections throughout that portion of Calvernia, general Vivian had at once planned to try and make a pass at general Tamerline to push him out of his way so he could get on to march for Maximilian while Tamerline could start for the latter city, and Tamerline must have heard of the plan through spies, for he started the battle immediately as already stated. The Christians who had been retained to guard the city had before the battle at once set to work to prepare a sort of fortified position in which to retire with the inhabitants in case of necessity. To this end he connected with a long line of breastworks a large and unfinished trench intended as a trap for for assailants. Within these lines he collected artillery relieved munitions from the main line stores and provisions for a months consumption for his troop and the inhabitants and having thus as he hoped prepared for the very worst in case the battle would come he awaited the event....

Although before the battle started there had been much uneasiness and disquietude things went on tolerably well up to the time of the outbreak of this terrible war storm. General Vivian himself had meanwhile believing Tamerline would retain his distance had advised Hanson to move against Hanson and force him to retreat toward Lebanon forty miles distant while he also sent a courier to find James Vivians army to have him come up to help either him or Hanson, and he also asked the advance of general James Cannon, and Jim and John Scanlone armies to come to the assistance so as to overwhelm general Tamerline and hurl him aside. About two days before the battle started five Corps of Jim Scanlone's army, the Thirty Second Corps of James Cannon's army, and two hundred and fifty thousand troops of general Cannon's Concentinian cavalry arrived from the north, while messengers came from these three generals stating that they would be well on the way in the meantime. Through some reason they had not yet arrived, and the battle is already well on its fourth day duration.... James Cannon himself was at this time a man of forty two years of age. He was the son of general Harold Cannon, who had been of ill health for many days and had been compelled to resign. General James Cannon was a powerful commander, and had overthrown six powerful Glandelinian armies on one occasion and had been joined by other generals in giving the bloody war against Glandelinia its name. When it seemed that the Glandelinians were starting to win great successes elsewhere he was only hiding his line. General Stanley had once said in a discovered written statement:

"Glandelinia never has any good chances whatever with that James Cannon in command. He's more dreaded than the two Vivian generals, and they're not to be beaten either."

Thus at this critical period of the war, the minds of all other Christian generals were so concerned in him as a godly chance to Glandelinia's cause, and they lent him all aid possible. General James Cannon was described by many Christian officers as the hero of Pullaway, as the scourge of the enemy, and no fortification complex however as is the case with most Abbeonian gentlemen is scarcely that of the son of a general. He had a certain character in the whole of a Jew's oval and indeed somewhat rakish character. In reality this rollicking Abbeonian officer was a human tiger to the enemy... 2-234,222. On the very morning when the bombardment of the city was to so suddenly begin there was an alarm of some danger impending, and women and children of a railway station near the Christian line of defense too, refuge in the fortified sections prepared for them, and from that time and during the whole battle the sufferings of the residents commenced, with the battle in the streets, the awful shell fire as described before, the dreadful conflagration and other horrors although it was not for a fortnight afterwards that the general horrors were to really commence, for the overgrowing and the intense heat caused by the conflagration, at once began to effect the health of those huddled together in the ill ventilated rooms, and deprived of all the luxuries which alone makes existence endurable to Galverinian people in Galverinian cities during the heats of summer, and winters.

Scarcely a day had passed without news of the horrible details of the battles savage war, and though the news produced some effects by the fact general Vivian was progressing, it didn't relieve the city from its awful situation. With the intentions of general Vivian to recapture the city, there were then in the captured Christian intrenchments the Glandelinian forces and others already mentioned under general Smith, the whole defense force consisting of two hundred and forty four thousand men for one single wing, and the total being three times that number throughout the whole line and included the various numbers of guns. There were in their power a large number of Christian ladies and children, the wives and families of the officers and civilians of the city, and all the inhabitants, homeless and destitute but held as hosts or prisoners.

General Vivian had heard of the progress of the Christian assault against general Smith, and during this time, during the lull the enemy had taken a fierce counter charge, drove back the Christians set fire to many more of the surviving residences of the city, and threatened to break down the Christian resistance at all points within the nearness of the city. A message was therefore sent by general Vivian to general Cannon, to the effect that he was marching a large division and inviting him to assume the command. This he at once agreed to, and arrived within the scene a few hours later with six hundred thousand troops and one hundred and sixty six guns, and his first act was to rally the torn up Christian columns there, and roll up the Glandelinian assailants and swing them round upon their main defense was record breaking loss. Having destroyed the Glandelinian columns opposed to him, the force marched on, but on reaching the right of the former position held by Smith general Cannon called together the generals of his command and advised them to try and carry a portion of the city. The proposal was accepted with acclamation, and they therefore being reinforced by Jim Scanlon, and his brother, with great bodies of troops, by means of movements angulated general Vivian's army nearest St Etheldreda, and half of it invested the city by noon, the last message coming through from general Vivian on that day with the fighting having grown intense at half past ten in the morning.

"Don't let go, and I'll send more troops and artillery. If the enemy do harm to the inhabitants and don't let them go, so they can escape our own fire, give the Glandelinians resisting the city no quarter."

The first proceedings of the Christian troops was to regain possession of the suburb portions of St Etheldreda, where recently the surviving houses had been smashed, broken open or burned or plundered, 2-232,233, and many of the respectable inhabitants slaughtered. The bombardment of the Glandelinian position began at half past two in the afternoon and even here the cannonade and the shell fire on both sides was fiercer and more severe than the greatest cannonade at Gettysburg, and yet continued with minute increasing fire until four in the afternoon. Every most desperate attempt by hundreds of thousands per onset to carry the place by storm was met with equal fury and desperation, and the sufferings of the besieged from the heat, smoke of the still smouldering city, and from other horrors was becoming frightful.

There was a small stream near the entrenched intrenchments, and upon this the besiegers continually concentrated their heaviest and most destructive fire so that it could easily have been said that even one third of a rainfall of water cost a man's life.

After five or six hours of incessant bombardment and one dreadful assault which was repulsed with immeasurable loss, the besiegers started with firing incendiary bombs, and red hot shot, and high explosives, and tear gas and stench stench bombs, and everything was set on fire anew, and a strong wind blowing the fire spread so rapidly and fiercely that the Glandelinians had to flee from the burning positions. The other surviving buildings were so riddled and riddled by shot and shell that they afford scarcely any shelter. Many of the besieged Glandelinian soldiers made dugouts as seen in the world war in the ground, in the streets or under the tranches but the deaths from the earth tearing explosions and from the murderous fire of grape and shot and incendiary bombs were even more numerous than those caused by burning and by falling houses. Seeing that they were soon to be forced out, as Tamerlane couldn't send any aid, the Glandelinians in their desire for revenge of their threatened defeat here created a reign of terror. All the Christian prisoners captured in battle were massacred, with women and children and every further prisoner brought in when captured and there were many who murdered by the enraged Glandelinian soldiers. Hour by hour the suffering of the garrisons in the intrenchments became greater, and the mortality among the soldiers was terrible.

Every hour had seen the besieging Christian army increasing, by the arrival of troops from other quarters of general Vivian's army until it reached a total of twelve million while the fighting force of the Glandelinian garrisons had greatly decreased, yet the handful of Glandelinians still repulsed every effort of the great host of assailants to carry the fragile line of intrenchments. They were determined to fight to the last man, for they realized now for what had occurred within the city, they would receive no quarter.

TREACHERY... BASE TREACHERY... "QAAZE

In the meantime when Blith and Mable having carried out the instructions given by Gertrude Angelina, arrived at two o'clock, not far off from the besieged city, Penrod at once led them to a small tent where they had encamped for at least half an hour.

"I have much news to tell you two. The fighting is fierce in this territory. General Vivian has sent in a message to general Cannon to say that he must force the place until general Cannon Profile comes to his help. We are to go all of us down the Vantum stream and try to get into the city and see how things prevail. We leave all of us at three o'clock this afternoon. General Vivian has sworn the Sacred Oath of our religion that if the inhabitants of the city are injured by the besieged Glandelinians, the enemy there at least will receive no quarter, and all his officers have added to the oath that that these conditions shall be observed. Boats will be provided for all of us or if we wish we can tramp on horse by road. The latter is more preferable as it may not be safe by stream just now. Her Captainship Miss Cronburg will shelter you two here if you do not wish to accompany us into the city but if you wish you can go with us into the city and join our adventures."

With many thanks for the boy generals offer, the two girls at once decided to join them, and accordingly, when the half hour was up, the whole column started under the leadership of Angelina Richee. There were but few people of any sort in this territory. Not far away from their left was a sad procession of women and children, those who had managed to escape from the city, and many wounded and ill among the latter a wounded officer the gallant first commander commander who had defended the city at the beginning of the conflict all were in wagons provided by friends. The girl and boy scout leaders rode up, and a few words explained to their surprised refugee friends, that they were commanders of a regiment of Rangers scouts, and many a word of welcome was muttered as a native handshakes given. In return they were able to give the news to the refugees of the arrival of other troops to general Vivian's support, and of the commencement of the siege, all of which was new to the refugees who had been for many months without word from the outer world... 2-232

At last the column reached a bend in the road. Here seventeen more covered wagons were collected. At this spot the way down the broad road was very steep for the shore of the river was very high, and at some places covered with heavy forests. Further on could be seen a farmhouse and a moving column of purple deploying on one side of the road. The wounded and the sick, were carried down the steep road and placed in the wagons, the ladies and children refugees then took their places, and the older men followed... When all was ready Gertrude called some of her troopers to the rear to relieve their instructions.

Then as if by magic from out of the heavy forest on both sides of the road down to the lower level of ground, many thousands of men in purple uniforms rushed. Two of them to the surprise and horror of Gertrude, carrying the Glandelinian national and Regimental Standards, while at the same moment long rows of bridges fell to the ground, and showed a great number of gatling guns, all placed into position. In a moment a most tremendous tremendous and wondrous fire was opened upon the unhappy refugees, and great numbers were hurled at the wagons. Great numbers of them were at once slain in the wagons, some jumped from the wagons into the road, and ran and threw themselves into the river for safety, and made for the opposite shore, while others leaped into the river on the deeper side and tried to escape by swimming. But upon the other shore were enemies in red uniforms as blood thirsty as those in purple they had left behind, and these cut off the retreat of the fugitives there. They were Glandelinians in disguise, treacherous soldiers the fierce Goodwillers. All the wagons were riddled with canister shot and were on fire. The Glandelinians rushed from their place of concealment and all those still alive were seized and butchered, while the women and children many of them bleeding from wounds, were thrown into the burning wagons and shot. The Glandelinians also made a sudden and fierce assault upon the regiment of boy and girls from two sides, and a fierce and merciless struggle raged in which both sides began to suffer the most fearful loss. Boys and girls fell by scores, so did the Glandelinians, and two generals were shot in the head at once. Six grenades was thrown among the regiment conducting a frightful havoc, and many were slain. It was terminating into a fearful massacre in seed, and the boys and girls seeing themselves out of luck, fought like little fiends giving and asking no quarter.

Handreds were slain, and many more hundreds of the enemy. Edith and Edith were in one of the boats on the river which was still ashore when the treacherous Glandelinians in disguise as christian soldiers burst from their hide hiding place.

"The murdering scoundrels" went from both hopelessly, while Edith seeking at a glance the hopelessness of the situation grasped Edith's arm. "We will have to swim for it Edith. You Comprene. How so long dive and go under again the moment to have got a breath."

Without an instant's delay the two girls, leaped into the wag water, as dozens of other girl and boy scouts were doing, and although each time their heads came up for an instant the bullets splashed around them, and could not hit the water they continued on untouched until they reached the center of the stream. They however were still within rifle shot range but the distance was sufficient to render them pretty safe except against the fact that the enemy might sweep the water with long range machine guns which they had on shore. They glanced back and observed that many of the enemy had entered the river, up to their shoulders, to shoot the swimmers or cut them down with spears, others were strangling children to death, or cutting their bodies apart others on horses had ridden far out and were cutting down those who were unable to swim far made again toward shallow water, while cannon machine guns and rifles still poured in their fire against the helpless crowd who had tried to escape down river in boats they had ceased.

"See Edith it is of no use for us to try and get to the top, onto shore" Edith said "There is another large body of Glandelinians there, we must simply float down the stream in the middle. If we can remain on our backs, and go down as low as we can so as to show only our noses and mouths above water, they may fire for months without hitting us. There give me your hand, so that we may float together. I will glance up from time to time to see that we are floating pretty fairly in the middle. I will do it quickly, so as not to be seen for if we lie on our backs they won't watch us after a short time and will believe we are two drifting dead bodies. Now girl friend" so saying the two Camp fire girls turned on their backs and occasionally gave giving a quiet stroke with their legs, or paddling with their hands drifted down stream so showing so little of their faces above water that they could scarcely be seen from the shore as the river was very wide.

Both of these Camp fire girls were good swimmers, but Edith was perfectly at home in the water, and Edith therefore understood her own inferiority in this respect left herself entirely to the protection of her friend. Soon however Edith in her sudden glances to observe their position, perceived that three boat loads of refugees alone of all the number had got fairly away down stream, that all the wagons were on fire on the road—that the boat loads following had gotten out cars and were swiftly rowing up to the swimmers, but she saw too that on both shores of the river the Glandelinian guns continued to retain abreast of them, and that a more severe fire of artillery and rifles and machine guns was maintained. They were stilling committing massacre massacre, and too what was left of the regiment of boy and girls scouts were still fighting and cutting their way through the Glandelinians, and were succeeding in effecting their retreating being crushed by the enemy, and crushing Chris crushing in return. For a moment Edith thought of being taken on board, but their chance of escaping the enemy was centered upon them seemed hopeless and she therefore decided it was best and much safer to continue on in the water. She accordingly paddled herself out of the center of the stream so as to give the boats a wide berth, trusting therefore that the attention of these murdering Glandelinians would be so much directed, at the boats, that the floating bodies would be unnoticed. As to remaining retaining afloat for any good length of time she had no fear whatever. The waters of Glandelinian was rivers floating vegetation, and northerly directions because of the tremendous heat of the forest fires raging in so warm even now in this month that any amount of swimmers could remain in them for many an hour without any feeling of chill or discomfort. After an hour passed Edith lifted her head, and looked forward.... The firing was more than two miles ahead now.... But one boat of the three still floated and Edith congratulated herself that she had decided not to join her fate to that of those on board. Four hour after hour passed, and still the two Camp fire girls continued to float on, until at last the twilight of all day because of so much smoke in the sky deepened into darkness, and now they turned on their faces, and swam quietly down the stream. For three more hours alternately swimming and floating they continued their course down the river, until toward midnight fearing a sudden unusually bright glare of some distant fire might reveal them too much in the water, they gently paddled ashore, crept into the heavy woods on the shore further inland, and fell asleep almost, instantly....

It was early in the morning when they were aroused by a lot of distant noise. They were hot, they were desperately hungry, but they agreed to spend no more hour in the waters of the river, before searching for food so as to be able to put as much distance as possible between themselves and the dreaded territory of St Etheldreda.... They had been to ten hours in the water before, and allowing two miles and a half an hour for the current and sometimes for their swimming, they calculated that the city of St Etheldreda must be thirty one miles behind or maybe less. One hour more of steady swimming, a steady march to the, and they landed again with a hope that several Glandelinians for close Glandelinian and a soldier could not have been left far behind, and that they had now only the ordinary perils of travel in such a territory through a territory filled with hostile disguised foes to face. It could be about three hours or more before the coming of twilight and it didn't get light, and they swam off at right angles to the river, then landed, and walked till it became twilight, when they entered a forest near to which was a country or woodland house, wondering if it was occupied or not they watched it closely from behind a big tree, and finally a man they saw a man that appeared dressed in the clothes of a wood cuter coming out, followed by two children, a girl and boy, and at once made to sit, telling him she they were and begging him for food and shelter.

870

He was greatly surprised at their wet appearance, the two children for a moment were scared and hid behind him, but finally he received them kindly, and gave them the best which his hut in which he lived alone with his wife and children afforded. A meal of jam and, and hot coffee greatly revigorated them, and then after telling him their story and warning him to watch out that the enemy do not surprise him and murder his children, they started off again, with enough food for a two days supply. That they were not ahead of all their foes they were dead certain, from the fact that some targets they met said that he had heard the whole territory is scourged by heavy Glandelinian cavalry patrols for two more hours they continued on their way, passing through the heavy wood, their hopes also rising, for as they felt, the further they got from the region of that awful battle, the less was the chance of the danger of meeting with Glandelinians.

Finally when the morning was well advanced, they came to another place and asked for the direction toward some sheltering christian army. "You can have food too" he answered "But I now not where any christian army is except that under Hanson vivian, and he is ten miles from here. But you had better go to that mansion over yonder about an hour walk. He has a number of girl and boy scouts over there who came from the direction of some awful massacre that occurred yesterday, and he is a very old man and a friend of their cause. Maybe they can direct you...."

Indeed they were delighted at the news, and the two Camp fire girls went forward as fast as they could. As they entered the courtyard of the country mansion they were greeted with a hearty salutation, and their hands were clasped a moment afterwards, by a christian officer who was a lieutenant, an officer indeed who had often distinguished himself in many a battle and especially at Cedemine, and was one of the survivors.

He brought them in to the owner of the building, who received them as if they were his own long lost daughters, and after they had been clothed and their uniforms were hung up to dry, they were to bed a while, to rest, and a few minutes later, Penrod, Gertrude, Polorens, and many of her boy and girl scout comrades appeared..

They wished to find out how the two girls had escaped, and when they told their story, Gertrude told the camp fire girls how she and about a hundred of her comrades, and many of her officials had escaped. They managed to secure two good boats as staunch as rafts and plunged in. The two boats were crowded but they escaped the massacre and though the boats were very low in the water having on board many others besides the child scouts they were able to go on ahead and returned the fire of the enemy on shore, hitting a man for every shot. They were then fired at with artillery but without effect, without a loss among themselves. Toward evening the leading boat hit a rock and was rendered unserviceable, and ground on a sand bank.

Then the Glandelinian infantry fired so heavily and incessantly that the boy and girls scouts and those among the refugees able to carry arms about one hundred and fourteen in number made for the shore and assaulted the Glandelinians themselves with hand grenades. These fell back, and the handful of christians followed them creating a terrible loss of life among the Glandelinians and killing their chief commanding officer. Great numbers of the enemy then came up, and the fugitives took refuge in a large country barn and here they defended themselves fiercely until the enemy gave it up temporarily for a time with the loss of five thousand lying before that fatal barn. The enemy then piled rubbish weeds, bushes and forest debris at the entrance and at other parts of the barn and settled down on fire. Then the men and brave women and children refugees, accompanied by the few survivors of the child regiment of scouts fought their way through the flames, and made again for the river now moving down scores of the enemy as they did so. Radcliffe hurled one grenade into a crowd of the nearest Glandelinians and the whole crowd was laid low. Ten of the women and nine of the men refugees who got through the fire were shot down in the fight, and sixty more of the girl and boy scouts were slain or wounded, before the remainder of the band reached the river, and of these who reached the river twenty two were shot and killed before they had swum far. Of all of the boy and girls scout officers not one of them was even injured and that seems strange counting the fact that they were under a withering fire for on the gray coated murderers but they themselves piled their two pistols so quickly, incessantly as long as they were loaded and with such unerring aim that not one was hit while they hit their adversaries every time and brought down a score of Glandelinian officers....

Three miles lower down one of the boyscouts swimming on his back went too near the shore, and was shot to death. Six miles lower down the firing had finally ceased, and soon afterwards the fifty boy and sixty girlscout survivors out of a regiment of fifteen hundred were hailed by a squadron of christian Conventinian cavalry, who aided them, shouted them to come ashore and they obeyed, and were brought to the shelter of this mansion. Since they were together, they had been determined to set out to try and rejoin their army, and to also to get even with the enemy for this awful massacre. So many of the girl and boyscouts had died of course fighting to the last, but no to Gertrudes and report the refugees had been butchered without being able to defend themselves at all. The owner of the building and his butlers endeavored in vain to dissuade them, but the former in finding that they were determined gave them disguises, furnished them with an escort, and sent them across the river in a boat, with a message to another friend to help them forward.

The party to whom their guides conducted them, after crossing the Vantura with an easy hearing of the frightful firing of the long and bloody battle, relieved them as warmly as the man of the mansion had done, and told them that the safest way for them to go to the christian lines was in a hay wagon covered with hay in which they could hide, and placed one immediately at their disposal, with a trusty well armed man as the driver and another with a hidden machine gun to accompany them in the hay wagon. He told them that the right wing of the christian army was as it was said just the morning near the city of St Etheldreda, and that it was reported that a general advance was going on, and that the battle was more fearful now than on the preceding days past. General Jamerline would it was said, send great troops to maintain the positions at the city. As yet however none of his separate parts of the Glandelinian army had reached the fierce battle field, which was very fortunate for general Vivian, for the main road ran through that place, which was but twenty miles from the point where a great portion of the christian army had crossed the Vantura and was cutting up the Glandelinian army opposed to it, and rolling up to it up and carried or carrying it before them as if it were not resisting at all, and although the christian assaults would be pressing on, it would not insure any ones safety in a trip through the endangered region, even though they would remain by a road running alongside the river, and therefore too the danger could be greater because the Glandelinian cavalry would be scouring the territory for hundreds of miles. This news excited them not to accept the mans good invitations to stay the night through, and therefore decided to start on the way as soon as possible. It was still but little past morning, and they needed to reach the christian lines before night, so they started out, of all of the hidden in a long line of hay wagons covered with hay. Before they halted the party finally made three miles, and in passing through a village not endangered by the war learned the welcome news that the christian army had driven the Glandelinians before them and had advanced toward Vantura. This portion of the christian army it was said had met with unusually violent resistance but could not be stopped, and the good country people were full of stories of the manner in which the Glandelinians had been fiercely engaged with them only to be hurled to their own positions and even from them, already in the minds of the peasantry the idea that general Vivians army would win the final victory in the terrible and long strife was gaining ground, and as the whole country had suffered from the horrors of the Glandelinian invasions and life and property were no longer safe for a moment the whole sympathy of even Calvinian-Glandelinians or all those who had anything to lose was with the christian cause.

The parties continued to follow the road near the river with the hopes of finding traces of the christian armies as they feared to fall either into the hands of the Glandelinians who may be retreating toward their way before the advance of the Angelinians or crany reinforcements coming down from the direction of here another portion of Jamerlines divided divisions of the army might be. They were forced to halt for a time near whence a road ran direct toward St Etheldreda, which was now about a eight miles distant. The villagers repeated that the Glandelinians had all fallen back in the location of the city, but that there was a great fight going on to the northwest of the city and that the battle was general all the time. along the line. The christian force was strong, and general Scanlans main army were within a mile now and on their way on a forced march.

General Vivian indeed was very silent during his investigations of unpleasant news he had heard, although he was also very sober. No one suspected the reason for his silence until he reached his headquarters that evening during the lull in the battle, and Minnie Saunders who had remained seemed nervous. Just as general Vivian came in, and Angelina Niches and two other girlscouts who had remained home at his request the day the other parties of child scouts went out, started to go upstairs. General Vivian called Gladys back.

"Come into my council room with me Gladys," he said with a quiver in his voice. "I have something to say to you."

Gladys hesitated, for she did not understand his tone of voice, and therefore with hanging head for she felt something foreboding, and flushing cheeks she turned and followed general Vivian into the council room.

With happened during that interview no would ever know, but she was sad and subdued when she came out of that room some three quarters of an hour later. As though as she made her way very slowly and disconsolately upstairs there was fire in her eyes, and she poured floods of tears. Her friend and companion Joy St Clair was in her room brushing her hair, when she heard her friends step and called cheerfully:

"Is that you Gladys's dearest?—where have you been so long?"

"Down stairs with general Vivian," said Gladys in a voice like one who had been scolded unmercifully by some one and sounded too as if she had been crying bitterly, and Joy turned in sudden surprise the hair brush still in her hand.

"Why Gladys's what is the matter?"

"Nothing wrong with me," said Gladys's shortly, and was turning away, still sulking, when with one of her sudden impulses, she changed her mind, came back and threw her arms around her friends neck, and burst into a perfect tempest of sobs and tears.

"Oh, Joy, Joy, wailed the little girl as if she was repentant of some big sin she had been punished for. "I feel so sad, so terribly sad, so dreadfully dreadfully sad."

"Scared of what?" inquired Joy in growing bewilderment. "Oh Gladys's dear, what is it, what causes you to cry and act so. What has happened?"

"Oh it's terrible, terrible," sobbed Gladys's. "General Vivian called me into his room and told me that he heard that general Gertrudes whole band had been reported nearly wiped out during a massacre on Vantura river and he can't get any details as if there were any survivors or not. Oh dear oh, dear, what shall I do. We here are the only survivors."

"Poor little Joy was terribly distressed."

"Oh please, don't please don't, Gladys's darling," she pleaded sobbing too at the news, and covering her friends tear wet face with kisses. "Maybe the news is a false rumor."

"No it wasn't," cried Gladys's hugging Joy tight, "You are a brave and beautiful person and all have loved you. Some of us will have to go and spread the news. Jennie Turner has come here just this morning. Oh if it is true I cannot stand it I will die, I now I shall. Oh the hated enemy. The treacherous scoundrels. They laid ambush dressed as our own soldiers."

"Nobody can really be sure of that," said Joy reassuringly, "and probably general Vivian didn't really believe it either I'm sure he didn't. But I'll go out and investigate. So don't cry Gladys's. If it is true I'll notify Jennie Turner. she'll avenge it I know she will."

Jennie Turner was explaining to one of her followers a new rumor by the name of Eleanor Andrews the map of St Etheldreda. The day itself had been actually not, and with the noise of the battle nothing seemed very interesting. More than once the new girl had nodded in her chair and she was not making much progress with her studies, but Jennie went on patiently, placing herself every once in a while by a glance of the at the passing troops hurrying by outside. It had been a very no beginning of this month for so late, then a chilly fall should have started, and poor Jennie was very tired languid, and somewhat ill, and had been suffering from a little trouble with her eyes. For her the passed month while she had been away had been very trying, for she had been so long from her girl and boyscout friends of the princess that there had been no bright little faces to make the unaccompanied unaccompanied seem happy like to her—no child scouts to gladden the long hot days and evenings and nights with their merry chatter and loving caresses, and she had come on a return to be with them again. Her duties and a sporting had brought her success it is true and she had spent many a lonely hour in forming bright plans for the future, but even the prospects of possible fame could not make up for everything, and poor Jennie had been very lonely. But it was almost over now for she expected to see them come

What did it matter now that the days were not what did anything in the world to her and she would see her dearest friends any time.

"Who is it?" she asked, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

"Perhaps I may be able to find out for you," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?" "It's a girl," she said, and when she saw it was a girl, she said, "What is it?"

conclusion of the foreboding fact that the news had not really been all told, which made them cold and faint with apprehension.

General Haldonia Greathart who had moved up with new troops from his army had met the two on the way and was very kind, and now the two girls did not realize that some time after afterwards, Joy herself had grown very fond of her girl and boy scout companions during the few months that she had been in Gertrude's regiment, and he had a little conversation with general Charles Brown on the subject, when Joy had called at his headquarters on her way to notify Jennie Turner.

At last the location of general Vivians headquarters was reached, and Jennie with a wildly beating heart, followed her companion toward the road leading toward the building.

"We'll have to go to general Vivians headquarters," said Joy.

Jennie gave a little start.

"General Vivians's she repeated, why I thought Gladys's was at your own tent."

"No you did not understand what I told you. When I discovered through my investigations that Gladys's story was true, Angelina Pichee and all those who had fortunately remained in camp insisted in holding a meeting in the building with him at once. They didn't want to hold it in an open tent. I was sorry they wouldn't hold it in my tent, but under the strange circumstances I felt that I could not object."

"No indeed," said Jennie, "it would be terrible if Gertrude and all the others were gone too. General Vivian had been very good to all of us. Gertrude had written of him often to me in her telegrams."

"He's a perfect angel," said Joy, trying to smile, "and he has to be on a wonderful fancy to all of us. I never saw a man more utterly crushed and distressed than he was, after Gladys's burst of weeping over me. I went in to see him and he told me about the massacre. You understand it was a terrible thing. He was sending officers to various parts of the battle line that he met a patrol returning who had witnessed the horrible massacre. Gladys's tell me she had been complaining of a strange apprehension all day, but no one else knew anything about it."

"No Gladys never complains about anything, except to her self," said Jennie.

"I have seen that."

"Oh Joy I hope Gertrude and some of her followers will have escaped. They must have been exposed terribly to the fire of the machine gun if they had run into it."

"A shade of anxiety crossed Joy's face, but he said cheerfully:

"She and her band didn't get caught in the trap. They had followed a party of refugees, and when the refugees ran into the ambush, the girl and boy scouts risked all chances, and fought like lions to save them and got it terrible themselves and were routed into the river where they too were massacred in awful numbers who still fight desperately. One thing that comforts me is that the enemy who did it suffered frightful loss at the hands of Gertrude's band, a loss never before in the war suffered by them when assaulting the Rangers. Yet General Vivian does not seem to believe there is such a danger as all of them wiped out, as the ambush fight had not scarcely reached a much more stage when Gertrude's survivors were forced to retreat to boats and by swimming the river. He has given all patrol scout officers to orders to go out at all costs and find out the details, and of course we can't cut to sleep to night still we've found out Gertrude and many others are still alive."

"I can't help feeling a little uncomfortable at the idea of such a loss," said Jennie, coloring. "It's the worst disaster ever happened you see."

"I don't believe there is any need to worry on that score Jennie. We'll have to wait for developments. A big body of soldiers has gone out to find the rest if possible."

Jennie said no more, but her heart was burning with bitterness just to think of it, and in a few minutes they had turned in at the gates of general Vivians headquarters.

"What a beautiful old house!" exclaimed the girl, astonished and awed by the beauty of her surroundings in the midst of such a dreadful battle field. In spite of her anxiety and suspense.

Even it was quite the show of the battlefield, but so far it has suffered no harm. Here we are Jennie, you will excuse me if I don't go in with you. I'm afraid to go out scouting with Gladys to see how far the extent of the massacre is. At her corner Gertrude's aide-de-camp James Greenlee will be able to give us all the latest news."

James who had been waiting for them, came hurrying down the steps to meet them, and in another moment the little girl found both her hands in a warm friendly grasp, while a kind, bold voice said: "I'll be all right soon my dear. The scouting parties are doing well and we'll have you expect, and Miss Saunders has been asking for you all day."

Jennie gave a pang of relief, squeezed the boy's hands hard, and then turned and said good bye to Joy.

"I don't know how to show my gratitude," was all she managed to say, but she knew that accompanied the words said a great deal more, and Joy drove her into the house. The boy went led the way into the house, and upstairs to a pleasant room on the second floor. Jennie wondered a little however that general Vivian himself could be so, but she did not wish to inquire.

[illegible]

(The following information was obtained from the records of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.)

[illegible]

no. Still Jennie refused to go, and requested again she merely shook her head and Jane then glanced appealingly at Mildred Maxwell whose arm was in a sling. "It would be far best for you to go Jennie" Mildred finally said with cheerful decision. "None of us can expect any news as to the results of the massacre for some time to come, and any of us will send for you at any time any news comes in. I will ruin your health if you don't try and get some rest, and then what will sort us out, when she does return and asks for you, Jennie?"

Indeed her sister bore all this with the least of her jaw's twitching heart to core, since she had heard of the massacre these were the first painful words she had ever heard, all the others had been very good to her, but neither of them had or even could have said a single word of the time when Jennie's arm or her hands might return and prove they escaped. "From the disaster Jane Melfort was a tithbright sensible young girlscout official, and Jennie had always relied upon her more than any others even though Jane was sometimes foolish in her perilous dare devil adventures. Now she rose almost involuntarily.

Mildred nodded, and with a pray on her lips, Jennie left the room, followed by Jane herself...

"One of Gertrudes retainers has just come here. Everyone seems worried. Some of Gertrudes band about a hundred and sixty did survive, they say but "Lost" one of the others repeated. "Gertrude's hand lost. How very dreadful. Are you sure it's true."

This news seemed a fresh torture to the two girls. Out of the band of a part of it only a small part had only survived, only one hundred and a sixty out of fifteen hundred, and Gertrude lost, the girl scout leader of every one, and here she found a man who had not only been a female nurse but a nurse of men. As she washed her hands and smoothed her hair, why it was that Gertrude could not have escaped the enemy, she had often done so before. Perhaps Tamerlane's glandolinians were different from those of Manley, more treacherous, watchful and foxy. It was days and days that she said to herself, "I will never again be in a position like this. I get round this glandolinian army, and it was so immense she had been appalled."

"There is his exscumency general vivian!" Jennie inquired...2
He is outside like sitting on a bench. I've called to him twice, and I'm I'm afraid to do it again for he gets so gruff. Perhaps you alone wouldn't mind trying to get him to come in mine, as the supper has been on the table for over three hours three hours."

The next moment she had touched the General slightly on his arm. He lifted his head with a start, and stared at the young girl beside him for a full moment as if he did not see her.

"Come any way sir and try to eat."

With a long sigh, the general slowly rose to his feet, he advanced a few steps toward the door, then came back and laid his hand heavily on the child's

"Oh its my duty to remain up. You are younger and need the sleep. And you Did general Charles Brown tell you that he has telegraphed to general doesn't need them and will send his whole cavalry squadron, which will be here before ten this night. They'll scour the whole country and

Jennie held out her hands with a sudden impulse to the great general as she had done on the first time of her arrival when she saw him standing by

She had scarcely uttered the usual impulsive words when, she surely wished and left them unsaid for the general suddenly turned upon her with an

"There that will do, there is nothing to be sorry about. Now come in to see the first Girlscout that's ever catch with me."

"Your Excellency, excuse me sir, but had-----you heard about the number of people who have been slain by the boy and girlscoots during the

"Has anything been heard of Gertrude Angelina, whether she is not and the others?"

out of the first one.

Jennie felt relieved only slightly. Gertrude, and the others had been very good to Jennie, it would be too terrible for her if Gertrude and her but followers too had been massacred, but once on the return to her room Jennie had eyes and ears, and thoughts for nothing in the world except for the hopeful news of her return. It seemed to her that the quietness outside was as unusual as a calm before a dreadful storm, even the limbs and pine needles of the trees did not move a single bit now, and oh how hot it was, and was sweating, not a breath of air. But when she whispered her fears about her apprehension that a forest fire might come, Mildred answered encouragingly.

"We can't tell anything by this calm," she said. "It's only the natural course of the weather produced by these blazes an inward draft you understand as for news nothing had been heard of yet but I am sure something will turn up before morning."

It was after nine in the evening or night before general Charles Brown appeared. This time he was accompanied by a gentleman with heavy matted brown hair and a clever but stern face, whom Jennie suspected must be the famous Dargat so often heard of, the great "Army Specialist" who also caused so many defeats for the enemy.

"How my dear Miss Turner," said general Charles Brown kindly "Angelina Jennings will be requesting you to come with her in about half an hour or more. She is going to search for the lost ones, and she wishes you to help her. Bring all the others here along, and be sure you're well-armed."

Jennie rose obediently for she was a great friend of Angelina Jennings and her sister.

"Where's Dolores. Was she caught in the massacre too?" "No she didn't go out she's in no condition too fortunately. She's at or in her own tent down the road a bit. You can see if if her if you want to."

Jennie turned, and with a heart that was almost breaking, she left the room closely followed by the others. Outside the door Jennie almost tottered and then leaned against the wall, feeling suddenly very giddy and faint. Indeed it seemed to her and the others too that nothing would ever be heard of the lost ones, and with an exclamation of pity Jane (Calamity Jane) gathered Jennie in her arms.

"Please don't take it so hard," she murmured, as Jennie with one great tearful sob laid her aching head against Jane's shoulder. "Why don't you try and make yourself cry. It surely would do you the best of good."

"I can't cry," said Jennie desperately but in a hoarse whisper. "I'm just choked up. I've tried to but it won't come. If they all have been massacred we'll be all alone, terribly alone in the world."

Jane tightened her clasp perceptibly.

"Jennie dear," she said very tenderly though she felt grieved too. "Continue to pray and beseech Our Blessed Mother to intercede with her blessed Son with us, to help us bear this trouble, and to cause the reports to be true."

"I have, I have but now it seems useless. It is true for starting but badly wounded. As good as we all are yet it sometimes seems as if we cannot even then get our prayers always answered. So many good people have perished in this country because of the war, and therefore how do we expect to escape them. I can't always feel sure that God does things for us if it is not for our good."

"You are right Jennie," said Mildred. "We don't understand, and it isn't always best for us that all our prayers should be granted, but he always does answer them if they're all right, and now before we accompany Angelina Jennings I'm going to request a favor of you."

Jennie raised her head with sudden surprise at this, and said: "I'll do anything I can for you, for you have been so good to me always. I won't refuse anything for you."

"It is not exactly for me," said Jane smiling. "Well in one way it is, and then in another way it isn't. I want you to go outside and try and comfort poor General Vivian. He's awfully distressed and won't come in."

"To comfort General Vivian," exclaimed Jennie, seeming rather frightened. "Oh no Jane I don't believe I could do that—he might not wish to have me bother him in his own grief."

"Try and find out whether he wants your company or not," said Jane most reassuringly. "I've served with General Vivian for more than three years, and I understand him and am more acquainted with him more than most others are. He is always gruff and short in all his manners sometimes, but bless you he never means anything by that. He's that way now because of the disaster. For all of us he's got the most loving heart in all the world, and he just about loves us as if we were his very own."

General Vivian was sitting in the same spot where she had found him when she called him in to supper, and with his face between his hands. He too felt that if the news did come in it might decide the fate of all of those who went out. There was a slight sound beside him, and for a second time that early night the general raised his head to meet Jennie's gaze, and her eyes too were filled with a nameless grief and misery. However this time the general did not stare at her as he did before, but rose at once to his feet.

"Is there anything Jennie that I can do for you?" he asked in a voice that Jennie scarcely recognized it was so low and gentle.

"No," said Jennie in a rather very unsteady voice. "It's not that—I did not come for anything—but I'm afraid of impending horrors I am very lonely and unhappy, and I thought—thought—you might also be very unhappy too, you seem so fond of us all."

"Fond of you all," the general repeated slowly, and there was a strange ring in his voice, and a stranger gleam in his eyes. "I think I am just as fond of them, as I am of myself, and of everybody but one." Jennie now came a step nearer, she was not afraid of general Vivian any longer.

"Is that one Gertrude Angelina?" she asked softly.

The general gave a violent start.

"Which one, Miss Angelina Aronburg?"

"You."

"What do you know about Miss Angelina Aronburg?" he demanded sharply.

"Not much except that my little dead sister, Francis is just like her. Jane told me that, and I thought that in why you cared so much for Gertrude."

"Jane told you that did she? What Jane?"

"Jane Melfort."

"Calamity Jane they call her. What else did she tell you?"

There was no ending the steady sharp gaze of those blue eyes, but Jennie met the gaze without flinching, she had nothing to fear, she had as much authority as he did.

"That's all," she said quietly.

"She didn't tell you anything else, good. But didn't she ever tell you that the Glandelinians, the heartless brutes they are murdered one of her younger sisters because she chose to do as she saw fit to strive to free child slaves over two years ago. She didn't tell you why Gertrude became a spy and scout, and done all this for the cause?"

"No," said Jennie, "she never told me that. She didn't dare."

"Why?"

"Gertrude didn't want anything said of her past?"

"Well it is in greater danger than Violet, and her sisters are. This massacre is something that won't bear conversing about, and that I cannot forgive myself for not investigating and refusing to allow her to go that way with her troops."

With one of her sudden impulses, Jennie held out both her hands to the general.

"I'm so sorry," she said. "I wish I could say something to comfort you."

"It doesn't beside me," said general Vivian, abruptly, waving her toward the bench on his right side. "Now then suppose you tell me something about your own self. If Gertrude, if she doesn't doesn't never return, and she and her whole band had been destroyed—you say you'll tell as if you're alone in the world?"

Jennie nodded, she dared not trust herself to speak.

"You must have some regiment of boy and girls—surely somewhere of your own."

"I have a few regiments near general Hanson's army, but they're under the command of matrons and leaders. Gertrude and I have been the best of friends since we met. She had been with me since my father died."

"Gertrude told me you have two other sisters living. How about them—have they not entered the army as Scouts?"

"No sir, they're too young," they don't now much about military life," said Jennie with a slightly discolored, color. "My regiment only accepts girls and boys only—between ten and of age, not as young as these under Gertrude."

"And your sister are the Flamings I suppose?"

"No sir, they're the Hungers too. My sister belonged to them and was slain in an adventure with me. Violet, and her sisters nearly two years ago. I am not sure about my dear brother. He stayed at home, and I've not heard from him since, because all communications are destroyed."

"Him by the big flood I suppose."

"No, no, no, by the destruction of railroads and so forth by these fires. He couldn't come because he is too young too and yet has to stay with mother."

"There was a short pause, general Vivian gazed rather nervously with his fingers on the bench. He was the first to continue the conversation.

"What made you join the army as a Scout?" he demanded abruptly.

Jennie hesitated. Then she said:

"Because I loved adventure."

"I would to face such perils for that cause," she continued.

"My sister died from her wounds two minutes after being shot. I never cared to say any thing to any one else about it as the subject was a very painful one to me."

"Well to go back to Gertrude. How did she get caught into the ambush?"

"I suppose you'll believe it very strange," she said but really I do not know."

"Don't know the cause of the massacre? Well that's a queer state of things. She didn't even mention by what route she was going to any of her friends. She didn't even mention by what route she was going to any of her friends."

"She told Dolores but I haven't seen her yet. She loved her so dearly."

A wave of some very strong emotion swept over general Vivian's face and for a moment his hand trembled visibly, but Jennie was too preoccupied with her own own thoughts to notice it. Then he continued, and his voice shook in spite of all his efforts at self control.

"She loved all of us you say—loved us all dearly to the last, in spite of everything."

Jennie gave a sudden start. Indeed something in the manner of the poor general suddenly believe made her believe it to be mighty odd. She gave one quick glance into his white set face, and the next moment had started impulsively to her feet.

"You are ill, let me do something for you. Oh I'm sorry if I had said anything to hurt you. I forgot you had lost your dearest friends in that cruel massacre. Oh please forgive me and let me do something to help you."

"Good old horse!" The boy said stooping to pat the animal's head. He was officers and men not engaged threw themselves down to rest. An half hour after the troops came up. The guns captured from the enemy were brought in and the great baggage train captured in the village organized for their service.

There were at this distance so much for these balloons, the batteries was and some of the in the of the Christian heavy in battery was at a distance of 1000 yards from the road, still in the air.

[illegible]

"Our boys and girls couldn't face the terrible fire of the Glandilins machine gun," he said. "We managed to save some of the refugees by rushing to the front again and again, but the machine guns were mowing them down by hundreds, and we finally had to retreat. We seized boys which could be helped to the enemy and filling them showed off even under 11/17

I feel I don't know my own language as well as I do in English. It is interesting.
I could shoot it at home, and I can't do it now. In that way, I know, through a small amount of smoke, I can't do it. I can't do it through a number of the Mandelins with my family name and escaped though they persecuted me. Finally afterwards was able to collect my survivors. It was the most terrible experience in my life.
I was the most terrible experience in my life. I was the most terrible experience in my life.

In the meantime many Glendolinites were found in hiding in the town of Yantam and these were as soon as identified with the general all hung or shot before the firing started. Then the general Jim Fearlion arrived with two hundred and seventy Glendolinites and men a part of his army, who had been ordered to march to meet the incoming reinforcement, for Glendolinites force was easily depleted by loss in battles, by heat stroke, and by other horrid causes. A portion of the army marched against the Glendolinites position near at night, day every heart beating at the thought of engaging the Glendolinites at this section who was five million strong. The attacking force however, by the courage of courage, as the approach of the attacking force, however, by the courage of these Glendolinites, the courage of their officers didn't maintain, and they recoiled from the advanced position, after resisting on only several minutes leaving behind them, the guns, baggage, many wounded men, and immense droves of horses. The munitions were blown up and the captured tents of the camp all burned, and the prisoners made to face a firing squad.

CHAPTER SEVEN.
THE THIRD YEAR OF THE WAR AND TOWARD THE END OF THE THIRD AND GOING ON FOURTH YEAR TO SEPTEMBER, AND AGAIN THE RECOGNITION OF THE THRILLING TIMES OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS IN THE REALMS OF THE UNREAL, OR THE FIERCE GLANDIC-ANGELICAN WAR, CAUSED BY THE CHILD SLAVE REBELLION.
BY J.M. DARGES.....

THE COMPLETE STORY OF THE WORSE OF THE VIVIAN WICKET HORROR!
WRITTEN ABOUT THE EXPERIENCES OF THE GENERALS AND CONCENTRICAN
ARCHBISHOPS LEADING TO THE CAPTURE OF THE CITY AND OTHER IMPORTANT POINTS IN THE HANDS OF THE ENEMY.

Many incidents of the awful siege, tornadoes of cannon fire, F, Flood of humanity, and cyclonic war disasters, personal experiences of many survivors. , terrible letting of thousands of mangled dead bodies, and the battles from houses to houses in streets and alleyways of besieged city; horrible pestilences from sea land, decaying bodies unburied, thousands of barge captians compelled by armed men to tow millions of dead bodies to Galvordian seas. Millions of billions of dollars raised to aid the suffering survivors Hanson Vivian orders army rations and army tents issued to millions of survivors and orders a many armies to protect the city and people and pri property from being in hands of foe again, Tales of horrified survivors from Vivian iskey of awful battles inside the city, awful explosions, wrecked homes adrift on rivers, many acts of valor. Many Ang Libian soldiers drowned, Great heroism, great vandalism; Gw Great horror, a second most terrible battle of the war but worse, hundreds of thousands of men women and children drowned, no way of escape for any;

DEATH ! DEATH EVERYWHERE.

Special Sheet.

THE PAGE AT THIS TIME

Where in the name of jumping ... in that ...

2254.

CHAPTER ONE.

VOLUME SEVEN

THE GREAT GLOINIA OR AN ANGELINIA AGATHIA CAMPAIGN IN ANGELINIA. THE WAR IN THE ...

On June the eleventh general Givania had concentrated his badly worn out armies after a many days marching near Evangelino St. Alare Angelina. General Joseph McWhirther had been defeated in severe fighting at Big Betty Pass after he contending for four days against the Glandelinians under the Red Swishenackere. In the fury of the conflict he did exactly what Jackson did at Chancellorsville deliberately weakened his center to force his men around to crush Swishenackere flank. It was a success as matters went and the Angelinians after repulsing many frightful charges with a deadly cannon fire carried their success into the very heart of the enemy's line. The Glandelinians had been badly beaten and routed with heavy loss but McWhirther had been mortally wounded while urging his men into that overwhelming rush that was Swishenackere's undoing.

However a few days later after continued carnage day and night all along other parts of the line a general who took McWhirther's place rallied them on but when a Federal came to the rescue of Swishenackere and great columns with hundreds of thousands of glowing bayonets were thrown upon the Christians amid the most dreadful carnage! All that forenoon of the fourth day of the battle the carnage progressed southward then after marching all morning Hansonin sprang to their aid to rescue general Archburg.

All of Hansonin's first divisions rushed in to support that wailing and shouting line. When twenty color bearers had fallen one after another general Archburg seized the flag. He fell and was mortally wounded, and despite it all he still held it in his grasp as he faced the enemy. Many corps had all their field officers down and scores of divisions had been annihilated or decimated, and mangled armies showed horrible bloody losses. Hansonin had seen two divisions of another Glandelinian corps approaching like a storm to crush in his right and saw the twentieth corps coming up to face Archburg who however delivered his blow with such a hellish shock that the twentieth corps was crushed to fragments could not hold. The formation of the battle line had broadened to a fan shape many times there being a mixture of purple and red and gray in frightful pandemonium. Now the overwhelming Glandelinian artillery broke forth in the roar of a single voice in the support of some Federal's whirlwind attack. The whole scene for miles and miles became a slaughter of hell. The Christian guns utterly outnumbered, hundreds of battery horses killed strived against uneven odds in a furnace of fire.

Tongues of lightning lightning from thousands of bursting shells spattered the dead, dying and wounded and mangled about like melting butter struck with a knife blade. At parts where the smoke drifted away the Glandelinian battle flags fluttered victoriously and a tumult of bayonets pierced and disjointed lines of new to death, lines broken, into lurches and scattered melted away, while here and there those who did not in vain used to show the teeth and fiery tongue of hell once more in desperate resistance to the oncoming sea of graveyards flushed with success who again dislodged them.

Hansonin saw as well thank heaven that this situation did not occur before his fifth and seventh corps of Angelinians regained lost ground on the left side and were up to where they would have been jeopardized. As a river current pressed back the left tide the Glandelinians regained the lost ground, and the Glandelinians amid a hail storm of little preternatural carnage surged back over it, other reserves help to retake it, again it was lost. With the Angelinians it was a case of hastily mending breaks of patching weak points before they break. Every section sent in was instantly engaged but at last the Glandelinians held the ground for keeps while alone to point they were pressing close to Federal ridge. Hansonin is riding back and forth almost too had hands a handsome to be read and so quick of mind saw a gray wedge a portion of Federal's right about to pierce the line despite the fierce resistance they met.

"T Z Stop those yelling buhuman fiends!" He shouted; "Give them hell!"

The these Angelinians sprung from their trenches and threw themselves in a contemptible bay tackle against that wedge in gray which staggered under the impact. When their rush was spent all but five hundred thousand more were down. Nevertheless the Glandelinians pierced the line at another point despite every christian reserve that was rushed against them pell-mell. Forward to right or left they faced a terrific wall of rifle bullets and volleys of terrible shells which engulfed them in destruction. Hannas battery was hurled forward under a baptism of fire in a Niagara of carnage! The christian line however was being rifled and soon Henton fell dead. General Burns rallied the men repelling assault after assault until also killed by the Glandelinian sharpshooters who also mortally wounded general Miller whose battery was put out of action by the terrible fire of the Glandelinian gun-oh. Another leader by the name of Pech brought up reinforcements the christians being in fiercer action from the revenge over the loss of their officers. The advantage of position was with them and they had the confidence that comes with seeing the ribbon on the rope in hell's t up of vanguard over to their side.

The Glandelinian Confederates along this point fell back crushed and mangled but the main columns continued their onslaughts making terrific roaring charges. The Glandelinians lost hundreds of thousands of upon thousands of thousands but they cleared the fields time and again by striking the flank. Into the shell torn fire swept wooded regions the Glandelinians assailants poured. Open spaces were bullet swept, saplings were cut in two by the hail of minnie balls, trees were bullet peppered and incinerated by shell burst, while at close quarters a fusillade of canister mangled and mangled all human flesh that got in its way. A rush here a rush there, from the cover of rocks and trees slipping in the flood of their fallen comrades as they went the Glandelinian Glandelinians advanced with the ferocity and cunning of tigers.

Hard to hand over the stonebreastworks, the scene becoming like two armies of savage cannibals in a death struggle. Angelinian gunners were surrounded, and fought with hand pikes, rammers, infantry pikes, and even stones and flats and baskets were used as weapons. The Glandelinian tigers along this point who went into action with seventeen hundred thousand, had only one hundred thousand remaining and when they forced the line all along the front the struggle along new fronts became terrific. All along the line a drum of horror proceeded among rocks and trees and slowly, at stubbornly Hanson's center had to yield as reinforcements drawn from Federal's interior line accumulated their force against him bending the line dangerously near to Hanson's rear. Along the whole firing line vastiridescent clouds of smoke spread and thousands of murderous shells burst everywhere. The merciless conflict kept up an unceasing roar while cannon after cannon exploded amid the yell that broke in exultation along the whole gray line. Sweet to the ears of the Angelinians was the scream of their own shells over their heads against the Glandelinian batteries playing on the end of it against their assailants. Shell shells were now coming into the flank of the Angelinians; they started to bend away from it only to get shells in the other flank.

Then roaring storms of rifle fire came rippling into their lines. Volleys from the front and from the flank and now canister added to the shells cutting swaths as clean as the mower. A long line of Angelinian artillery and infantry in front of Arontburg's brigades which was at the head of the onslaught were hanging on a precipice edge as it were, and striking their last desperate blows against these yelling plunging maddened gray figures that came on in myriads. General Mahones battery had only one gun remaining the leader having had his abdomen opened by a shell fragment and as he fired the last charge he dropped dead. Through the struggling gray line which had been partially driven back came the new divisions of reserves at a charge. Arontburg dropped pierced by forty bullets while four thousand men were shot down as if in execution. From both flanks now seeing the day is won the Glandelinians pressed on with the ardor of victory.

The whole column of Angelinians faced about retreating under fire across the open field. Meanwhile Hancock's cavalry riding to strike Thomas Federal's rear had been repulsed by Iron, Rogers and Kilpatrick's troops in a picturesque and a savage shock of calms and herons in the rear of Big Betty Mass. There was no word now for general Weldon Hanson from any quarter and his great heart was broken. Everywhere came the flash

Where in the name of jumping can will is that confounded man I had this of swarming bayonets the enemy carrying all before them. It was a total rout and Weldon their main leader that is Weldon's son Weldon was mortally wounded in attempting to check it.

THE NATION AGAIN IN PERIL. HANLEY'S ACTIONS.

In the meantime general Vivian learned from wireline that Buchanan Hanley to make maneuvers that would be disastrous to Angelinia had sent Mosmann's army to make another drive toward Pandoria the eastern boundary of fire and devastation swept Calvernia, while picknell Mosmann and Cannon were also to separate and to strike separately but simultaneously against Arontburgville. General Mosmann Hanley himself proposed to strike against Moro Vivian to prevent him from interfering with these drives. General Vivian was indeed jeopardized for he had no means to repel the separate divisions each of which was one quarter the size of his own army and well fed on stolen rations while his armies were suffering terribly from the results of the wide spread forest fires caused recently by Raymond Richardson Federal and by the losses in the stubborn fighting at Mc-Holteater run. To separate his columns like Hanley did was dangerous because Hanley made this movement because he had forces ten times the size of his own and the one he was leading now was far superior to his own. He could not get aid from Hanson because he had been worried by Thomas Federal and Switzer cracker and mortally wounded in the far east and Hanson's forces itself with him were too small to make much reinforcements.

"This is all on account of that Berger and his old picture." He said bitterly. "I wonder how it could be recovered."

He went at once to general Berger's headquarters and requested him to make out some means for the recovery of the picture.

"How am I going to recover it, your excellency?" Said general Berger sadly. "I have tried various means, invaded the Glandelinian Public Libraries, and no one but without success. As it is fair in war I would have seized the book of newspapers the picture was in but I could not trace it though I examined book after book. It was in some date of either June, fifteen eleven or fifteen twelve."

"June fifteen eleven or fifteen twelve." Said general Vivian sharply and with urgent suspicion. "I thought you recovered the picture from her waist?"

"I did but I lost it. I had recovered another in a newspaper that told of the tragedy, which was also stolen with many others I had. General Phelan an Angelinian traitor had something to do with the murder and feared that I would expose him so no doubt he stole the picture so no evidence could be made against him."

"Ahem! a traitor hey. Well I'll be bound. He must be captured at all cost. What Glandelinian army is he in?"

"A division of Raymond Richardson Federal's army, your excellency. He goes under the name of Tamerlinia but that is not his name at all. He is one of the worse men next to Thomas and Raymond Richardson Federal."

"Humph! could you describe the murder?"

"Yes your excellency. I was then a Glandelinian child laborer, poor but much against my will as I was compelled. Federal governed all the slave houses in Calvernia and Phelan was his mayor. When the Child Labor Revolution broke out this little girl was elected a leader by the child rebels and by her gallantry she made rapid progress which enraged Phelan who got permission from Federal to murder her in cold blood. I was the witness of the most blood-drenching crime ever committed in Calvernia. Annie Arontburg habitually in her nighties had been probably occupying her mind for some time by planning for victory when the brute seized her by the hair which was loose and flourished a razor about her face. The screams and attitudes of the poor child had the effect of changing the probably guilty feeling of the assassin into those of wrath and instantly he began to choke her tearing her nighties tatters then with one determined sweep of his muscular arm he nearly severed her chest open with his razor. The sight of blood litened his anger into frenzy. Wishing his teeth and flashing fire from his eyes he flew upon the body of the unknown child and imbedded his fearful talons in her throat retaining his grasp until she expired. I had tried my best to stop him but a struggle with such a furious giant was useless and he got away after trying in vain to shoot me down. I called the police secured the picture for a special use and went off to report the deed to the American Civil Liberties Committee. Not long after I lost both pictures one after the other.

2257.

"How old was the child?"
"That I do not know your excellency. She was as pretty as an angel though and graceful in her manners. She had been one of my workers. I had requested her not to join in the repelling telling her that it was dangerous as Federal and his aids were fearful of her but she only answered that she would be willing to die for the children's freedom. I and the little girl had been great friends and I longed for the picture as a memory of her."

"How then is it that the loss of the photo photograph of the picture also is responsible for the situation of this war?" Asked general Viviania rather hotly.

"That is a mystery your excellency, even to me."
"That mystery has gotta be solved, if you wish for me to regain the picture you lost." Said general Viviania fiercely. "You ought to have placed the picture in the hands of the Angelinian government for security then this would not have occurred. Are you a Christian or just serving my army for revenge?"

"I'm a perfect Angelinian and nothing else I had have no love for the enemy of my country." Answered Dargar. "I belong to the St. Anthony Parish."

"Do you pray for the recovery of the stolen picture?"

"I have offered a petition for its return."

"What reason have you to say that. You mean requested a petition?" Continued general Viviania with a serious look. "What is the donation?"

"$2,000,000, your excellency."

"Where are you going to send it?"

"To the place I requested the petition. I have only done this last March however."

"I'll tell you what can be done." Said general Viviania looking seriously at him. "You have showed me great service during the war since your entrance with a great honor at Cedronia by your brave deeds, befriended the Vivian girls in their need and saved them from peril. It is to my idea that the wicked Tamerline general knows something about this and Federal too. If you will try to cause Tamerline's capture I will try to locate the picture. This is the only way. They got to be found or my armies are ruined."

"I will do my very best your excellency. I would like to have help though."

"The Vivian girls will render all the aid needed." Said general Viviania.

"And also will their guardian Evans. Go to them. Tell them off your plans."

Saluting general Dargar withdrew with a better hope than he ever had before.

THE PAGE AT THE END OF THE BOOK

Where in the name of jumping was it that the... was... and... was...

2258.

the Angelinians decimating their columns frightfully. The Angelinians raised their 'devil yell' to its highest pitch came on with irresistible fury and even far rains of pikes and bayonets and... did not stop them and they started to carry all before them. They surged among the lines of cannoncutting down the gunners and hurling back the infantry after a furious counter attack had toward. The Angelinians strove madly to hurt back the assault on they came with their lines fairly roaring with fire. General Viviania from his observation point saw this danger and concentrated all his available batteries upon his assaulting columns mowing down multitudes. This fire made a temporary check but more divisions came to the aid and general Viviania had to concentrate all of his best divisions upon the threatened point and for four hours the roar of cannon and musketry seemed to split the heavens and defy the very gods there with the din. The battle indeed now was very terrific and extended already for a sixteen miles. The Angelinians surged again and again upon the blazing Christian lines like angry roaring storm waves but were broken and cut to pieces time and again with the thunder of thousands of cannons which stunned and almost drove to frenzy and insanity the survivors.

General Dargar's Mc-Pollister crushed his lines again against the Masonic front which was assaulting Viviania right with titanic violence and great superhuman vehemence and he went down mangled and bleeding being mortally wounded.

The slaughter was horrible even for the assailants and two great divisions of Angelinians lay cut up and mangled reposed in corpse vastness a conglomeration lying cut down by the Angelinian cannon by the hundred thousand. The Christian line now began to press forward with irresistible force over the body at twin fields and through the smoke filled plains forcing the foe to stop by step and paving the ground with the dead and wounded in prayer. Seeing the turn in events general Vanley massed ten thousand and one hundred cannon upon the Angelinians and wiped out columns after columns with his terrible storm of shrapnel and high explosive shells. Not only was this done but general Vanley's army was massed against his forces upon the whithering purple line and the clash was terrible but the Angelinians outnumbered him and pressed on across the plains which became like a roaring volcano volcanic crater. Thousands upon thousands went down mangled and lying as simply at every yard and now suffering intolerable losses the Angelinians began to flag before the enemy's fire which threatened them with annihilation.

The left of the column gave way in confusion but the other two held firm in a storming volcano of flame and din until reinforced by two large battalions and general Vanley's corps. The battle is having already raged all that morning and now in full swing. One heavy attack after another was launched by heavy columns of Angelinians but the gray wedges stood against the Christians and the most frightful carnage. General Viviania's whole right wing was advancing against general Vanley's left but it failed to force the line at any point the withdrew during the twilight. One remarkable incident during the second day of the battle is when heaven and earth seemed to be going to pieces from the din of cannons and musketry with the bravery of general Dargar.

In the midst of the battle field was a large barn which had in a tape picture of the Archangel Michael pictured or painted on the outside and which was the headquarters of general Dargar the Angelinian butcher. Against these gray wedges Dargar threw his forces with might and main but was repelled with serious losses and he at himself was almost shattered dead by the cannonading thunder of the Angelinian guns and showers of musketry. By sheer force of numbers he managed to force the enemy's lines but Dargar threw his fresh divisions to the rescue and after a bloody hand to hand fight lasting an hour which resembled borders of cannibals at war with each other the Angelinians were again driven back but a shell blew a part of the barn to pieces and Dargar was severely wounded by the fragments. The picture was unharmed. Two more times Dargar made terrific onslaughts with the same result. Dargar went into the action with not eight hundred thousand men and lastly one hundred thousand. But several times as he was Dargar tried a general assault being bound to capture the picture at all cost. The result was that his columns met frightful annihilation, the battle alone being a line being terrible. However he made temporary success. He left a large piece of the enemy's line in front of the barn and cut it to pieces. Matters looked pretty serious for the Angelinians and Dargar's left was rolled up in confusion and put out of commission entirely.

General Sir S. S. Schloeder came to the scene however reinforcing the point forced at the left wing with heavier columns of infantry and artillery and after much gun guinary fighting for four hours in which there was a panorama of bloody horror the Angelinian columns were thrown and back mangled torn, battered and bleeding.

The other columns reinforced by Schloeder was too heavily outnumbered to contend with successfully and margin found himself hard pressed for many miles.

However Manley came to the aid of his main divisions again at Marger and Schloeder. The struggle was fearful but the Angelinians held for an hour until the other divisions, most of one hundred thousand were reduced to remnants and the main line was overlapped. Then the Angelinians receded in utmost confusion Schloeder being killed as he tried to rally a column near the farm.

The late Angelinians rallied behind their works and repelled all the assaults that the enemy made. Ten desperate onslaughts were made against the rocks but every column that came within the range of the christian fire literally melted away. Marger wounded he was but retained his command and launched the second assault with terrific fury but the whole line withered the survivors falling back in great confusion.

In the third assault Marger threw forward one of his main divisions which in the fierce storm of charge played the line at the center but were engulfed in a vortex of massacre in contending with the other columns right and left and only a few thousand of the five hundred thousand escaped death but were made prisoners. The whole division being wiped out. Marger however was still engaged but he could do nothing for he had no more troops to get large forces from Manley and these made a head long charge while the christian trenches were filled by a curtain of artillery fire. The Angelinians edged away from the annihilating artillery fire but to the general Edmondson's division a great number of the troops they seemed literally run into the mouth of hell as fierce was the resistance they met. They managed to break the line however and poured through a storm of mill-mines and a tumultuous wall of bayonets. In fact they could have won the whole christian line back and not paid the price of a first infuriated concentration. At his death the christian line was mangled and killed. Their works were still intact but the works being covered with the dead and wounded of both sides. General Edmondson's main columns were withdrawn to the rear and seeing that the christian line was thinned considerably Marger launched another assault but the whole division was literally torn to shreds by a severe concentrated artillery fire and driven back by a furious demonstration that lasted an hour.

His other divisions however but seeing that he had many fresh divisions at hand and that the christian line was badly reduced he decided to try again. This time he concentrated a great force along the whole line simultaneously and which was kept kept up for over an hour with unceasing fury. His losses became terrific for his men faced the deadliest fire and again he withdrew though he had succeeded in clearing the line slightly at the left. The seventh assault was more determined and cleaved the christian right but the other columns were reduced by a terrific full scale bombardment of artillery from a new quarter and were forced to give it up leaving in hundreds of prisoners in the hands of the Angelinians.

General Edmondson led this assault which made the conflict extremely fierce in the region of the farm itself and he declared after words that it was like another Iwo Jima scene in action. The Angelinians were driven back the line but not such a lot of men of fire from the christian batteries and cannon that they went down in thousands and were forced to flee the battle weary and mangled their mangled columns like an eggshell and causing the loss of many of the officers.

General McWhorter had been mortally wounded in trying to rally the divisions and general McFarmer who succeeded him rallied a line but it could not stand and it was swept aside like chaff. Hemo and McFarmer being down among the works just as they lunged their entire divisions through the front of the Angelinians who tried to lance them with a pike. The column with only a few thousand survivors were also withdrawn to the rear and now Marger began to see that he was in a perilous position. He sent an appeal to Manley. As he was throwing forward four divisions to a madman heading assault general Edmondson McFarmer arrived with one million elite hundred thousand men and Artillery with a battalion which was sent back by Marger and until the assault was over. Had he put these into action at the right time he would have made great success but at this point another thing turned up. While the assault of the four divisions was in progress the heaviest cannon were still withdrawn and placed into a situation as to toward McFarmer's and Aronson's columns before they came into action. So heavy was the slaughter that McFarmer's column receded across the Angelinian run in confusion but Aronson's army was caught in the ground and met annihilation the Angelinian commander being blown to pieces by a bang-bang-bang. At the same time nearly five hundred rushing guns were concentrated upon the four assaulting divisions and one of the them literally went to eternity in a short space of time. The others were mangled and crushed and as they fled and recoiled the Angelinians and Abbeinians rushed at them like an avalanche routing them like sheep and mowing down myriads.

Where in the name of jumping jacks is that newspaperman who has this manuscript?

Marger held a delirium over the situation but the pen and staff do charged that it was worth trying again as he had no more fresh divisions at hand while the line of purple coats was becoming terribly thin and received no reinforcements as far as could be ascertained. Marger did not agree with the Angelinians had the dreaded Concentinians and Abbeinians forces with them who made the trenches a regular hornet's nest. But as they began to crumble and complain he decided to try another assault. This was made by five divisions under Marger who was supported by a miscellaneous artillery fire of nine hundred guns. Despite the thickness of their line the Angelinians outnumbered these divisions and met them like a break water meets the series of waves one after another.

The quarters of the five divisions dotted the ground where they fell but the above mentioned divisions solidly wedged swept upon the Angelinians like an avalanche rolling back one of the wings and crossing the entire line of trenches. This resulted in a general blow of firing that lasted fully an hour, and men on both sides went down in tens of thousands but the Angelinians made a terrific counter assault. Marger was wounded in the middle of his head to head combat the Angelinians being cut down in their tracks and the remaining but in plight general Marger being made a prisoner as he with hundreds of thousands of others fell inside the christian works.

General Marger was disencouraged at this outcome and decided to give up. "Why now throw the whole force upon them at once," advised general Edmondson. "I have no more," "You may succeed then," "No," "I have no more," "Put it would again result in such horrible losses," "I hate to do it," "I believe I'll let them attack," "I do not believe they will," "I do not believe they will," "I believe Godfrey's plan is the wisest. Why not concentrate and overlap at the same time?"

General Marger did not consider it was a wise plan but he acted anyway and managed within four hours to get his whole army in motion and move forward to the attack. Heavy batteries of all kinds of cannon dominated his columns but on they charged though whole lines melted away. The crush was as successful as it was terrific. The Angelinians overlapped on two sides gave way abandoning the works amid a sea of hellish destruction. The Angelinian right wing being hammered to pieces halted at the rear pressed on. At this critical moment Marger received a second wound which disabled him and caused him intense pain. For an hour the christian line tried to hold but now the Angelinians again drove them back over the works and to the distance of more than three miles. Another division came to their aid but the works could not be taken in the engagement and were only abandoned when general Edmondson ordered the withdrawal of the main right wing. The engagement with Marger and Marger was the hottest engagement of that second day's battle with sides suffering unknown losses.

At the next day fighting began early in the morning and during the hours of fighting the Angelinians were driven from the christian front. At the same time general Edmondson advanced on Marger striking him in the flank and throwing three of his divisions into confusion. Marger's army itself crushed to pieces was driven back for some distance when the timely arrival of Hemo and Edmondson's divisions turned the tide of battle. The fresh troops advancing with Palmer's divisions struck Chickama's flank and thrust him back in disorder. Artillery corps Aronson's troops attacked it at the same time in front and recaptured all the works which the christian general Marger had during the second day's battle. While Chickama's was thus engaged and was retreating in the wildest confusion general Edmondson's divisions of Medunne corps coming from the Angelinian left to support Chickama's attempted in vain to drive Aronson's from his advanced position. Edmondson's brigades advanced five in turn being in vain. In one hour's fighting Edmondson's four hundred thousand men had only officers and was then withdrawn. Edmondson took his place and charge.

gallantly through a plain that extended across his front where he encountered a terrific fire from all arms. Unable to get his own artillery into position the christian leader on his front and on his right flank, poured murderous storm and confusion of crops and conflict into his ranks. Staggered for a moment the brave condottieri again pushed forward until the strength of the christian position and a fresh attack on the right compelled them to retreat with frightful losses. Pasternak now relieved Brown and with Zimmerman's support succeeded in driving the christians in front beyond the Aurale Run road. Already the fighting extended far up general Vivian's line and by 11 o'clock Murrie and Mitchell had become involved in the struggle and the entire Glandelinian left was engaged with the exception of two brigades of cavalry which held the extreme left of Norfolk's army west of Nine Pines.

On the christian line during the most sanguinary fighting a division after division had been sent in unbroken line of all. Each in its turn amid frightful slaughter had driven the enemy and then outflanked had been thrust back. The arrival of of unbroken line finally stayed the progress of the Federal advance on the right of the battle where the picture still stood in the center of the right wing.

In the center the Glandelinian confederals had gained considerable advantage. The shells from their batteries almost reached general Pannum's headquarters. In support of the weakening center of the right wing Nelson's divisions arrived on the field and went into furious action immediately driving the enemy steadily.

Panner had been put in jeopardy by the failure of Prussian to maintain his position but the advance of the Glandelinian and confederates and the attempt to attack the flank was checked by general Nolan who driven back upon a elevation but finally turned four hundred guns and began to pour into the advancing Glandelinian a storm of fire that threw them back in disorder.

This attack which had for a time broken the center on Vivian's right began on Vivian's right after Chickama had been repulsed, and now there was a lull in the battle in front of the right grand division for about an hour during which Dargers and Aronburg reorganized their commands and were withdrawn to a strong position on the left grand division in which direction Aronburg looked for the next attack. The Glandelinians however advanced some distance farther to the right and Dargers and Aronburg's troops were hurried off to pandora's paradise driving fast in time to prevent serious disaster.

The Glandelinians had crossed the Angelina and made a sudden and bloody unexpected charge upon Baird and August Agard and drove the christians a mile and a half taking twenty thousand prisoners and scores of guns before Dargers and Aronburg's troops arrived to crush and hurl them back. It was impossible to estimate the loss thus far though it was believed that the Glandelinians sustained the greater loss for they had little opportunity to get their artillery into action. Among the Angelinians Dargers and Aronburg suffered most severely. The former when flanked and driven back lost of a division of regulars one million, four hundred and eleven thousand strong in killed and wounded, two hundred and eighty nine of which were officers of lowest rank besides one hundred thousand others which were made prisoners and two strong bar batteries one of them shot last year these gallant defender of commander general Pettibone stood by his guns to the last falling into the hands of the enemy mortally wounded.

General Thomas' shattered general Scott's division to pieces out his defensive lines but there was delay and the fight was now on fiercer and extending along general Vivian's extreme center, when general Tributal and ten of his brigades arrived to the scene. One of Vivian's divisions of three hundred thousand men and two brigades of Glandelinians had been severely cut up having been exposed to an inflaming fire from the christians behind the breastworks and general Tully and most of his commanding officers had been killed.

The other Glandelinian brigades had advanced driving back the christian a under general Henry Aronburg but soon they were confronted by general Dargers left, now reinforced by Artists and Woodroff's Road. Woodroff's division and before two o'clock Vivian had been driven from the field. General Glynn advanced against the christian center with a better success. Owing to a blunder general Judas forces of confederates sustained a loss of five hundred thousand but they held firm under a storm of destruction and Glynn's division had to be withdrawing through his elements.

Where in the name of jumping Sam will is that confounded man T had this

The repulse of Vivian and Glynn was more than offset by the misfortune that befall the christian divisions on the right of Vivian's center. General Vivian's general Vivian to close up and support Dargers and William moved his division entirely out of line at double quick and passed to Dargers' rear. Thus you see a gap was made where none had existed and through this gap the Glandelinians poured throwing the entire christian center into awful confusion. General Cannon's columns came in just in time to take advantage of this break in the christian line caused by Vivian and Kilmoes sudden withdrawal. As his column penetrated the christian line Cannon's received a severe wound which was believed to be mortal and general Muldoon succeeded him in command. Undeterred by the death of their leader Cannon's men pressed their advantage and a great battle of killing fires, flanking Dargers on one side and Dava Davis' mortar on the other cutting off twenty brigades from the right and annihilating them and driving the other panic stricken columns to the rear. At the weak point the Glandelinians outnumbered the christians a five to one. Fearless five brigades were driven back with the loss of half their numbers and with every one of their colors in tatters.

Dargers' right was routed with the loss of every one of his batteries. Davis and Porter strove to make a stand but the Glandelinians advanced far to the right making resistance out of the question. General Meldons' army in fact lost half of the christian armor center had been swept from the field. General Vivian's main column alone was left to save the christian army from the complete humiliation of a disastrous rout. He had with him one of Puerby's brigades and the divisions of Aronburg, Hal Nemo and Nero and such remains of Dargers and Davis. Porters as had not been involved in the disaster and with this force he was face to face with the whole half of the Glandelinian army all concentrated upon his crushed and mangled center.

On the supreme christian center there was confusion at its worst. The whole center had been routed beyond reforming. General Johnson and Whelan had made a stand but sustained a terrible loss and repeated repulse. However general Vivian was just in time to enable his center to secure a safe retreat and though driven from the battle field the Angelinians had succeeded in shutting the Glandelinians out of Evangeline St. Clare.

THE STRUGGLE ALONG THE RIGHT

About the same time that general Vivian's center was cut to pieces and swept from the field major general Bernard Costelloe beheld a great army, three of the army corps commanded by Thomas Federal deploying themselves along the Annie and Zoe Allen Run, and he resolved to destroy it if he could, he himself attacking with all his vehemence in front and commanding Neptunes to form Vivian's right wing.

After a fearful struggle in which Tamerline came near being made a prisoner, the Glandelinians along Federal's left retired leaving a sea of dead and wounded in the field and frightful numbers of prisoners and cannon in the hands of the Angelinians. Federal then pushed fresh troops to the rescue of his crushed and mangled right wing, and upon the right grand division in an effort to lead the christian right wing a fight to recover their center which was vehemently assaulted and at a half past twelve at some point to him that the christians were not involved in the fight their right hand gave orders to Tamerline with new divisions to attack their center, to overwhelm it and rout the whole christian line. Then there raged a titanic struggle between Glandelinian and christian divisions, which was destined to fill the Angelinian world with admiration.

Here on the center the monstrous divisions under Alex's a Lox, Morgan Stout, Grouchy, Tamerline, Johnston McColister, Lyons, Costelloe and Frank led an attack upon the Angelinians with such crushing fury that for a time and the smothering storm of hell's damnation their single onslaught brought threw the whole christian line in the wildest uproar of bloodcurdling slaughter as ever seen for fact since Catherine and a brigade of 12,000 men were completely wiped out. Five great christian divisions were fired to pieces besides the destruction of the brigade and driven into confusion while lines of the Glandelinian divisions shattered to shreds by a demoniac fire were hurled back by a frenzied counter charge of general Tamarillo's Generalistians while cavalry and infantry corps led by Tamarillo's sweeping over a storm of air over a chain of artillery standing with hellish destruction dashed themselves upon the walls of christian soliders, and renelted like a million furies, returned to the charge with redoubled fury. A second, third, fourth, fifth and sixth with the carnage being terrible, murderous, implacable, bloodcurdling war made each with greater fury than before. Such was the infantry wedges of "Vimball" woungs and "Strukteronia", which with heavy cavalry returned to the assault on the christian resistance of the christians must be overcome at once before any relief comes.

A kind of indomitable, floods urdling furt fury roared the Glandelinians on the resistance of the christians must be overcome at once before any relief comes.

But the Angelinians officered a wonderful resistance, they realized that Perkins must be given time to come up and that they therefore cannot afford to yield a palm width of ground.

"I have no other instructions given except to resist as long as a single man is alive." Said Bernard Costello to a general who had come to him to announce that ten of his brigades were almost annihilated, and who wanted to know what to do. Storms of gang gang-shells, shrapnell, and canister lashed the christian army, hundreds of thousands of men falling on all sides, the line growing thin while the troops were losing a courage in mind and body. A little before four o'clock twenty hundred thousand Condensians led by Ives delouched from the woods in the right of the extreme wing. General Costello at once realized that this was the advance guard of Vanleys left wing and that the situation had become critical along his army for his army, which was almost exhausted from its titanic efforts to repel Federal onslaughts.

Federal's supreme effort had already crushed the left grand division while the center of Tamarillo's army had been forced to complete destruction. From four o'clock, - o'clock until six Bernard Costello's army struggled with a sublime fury beyond anything bloodcurdling, against the slowly growing forces of his two enemies. Costello indeed did not hedge but what indeed must have been the anxiety of his pure heart. Where was General Vivian's helper general Hanson in doing? Every few minutes general Costello sent a messenger to locate him in vain. Another few hours would decide anything. Either Hanson or night must come. "Either Hanson or night must come." He cried with tears in his eyes no longer able to bear the terrible anxiety.

Terrific indeed was the carnage. Everything that the valor of soldiers and the genius of the generals could imagine and attempt to overcome the advantage of numbers, was imagined and attempted, and for a moment the enemy lines finally shaken by the terrible impetuosity of the brave men who arrived under Perkins seemed to waver. General Costello fell mortally wounded however, the line becoming terribly breached which allowed the main force of Tamarillo's army to win the slip through his hands and join John Tomas Federal in time to save the Glandelinian troops who were now not less exhausted than the christians. This reversed the tide of battle the whole christian line being literally cut to pieces at the center and with the loss of their main commander Vivian who was severely wounded could not hold.

First the left gave way, then the right, the central guard or grand division who had been badly riddled. In a few hours the whole christian right in a worse condition than general Vivian's center had retired on confusion from Callens Run the Glandelinians following hotly bent upon its destruction. General Vivian saw that that all was lost. Only his left was still intact and holding its ground but it did not save him from defeat and soon it would have to withdraw before Vanleys right under Fox law. To make matters worse general Swichenacker was guarding Hanson's movement and intercepting him from Noro Vivian, threatening him every minute with fight.

Along general Vivian's left wing the battle was still progressing. Across the fields through the woods, and over broke the maddening gray lines came in in monstrous surges four hundred deep landing back general Callens right. Here the on fire was a sublime onslaught. Angelinians first broke made their rush and then fell back before the irresistible advance of the Glandelinians. In eddying when they had to pause to cut their way out from a converging line. The advance of the Glandelinians gathered force like a thunder tide taking in the prisoners in trains of wagons and caissons. The fire of the christian guns along the front was something terrible. Gunister that one regiment of field guns fired to two hundred and forty shots a minute ten to a gun, dropping three hundred bullets and fragments with each shell burst. This was exactly two hundred fragments a minute falling into the space of an acre. Under such a downpour one has about the same chance of escaping a wound as one has of dodging a storm of snowflakes in the fiercest snow storm. But three thousands of such guns were in vigorous action and no one could describe the suffocating maddening effect of their fire, the air seemed to writhe with projectiles and the rumble of explosions seemed to fairly split the air.

Where in the name of jumping can I find that confounded map I had this morning?" asked general Charles Brown of his lieutenant.

Think of the regiments of guns, putting such volleys into the assailants, melting away columns after column in a volley. The firing of the christian musketry was so fast that it was like the roll of many many a cyclopean snar drums, beaten with sticks the size of ship masts. Along the whole line was a continuous cloud of smoke from burstingshrapnell shells, renewed with fresh fresh whither puffs, raining bullets as fast as it was dissipated. It may be strange to relate though our kind readers may have noticed it though that the Virgin girls have never been too close to the main firing line during the war not even mentioned during the terrible but lasted several times. The conflict seemed as equally fierce along the left as the other two wings. Sabres and bayonets of men on both sides were driving with blood and the christian cannons mowed down men faster than any machine the eye that ever mowed the fields of grain. Swaths of men many hundreds of feet in extent were cut down, many hundreds of thousands already being killed or wounded and during the battle there was complete complete brutality displayed by the Glandelinians on Vanleys left. One wounded Angelinian was on his knees his face raised imploringly his arms stretched out. A Glandelinian brute was standing above him holding at both hands a rifle, at the end of which was a long bayonet that makes a hole with three edges.

I think of the bayonet that was plunged into the kneeling man's face, into his breast, then into his bowels, then pulled out and plunged in again. Such scenes were repeated tens of thousands of times during the terrific onslaught. Young men and boys on both sides lying gasping, suffering horribly agony, horses galloping over them, while as they lie one bullet after another strikes them until one luckily brings death. The horrors of the conflict was so great that no one can realize it. When his left at last gave way before Federal's sledge hammer onslaughts general Vivian indeed saw that the field was lost. His whole army was retreating in a rout being in a worse condition than Napoleon's at Waterloo. His center and left had been dreadfully mangled and cut up and no relief was at any point.

General Hanson could not do any thing because Joe Rae Swichenacker was on the watch and Hanson dared not show his fight less his army meet with destruction. General A Vivian's defeat at Zoe Callens Run was one of the first disastrous ones in the war and due for facts by the works of traitorous spies. One of the spies communicated with Vanleysmen by means of signals according to a code arranged or prearranged with the Glandelinians. He had been captured by the Angelinians however and a written code found found in the prisoners possession showed that the signal flares at various points were used as signals, that the Angelinian heavy artillery fire was on the right, that the already torn and mangled columns was in weaker force, that only a few divisions were standing their point at Aronhurs picture barn, that Angelinians were advancing by the northwestern roads, and that Angelinians were going in by western roads.

THE extraordinary movements of the flares had attracted the attention of the little Vivian girls who understood the boy scout signals and the spy had been seized by the very little girls themselves. Overwhelming proof of his guilt was found. And the work of spies was so feared that when one was caught his execution was started as quickly as possible, and in the most terrifying manner. He does not even receive the benefit of every possible doubt like the murderer on trial, and the spy must be feared and he hated is the one operating against his own country. This spy who was caught by the little girls and sentenced by the Angelinian generals was successful for he done enormous damage to the Angelinians before he was discovered.

He had even indicated the position of one of main the main christian commands and staff enabling the enemy by a well directed volley of artillery to wipe the headquarters organization out of existence. This spy had been tied to a tall post by a roadside, where he was executed twenty Angelinians putting twenty bullets into his body with hearty good will. The man's body was left by the roadside for days in the very region of the most ferocious fighting. Upon the next the Angelinians nailed a placard which bore the words:

"A SPY. A TRAITOR TO HIS BELOVED COUNTRY."

2265.

Another traitor in the battle was an Ange-Angelinian general who led a force of Glandelinians in disguise just in front of an Angelinian battery. After he had lingered here for a few moments he prudently passed on and as soon as he was out of sight a storm of Glandelinian shells fell upon the battery, and the disguised Glandelinians fell upon the unsuspecting Christians putting nine Angelinian runs out of action and killed hundreds of valuable Angelinian artillery men. He also indicated the position of Another Angelinian battery by signals but Violet discovered his actions. He was caught and immediately executed in the same way as the other. At the same time this occurred Jennie Vivian believed that a Glandelinian wearing the uniform of an Angelinian sergeant had insinuated himself into the Christian ranks. After an examination among the men Violet herself at the information of her sister, easily picked him out from the ranks of the Angelinians just going toward the firing line. He was questioned, found guilty, and a short trial, and immediate execution ended the during attempt.

The battle was figured in one exciting spy exploit: During the battle a swift upon battle car the size of an auto truck came racing up to the Christian lines. In it were three apparent Angelinians officers and between them they held a burly strapping Glandelinian officer prisoner apparently, a desperate character who was determined to escape if he could or perish in the attempt. The Angelinian officers endeavored to aid the carnage to force their way through the lines in a premeditated way, on the ground that they were taking the prisoner to headquarters but a superior Angelinian officer attracted to this by the suspicious looks of Violet and her sisters who by him at the time insisted on stopping and examining them.

He had just been fooled by some other ingenious trick and was especially by the looks of the Vivian girls intensely suspicious also. The supposed Angelinian officers proved to be Gargolians speaking Angelinian perfectly and wearing the uniform of well known dead Angelinian officers. They had been fitted out in this way on a daring mission to get behind the Christian lines and signal certain things that were happening there....

By desperate fight the spies managed to escape killing two Angelinian generals one sergeant and a score of privates. It hardly need be remarked that to under take such an enterprise as this requires more nerve than to face the ordinary risk of war. Undoubtedly soldiers often feel sympathy for a capt and spy working for his own country, but such are his possibilities of causing disaster that no mercy are shown. But there is no sympathy for traitors whose execution is without any trial and the most horrible that can be thought thought off....!

TRY TO CAPTURE ARONBURG!!!!!!

During general Vivian's mighty conflict three hundred thousand Glandelinians tried to capture the small town of Annis Aronburg after a terrible battle. In one day a triple disaster fell upon the fleet at the cost of victory. The great Angelinian battle ships the Vriatib, Titanic, Herculemn and Orpe were blown out of the water by the guns of fort See Rae. On each side over 222,445 men went down. As the battle progressed another huge monarch of the Angelinian seas one of the proud set of Angelinian ships was stricken in the side by a torpedo and took two thousand five hundred sailors to her grave.

Floating mine mines came bobbing down the current from the Glandelinian shore and blew up five more ships. Then two more monsters joined them, the Triumphant and the Majestic Rosa being smashed by the Glandelinian guns. A score of transports at the same time chaffing to be off the water and onto land had suddenly leaped upward with stricken groans from their vitals, and vanished victims of the dangerous mines.

The Royal Angelinian, went in this fashion aid with her three thousand four hundred men. The list indeed was long and no one knew how many the dead totalled. The ships that had not been sunk suffered for the bombardment from the forts and Glandelinian ships landing from Glandelinian land batteries had been densely. Four thousand five hundred killed and wounded, a hell of destruction back and forth, the clatter being heard for fifteen dread miles. It was the greatest disaster of naval warfare. The Angelinian battle ships the Thunderer, Agamemnon and Colossus were also destroyed by floating mines while a Glandelinian submarine tried to sink an Angelinian but both were sunk accidentally by the Colossus.

THE PAGE AT THE T W DOWN.

Where in the name of jumping jacks will is that confounded map I had this morning?" asked general Charles Brown of his lieutenant.

2266.

ly the Glandelinian shore batteries. Then during the height of the contest a Glandelinian battleship Abyenwas was torpedoed and going down with all her crew. At the same time a Glandelinian submarine sank four Angelinian ships and two transports ships which sank with ten thousand soldiers. The sinking of the Angelinian battleship Phelan and water broke followed then a torpedo boat sank the Angelinian transport ship and also an Abyeninkilians while another with one thousand men went down. Four Angelinian transports were sunk by Glandelinian shore batteries and also a guard at ship went down with four thousand sailors while a Glandelinian torpedo boat destroyer sank for Angelinian submarines, while the Angelinian submarine See Rae was sunk by shore batteries. This attack was a failure and the Angelinians withdrew....

General Vivian defended the Christian fleet.

After Hoenmann had encountered overwhelming forces of Abyeninkilians and Angelinians at Pandora and appeared in vain to Manley for aid, but with success from the government of Glandelinia he retired toward the possible possibility Hoenmann hotly pursued by his two strong foes. Most of the Glandelinian army armies which had swept the Angelinian forces from Wickay, Landinia, Calvernia were withdrawn and sent to Hoenmann aid while another force from Hallingburg was sent to strike against Robert Bowen who was concentrating his Abyeninkilians toward Norman Run with the intention of trying to force the railroad of the siege and a years continual battles raging there and at Julo Callio and in there begin the fire were successful.

General Vivian had learned of this occurrence and sent for Violet and her sisters who promptly came....

"I would like to request you little girls to go to the chief commander of the army confronting us and tell him that I said that he is to fall back on Pandora." Said general Vivian. "I know by his movements that Hoenmann is forming a trap and I wish general Hoenmann to be warned intime. What ever you do avoid the enemy's lines under any conditions for if they get you now it is good bye." The little girls promised that they would be careful and went off to do their bidding. It was a perilous undertaking they were about to make as enemies were everywhere. They did not know that they were going to run into many dangers but wise as they were they asked a troop of men to accompany them and placed their friend Jack Evans at their head. With this strong body guard they set out on their mission right away going in the direction of Chamberlains northeast of Aronburg Run.... They had marched for about in three hours when nearing the region of Evan galin e St. Clare they found their way barred by the See Rae Swick Swick crackers army which all this time had kept its eye upon Hoenmann.

The little girl herself held a council among themselves, then consulted Jack Evans about the situation.

"T I this is surprising indeed for none of us knew of this at all." Said Jack Evans with disgust. "We have quite a strong force here and we could easily play a trick on Swickcracker or drive up his rear in a headlong attack and break his line that way. We could do it easily enough."

"But it would cost delay and disaster would also follow upon us." Said Violet. "See Rae is a hundred to our one and could easily repair the broken rear with reinforcements. The only thing we will have to do is to march far around him. I do indeed wish to avoid an engagement."

"We had not been near a great battle line for a long while on account of watching for signs." Said Violet. "Not even much fighting. Let's try an attack. Maybe we can break through the line and get to Hoenmann during the confusion. Night would be the best time. You know Jack you have over two hundred thousand men which give us some considerable advantage."

"Maybe the other officers do not approve of it if it is of it." Said Violet.

"I'll hold a general council with all the officers and see what their decision is." Said Jack Evans.

This was done. While the progress was while the council was in progress the mission of the little girls was needless for the Abyeninkilians commander had discovered that Hoenmann was up and without difficulty and then during Hoenmann's attack. So if this had not happened the little girls would have been late in the morning.

back in confusion. Parson began to realize that Schleiermacher was moving in and overwhelming forces upon him. His whole line was now under the fiercest attack that he had ever seen. The whole line, the cannonade, the sniping, the whole was now under the fiercest attack that he had ever seen. The whole was now under the fiercest attack that he had ever seen.

On Parson's center the enemy was moving in numerous forces. The Alandelinians were with thrilling shouts hurling themselves against Grant's lines. The enemy was moving in numerous forces. The Alandelinians were with thrilling shouts hurling themselves against Grant's lines.

Grant's line was now under the fiercest attack that he had ever seen. The whole was now under the fiercest attack that he had ever seen. The whole was now under the fiercest attack that he had ever seen.

The Alandelinians were now moved down in many thousands and general Weinstone's Alandelinians who amid the greatest bravery charged upon the Christian artillery almost met anihilation. Their losses were terrific and intolerable and unknown at that.

THE ENEMY RECOVER. PARSON SUCCESSFUL.

The struggle had now become fiercer, the veterans under Miller and Moran coming on to support Parson opening a galling fire upon the enemy at once, as checking the Alandelinians and manning every charging column near a border village along Grant's right flank.

Bolton's cavalry forces charged with desperate fury upon the force of Alyandelinians in an endeavor to force the line but were cut down and routed.

Whitehead's divisions of Alandelinians and Angelians now arrived and revealed the enemy's assault with terrible fury, then another division of the enemy came rushing up and attacked. The Alandelinians with such fury that they forced them back upon the main line crushed and mangled and struck general Hernandez with a rage and infantry put them out of commission and with marvellous force crushed Henry, Walden's division to break and retire to the rear in confusion. The Alandelinians pushed on with great force and crushing the infantry lines under constant bombardment to pieces amid a storm of death and devastation.

They then assaulted November's artillery and after fierce fighting with the gunners cut them all down capturing the artillery. Then to their charged upon a side battery and despite the destruction fire the survivors rushed it and drove the Alandelinians and Angelians and Alandelinians into the rear. The Alandelinians with such fury that they forced them back upon the main line crushed and mangled and struck general Hernandez with a rage and infantry put them out of commission and with marvellous force crushed Henry, Walden's division to break and retire to the rear in confusion. The Alandelinians pushed on with great force and crushing the infantry lines under constant bombardment to pieces amid a storm of death and devastation.

Kilpatrick's brigades with fixed bayonets and driving them back simultaneously after severe fighting.

At the same time Parsons' divisions with terrific fury charged general Vanderhulst's army to fragments and the whole line after cruel fighting in which there was terrible slaughter on both sides drove in the whole of Parson's center back to his line. In the meantime general Apolix came to the rescue the latter's columns began to rally and met the advancing Alandelinians with intense fury. In a division after division of the Christian army rallied to the struggle to become an all the fire of the Christians burning so general and destructive but the enemy at moments began to retire. General Reinhardt's Alandelinians had joined themselves together at the rally of the Christians and after a counter charge the enemy was routed. The Alandelinians were now moved down in many thousands and general Weinstone's Alandelinians who amid the greatest bravery charged upon the Christian artillery almost met anihilation. Their losses were terrific and intolerable and unknown at that.

Where in the name of jumping am I? Is that confounded map I had this morning? asked general Charles Brown of his lieutenant.

The lieutenant had been looking out of the window when the general made his demand and saw the general's map and the map of the Christian army.

multitudes of Alandelinians literally melted away. The struggle now became brutal indeed the Angelian divisions suffering terrible losses. One surge of Alandelinians was still rushing on and took two Alandelinian battalions on the flank striking them a desperate blow and scattering the survivors. Part of this force charged upon the left of the main center which was rallying coming on with irresistible force. The fight was now tremendous all along the line. The whole Christian line was blazing in fire the approach was a victory. The Alandelinians were advancing with some thirty irrepressible forces striking the wind wings of the seventh corps furiously breaking the line into many parts. The battle raged furiously all along the line for many many hours the thunder of hundreds of cannon seemed to shake the earth and the discharge of firearms became fiercer in the extreme. The Alandelinians continued to press on breaking the western part of the line but general James Hamblin's Alandelinians had arrived with fresh artillery and the roar and crash of their guns stunned the Alandelinians who recoiled before this deadly fire the attack being abandoned.

The Christians now pressed forward the foremost columns advancing with a rush and with such force that the Alandelinians under Keif and Apolonia were panic-stricken and broke ranks and fled in two general directions.

The Christians continued to press on and a defender grandeur of firearms and artillery attacking Apolonia advancing on the left and drove them back badly shattered and panic-stricken and with their leader wounded. General Scholtz was also forced back under a deadly fire but his right wing consisting of one million one hundred thousand men made a desperate counter charge but only a hundred returned. Child's Alandelinians were still storming the Christian lines but he was also compelled to withdraw or meet annihilation. At the same time the Alandelinians of the Alandelinians were still storming the Christian lines but he was also compelled to withdraw or meet annihilation.

The first and second corps of Stanislaw's divisions made a stand but after a fearful struggle they were reduced to fragments and compelled to retire and now Parson began to make success along his entire line. The force under general Handle struck general Kerens' Alandelinians a terrible blow on the front, while ten brigades under Phil and Ellen most by Alandelinians and Alyandelinians struck upon the main column with crushing force. Grant's divisions under general Bradin charged again and again upon Vanderford's artillery with steady hammer force, crushing in the left and right of one of Vanderford's best brigades whose main line had opened fire like a blizzard.

Save Child with heavy forces struck against Vanderford's main line but he fell mortally wounded and his division was cut to pieces in a furnace of hell. At the same time general Hare's Alandelinians forces coming up from Vanderford's extreme left advanced upon Kill's Alandelinians right and a tremendous cannonading and blaze of firearms of every description. The carnage was so frightful that was inflicted by the Alandelinians but Kill's Alandelinians failed to hold his main line together, whose left flank divisions was turned outflanked and routed. Thus ended the conflict along Parson's line.

ZOE, JAR, NEROES, SUCCESS. COST OF THE FRIGHTFUL STRUGGLE ALONG HIS LINES.

For five hours general Zoe's army and general Hare's army fought it out together like two heroic titans each army surging back and forth like balls of fire. General Apolonia's divisions of Christian army had five times come into collision with general Hare's Alandelinians and Angelians and Alandelinians and five times flung back after a frightful struggle. After being repulsed the fifth time the Alandelinians were put out of commission. The main line kept up their attack with amazing fury despite the continuous withering storm of fire which dealt awful havoc among their ranks. Nero's battle line extended for thirty thirty five miles his center relieving the fiercest of the waiting blows. His cater and again and again closed up the monsterous gaps made in the long line, while along this point the Alandelinians under general Henry advanced to storm the redoubt and before that was a shell swept plain. They advanced across the plains in hundreds of thousands but when they reached the redoubts only one hundred thousand were left. Their attack was continued however and by a sheer force of fury they drove half of Heroes center far from their position amid fearful slaughter, but the main portions under Brock held stubbornly, the terrible struggle reaching its height in which the Alandelinians meeting for some hours with of baffling bayonets and a seething storm of musketry fire and hurled by new forces of Alandelinians began to give way slowly at first then in a panic. Of this grand force only fifty thousand were left.

Along the left the Alandelinians had made great success their right having rolled up Heroes left. The fighting here had indeed been fearful. Again and again the Christians had hurled back their heavy onslaughts but the assaults had seemed to be filled with a blinding rage over their horrible losses and had attacked in overwhelming numbers. General Hamilton's division had kept upon the purple line with terrible desperate desperation on fire. The force and fury during the desperate fighting drove the Christians out of their redoubts pell-mell, mowing them down in tens of thousands.

By this charge the whole left had given way the Alandelinians by their well directed withering fire mowing down hundreds of thousands of brave Christians within one hour. General Hamilton's division were exhausted by their exertions in trying to check the Freemasons and it was their only salvation to retire their number of two million levies were reduced to the hundred and twenty thousand. In the meantime Jack Evans and the Vivian girls failed to find Vannonia as provided by a flank attack as a tip force of Alandelinians had come upon them before Vannonia began his attack these proving to be Manley's army as these Alandelinians were led by general West-in-the-head. Terrible as was the engagement but Jack Evans was victorious as matters made it but they had to withdraw an enormous main army was advancing. After retreating for four hours they however managed to come within sight of Heroes left which they reinforced to his surprise. The little rifle unit only met resistance in their failure and asking for heavy support for Hero while the awful blood-curdling yell of the awful nearness of the Hollesters Alandelinians and the threatening of an awful calamity.

Soon Angelinian infantry in endless streams pushed steadily toward where Heroes left was already rallying carrying what they found of their ammunition bags and ammunition. The burdens added to the burden of the enemy's progress and the haste of which the crushed and mangled left had been forced to retire.

Human nature could stand the strain and excitement as these Angelinians did in this terrible battle.

Fields, roads, plains, prairie, and mead, even meadows and woodlands were made mangled alive with Angelinians who were exhausted, and thousands slightly wounded in their desperate fight who had fallen back before the enemy's headlong attack. Being rapidly supported by heavy numbers under general Henrique St. Clara some of the scattered divisions made a stand who while the little girls went on to Hancock to report of Manley's advance. By the booming of cannon that was of much intensity to shake windows and doors out of houses in the city of Man galle St. Clara's division from the battle field, field, and by the million cannon can heaven and the incessant ear-splitting detonations of shells and high explosives Hero at his headquarters knew that the struggle along his line was in full sway and he was compelled to hasten to the scene of bloody action. General Hero knew from what he saw as he reached the scene that that very day if the enemy under West-in-the-head was to be checked at all he must be along. His only plan. The courageous Angelinians threw themselves forward and the struggle was on. The battle was the Alandelinians finally being thrown back all along the line. Thus ended the battle of Ponia Vista. Related also reporting his said headquarters, it being one of the fiercest engagements of this part of the war drama. Both sides lost three million five hundred thousand. The Christians lost two million on both sides were made prisoners.

Where in the same of jumping can will is that confounded map I had this morning?" asked general Charles Brown of his lieutenant.

The lieutenant had been looking out of the window when the general made his demand, and now he turned around and pulled at his mustachios. When he turned, faced the general, saluted and then asked:

"Is it not in possession of the Vivian girls?"

"I do not think so. I have not seen them all day."

"That's too bad sir."

"Where is my Geography then?" inquired the general looking through his drawer and examining everything most carefully so he could be sure he was not dreaming.

"It's in the desk," said his lieutenant but the general only shook his head.

"No it's so gone also," he said.

"No other were with me and no record book-- no maps, no geographies of any kind kind!" asked general Paul Marcus looking pale all of a sudden.

"It's in the desk," said general Paul Marcus looking pale all of a sudden. His assistant therefore looked through everything in the room, and seeing it was true that everything was missing, stood beside general Brown watching him shuffle slowly and anxiously to think deeply.

"It may be that violet and her sisters had taken them. Nothing could be in danger in their possession," he mused. "and they being emperor's daughters can be trusted with anything and they would not do anything against their cause. Tell me general, do you not trust them?"

The general turned and looked at his friend. He had very kindly eyes but on account of the sights he had seen during the war he had not given the slightest smile or even laughed, and he seemed to never looked any other way than at solemn. And the general being serious in nature, a never looks unless it was completely necessary, so very few of his staff had ever engaged him in any unnecessary conversation.

"Why I do not trust them," said the general slowly. "but I do not believe they have them."

"I think they have," declared general Marcus. "why do you doubt it?"

"Are they here early or late this afternoon?" asked general Brown.

"Yes but they stayed only a moment but they were not in your room."

"I suspect so but they would have left no word that they took them. What else?"

"Nothing. But I bet they are studying the articles right this minute. But if you still doubt it why not ride over and see?"

General Brown only shook his head.

"But suppose they haven't got them. What then shall we do?"

"Of course," said general Marcus who really in secret began to feel a little scared. "The spies could get into our lines here as every spot is too well guarded. If it be so we would be too late to apprehend any one as it is already night. There is plenty of time you know to interview the Vivian girls, only if they are out when we happen to be there we must find out and go where they are."

General Brown stared at his assistant as if scared himself.

"By ten o'clock to night," general Marcus continued. "we must reach their headquarters where we can learn the truth, or we'll be worrying all night."

"What time is it now?"

"Half past eight."

"Where are their headquarters?"

"Where? Why down the road to Company A. I don't know how far it is I'm sure," replied general Marcus. "but you must know the distance sir. You have been there early yesterday. I don't remember the distance because ever since I could remember anything we have been here so long. All I've seen of their headquarters is beyond the city at the west where they are. General Hanson Vivian's army is encamped whose sentries won't let no strangers go by them whether they know the Pass word or not."

"Only their own soldiers and not of any other camp," the general said. "Oh yes the headquarters of the Vivian girls is about ten miles from here I've heard. As I've heard tell they are braver than the bravest men. I've often heard conversations about them and of their heroic friends, boys and girls alike. What I have heard about them would take a whole year to write by the fastest work of the type writer to explain in as much words about their girl and boy friends. They are more active than any of our best professional spies and the Gemini. It's funny indeed that the two of us have only seen the Vivian girls twice is it not?"

"You surely indeed," said General Brown.

"Then let's go right away without delay and find if they have not the things we miss. I'd love to see them once again yet."

"It may not be safe to travel on such a night as this," said General Brown.

"Why not?" "It is not as dangerous as you fear and besides we are used to small fire," answered General Brown earnestly. "I think I can ride as far and maybe urge my horse equally as fast through small swept encampments as you can general Brown, and now that your important articles are missing, we must relieve our minds by seeing if they are there or not."

General Brown did not speak for a long while. Then he sat out down in his chair, whistling it to face the room, for now the moon was rising above the tree tops, and the weather was considerably chilly. There was a big pile of logs blazing fiercely outside beyond the company street, it probably being a general camp fire. The two generals sat by the desk for about half an hour and both were in the deepest thought. When the moon rose higher outside General Brown said:

"Let's get our horses and then we'll speed to their headquarters."

But General Brown had already sent his orderly to bring the horses. A few more minutes had passed, and then they could hear the horses arriving. General Brown then laid his hand tenderly on General Brown's shoulder and said:

"The horses have arrived, come."

When the general arose abruptly, he noticed that his friend looked worried and anxious, that he had not eaten his supper and as usual the general was not feeling hungry because he was worried over the important articles he was missing. General Brown was a little hungry but he decided they would receive something better to eat when they reached the headquarters of Violet and her sisters. However they both put some apples in their pockets after which General Brown said it again as he strode out through the door on the doorway:

"Come hurry, the horses are waiting."

General Brown at this time felt well pleased. He was positively sure that Violet and her sisters had the things he was missing and he was very anxious to go over, and see them for they were so good that he could not help loving them. For a time he had wished he could find the excuse to have a friendly interview with them and know all the negotiations they had made. When both generals were outside more soldiers arrived to guard the building in a building the general looking the door and then both started their horses down the company street. They felt sure that no strangers would disturb the building with so many guards around even if the most sneakiest spies slipped into the encampments while they were gone.

At the corner of the company street that separated the main encampments from the headquarters of the Division, the path divided into three. One company street led to the left toward the enormous and mighty Aronburg, and the other two toward the headquarters, that is of Violet and her sisters. General Brown urged his horse up this road, that is the right hand company street, and General Brown followed without asking any questions. He knew it would lead them to the headquarters of the Division, where he had seen only twice, and whom he felt was his dearest friends.

For a while the horse galloped down the company street, and at half past ten came in sight of the small but dignified looking building. As they rode on they had the houses, which they had passed placed in their pockets. The building as I said it before was not such a big house and peculiarly it was round on top, almost built like a mushroom house and of in the "Oz" books of the munchkin country of Oz. It was painted gray and once there had been a pretty garden around the house where now naked and leafless trees stood, and where flowers once grew in the greatest abundance and where there had been beds of cabbage and other crops, but now they were all gone.

Around the house grew tall leafless and walmighty trees, and cotton wood, and rows of briar bushes. Paths of white gravel divided the farm fields and flower beds and the company street itself led right up to the front door. The building was apparently in the center of the encampment but a little way off to the south was a forlorn looking forest which no doubt concealed a portion of the rebel lines, at least a portion of the main army under General Manley. After answering the challenge of the sentries and telling who they were, they were permitted to pass through the line of guards, and General Brown knocked at the door of the house and a small chubby faced beautiful girl dressed all in scarlet opened it, and seeing who the two were greeted them with a smile.

"Oh," said General Brown. "You must be one of their guardian angels, or else you are a mean known as Mildred Maxwell, the chief girl my for the Division girls."

"I am that girl, but you are wrong about my name," she answered. "But knowing who you two are you are welcome here. Step right in."

"May we see the most famous of little girls, Violet?"

"They are very busy right now," she said, shaking her head doubtfully. "But come in and let me give you two generals, and soldiers of Christ, some supper first, for you must have traveled far from your headquarters in order to get here. Did you come here for something very important?"

"We have," replied General Brown as he and General Brown entered the house. "We have come for something so important that we wish to interview them alone."

"Interview them alone? And in this house?" she explained. "Then it must be something very important that you wish to see them about."

"It is my good girl."

"Goodness me!" she said looking at one of the generals. "If you must be General Brown known by the insurgents as the 'Desperate war bulldog.' When she looked at his companion steadily for several moments. "And you must be General Paul 'Arcus'!" she added smiling sweetly at him as if she had known him all her life.

"Yes, yes," he answered. "I never suspected you knew us as this is the first time we have ever met." He added soberly. "But it is really good that we met. I like good little girls and boys too."

"Well," remarked the child about bustling around the room, and setting the table and quickly bringing the food from the pantries. "You were lucky enough to catch them home to night, for they were out all alone in that dismal forest all day to day or at least till two o'clock this afternoon, and had much worse adventures with the enemy than usual, but through some good mishap their luck changed and now once again they are away from the enemy's line. If General Brown's headquarters return to you, please to come across Aronburg and Aronburg will have her here will you?"

"What shall we do if we do not meet her here my little lady?"

"I'm sure I do not know, but for the safety of our cause we must keep all our most greatest secrets to ourselves. Perhaps our chance will come," she replied.

It is probable that both the generals had never in their lives eaten such a fine meal. There was a whole roasted turkey for both, stuffed with a large dish of boiled peas, a large bowl of chicken soup and bread pudding to add when the two general generals had eaten heartily of this fare, the little girl said to them:

"Do you want to see the Darlings of the Nation on a war business, or for just a friendly visit?"

"General Paul Brown only shook his head.

"We have come on a most important mission," he replied. "I do not think Violet and her sisters have in their possession what we are missing, but we ardently hope so for we would not care very much to lose them especially if they got into the possession of the enemy, but for my part I am curious to know if the Division girls possess them."

The little girl seemed doubtful.

"I remember seeing one of them come in with a long roll of paper in her possession that is Jennie herself," she said. "And so perhaps if it is yours they will be glad to give it back to you again. Violet and her sisters are busy, very busy just now as I have said, but if they have time to see you you may come in, but I'll have to see them and ask if they will admit you, as they are studying over a large map they each had worked hard to make."

"Thank you," replied General Brown much pleased. "We will wait until you return."

The girl was gone for several minutes, but then she returned and led them through a broad hall and toward the door of the room which was that of Violet and her sisters. The room was very large, and had three large windows on each side which in the daytime made the place very light, the sun shining through the east windows in the morning and the west into the afternoon, and there were two other doors in addition to the one leading into it from the hall. Before the east wall of windows a long and wide bench was placed and there were many chairs and other furniture in the room. At the south end of the room stood an old fashioned stove, and in the center of the room stood a large round table on which was a large map.

Seven ordinarily or quietly looking little girls were either sitting down at their chairs or leaning over the table studying and working on it with crayons at the same time or directing each other on it here and there, and each exclaiming to the other about every different section of the map. These two generals the usually children, appeared to be of unearthly beauty, and for some time they stood dumbfounded two and to advance or retreat. Finally however Violet looked up and seeing the two general standing like statues came forward to greet them, but General Brown was so embarrassed that he was for a moment not able to move hand or foot, but Violet realizing the awkwardness of the general saluted and said:

"Yes sir. What is it you want sir?"

"Ah no you are one of the beautiful Princesses of Abbeonania?" remarked general Brown without moving a foot and ever forgetting to salute in his embarrassment.

"And you wish to know what I and my sisters are doing," she continued gazing at him intently surprised at his fear of her. "We are looking over a wonderful map that we ourselves made, and which which no one knows anything about but ourselves. When we first started to draw it we did not think we could complete it completely, to even save our live lines or lives no matter how hard we tried. It took us several days to make this wonderful map, but at this moment I am pleased to say we have it nearly completed. You see we have planned it for a good purpose, known only to ourselves and for the good of the cause, and to make yourselves comfortable and after we have finished the map we will be glad to explain it to you."

"You must know," said Jennie herself when the two generals had slowly and bashfully seated themselves on the long bench and not the chairs they offered them, in their embarrassment, known as the broad window seat. "That we have foolishly spent most of our precious time in working on this old map which now we are sorry we started on. We also have secured plenty of important papers from the rebel lines in yonder woods northwest of here. But in escaping we had to fight our way through the enemy's lines. We also found some letters belonging to general Manley but I believe knowing we were within his lines, that he placed them within our reach purposely for he cheated us wickedly, for the letters were forged and were not important at all."

"Perhaps the other papers are forged and are no good either," said general Marcus forgetting for the moment his mission as their beauty and friendliness enraptured him and his friends. "No they are perfect," she declared. "The first package were important plans made out by general Manley himself. He planned to march his army upon General Hanson's rear and to deceive Hanson as to his real intentions to make a feint attack, and also a fake retreat, at the same time."

"All that?" exclaimed general Brown in astonishment. "That seems too prodigious to be real!"

"Yes it seems so to us too, but Manley can do wonders, and he makes a powerful adversary for all our best generals," explained Violet. "He also has two great professional spies in his service who are so shrewd that they make pleasant companions but advise themselves a little more than is considered modest and they positively refuse to be frustrated under any conditions. Our assistant Angeline Aronson Aronburg who calls her self Gertrude Angeline for military reasons known only to herself, make a trap to catch those twosomes once, but they proved to be too high bred and foxy for her, clever as she herself is, so she now thinks it is impossible to capture them alive. Also she once had a stirring almost fatal adventure with them and know from that experience, that those two spies are extremely hard hearted and very unfeeling for any one who opposes them."

"I think if we ever have a meeting with those two spies we will make it so positive that they will not object to us making them prisoners and their apprehensions on any prove of some very excellent good to our cause," said Violet. "I know who they are," said general Marcus. "What did they do to General when they tricked him and made him their prisoner?"

"They wanted to make him tell something he did not know or would not tell," said Catherine reply. "I've supposed you have heard of the boy scout captain Radcliffe who is known as the 'Rattlesnake' by the enemy. He is now working with our boy and girl scout regiments in general divisions and is a great favorite of us. He alone is feared by the enemy of all boys at least."

"No I have never heard of him," remarked general Brown. "I'm afraid I don't know much about any of the boy and girl scouts of the national Abbeonanian armies. You see our divisions have fought through the whole war so far, without the use of boy and girl scouts and there was no one to tell us anything about them."

"That is the reason your armies are so unluckily as to suffer such tremendous losses," said Violet looking up from the map in a sympathetic tone of voice. "The more one knows about our boy and girl scouts the luckier their armies are when they employ their help. And is the greatest gift we can obtain for our holy cause."

"But please don't let me intend to do with that large map you are making? Did you say you were making it for some special purpose?"

"So we are," she answered. "We make it for the purpose to trace every movement of the foe throughout the country."

"Oh is that the purpose of the map?" asked Violet. "I do!" general Marcus asked for such a map like this seemed even more strange and unusual than the one general Brown had lost. "I think it is best that we show you the map," said Angeline and Violet together as she and her sisters seized at the abrupt astonishment of the two generals. "Otherwise it would be rather difficult to explain to you. But first I will tell you that for many reasons we must be very careful. No other persons have been ever admitted into our presence because of the danger of the prying eyes of glandelinian spies. This place we have chosen for their special headquarters is a lonely and out of the way place, so be cleverly proposed to surround our building with many hidden guards, and also had selected one or two for every room in this house. This seemed a most excellent suggestion and so I at once summoned a hundred guards and when they were placed we set to work to finish this map. As we said before we have been at this work for a long, long while, and so having the guards we decided we had plenty of time to finish it between our scouting hours of duty. Yet the task was not so easy as you may suppose. At first we could not think what to start with, but in finally in searching through our chest we came across this large paper which we decided to use to draw and color the map on."

"What was that queer noise?" suddenly asked general Marcus.

"We had to patch up the map into many different colors, and shape the landscapes together correctly," she continued not hearing his startled question.

"You can see all of the hills are of various sizes and shapes, and the way we have completed the work it is very pretty and also gorgeous to look at. We have never before made one like it, for we girls generally do not have the time for such work so this is the biggest map we have ever made. If the enemy spies seized it our country might as well turn into a crazy quilt for it would be more use for them than an empty beer can. We call it 'The Crazy Quilt Map' because the colors, lakes and landscapes and mountains and hills and rivers and other places are so mixed up that we alone understand it and no one else. When we got this far with it I said to myself that it would do nicely for our cause and such a dreadful mixture of colors on this map would probably discourage rebel vandals from stealing it."

"Are you positively sure it is safe from glandelinian spies then?" inquired general Brown who all the time had been hearing a funny and most suspicious noise outside near some of the big windows and also elsewhere.

"Yes in a way. They may steal it but it would do them no good and only cause their destruction and not ours. All what we plan are safe you know. But we do fear those two professional spies, for they could work out any code or puzzle we or any one else makes. But we have suspected that, and by means of carbon paper have made an extra copy under this one by tracing all we made on a separate piece of paper. All of our generals except you two have seen this map and they all so liked it will be of so many colors that it will be only useful to us."

The two generals now nodded their approval but still felt suspicious and apprehensive for they could not make out the noise they still heard occasionally.

"It is a good idea," they said and then they heard that strange noise or sound once more but said nothing.

"So now the map is finished," said Hettie and Angeline. "We will show you generals what a good job we did." And she and Daisy and two others, Violet and Catherine held it within the generals view so both could look it over carefully.

Both of the generals closely examined the curious map with exceedingly great wonder not alone mingled with some great curiosity. The map was three feet in width, and five feet in length when held upright not counting the size of the sheet of paper, the ordinary sheet of paper being doubly larger. Violet and her sisters had first made into the map beginning from the west coast the rivers and hills, and then they had placed in their proper spaces the cities, towns and villages necessary, and using crayons and paints to color the map with. Upon one part of the map they had originated the Christian and positions under general Manley, and Vivian as they now were, and the directions toward which both extended. All of the important markings had been carefully made and placed and colored properly to hide their real identity.

"This map will serve our purpose upon splendidly when the time comes," said Angeline.

The length of time it took to complete the big map with the seven little princesses working on it was the most curious part of it. While the opposing armies had remained in those positions so long without any engagement, Violet and her sisters had found ample time to make and complete the map and to make it as correctly as it should be and they realized that a good map to suit their purpose must be properly drawn and colored.....

"quick, quick everyone, go quick. There was strange face at the window." They all ran to the window at once and Joice who was first there it open quickly, she leaned out but though she looked everywhere, everywhere there was no one in sight, who ever it was had disappeared as mysteriously as he had come. Very carefully little Angell opened the door and with a loaded pistol in her hand looked everywhere about the outside of the house, but no one was in sight, when she entered after questioning the guards who said no one had come near them within sight or hearing she said to her sisters that she could not find any one, for who ever it was had slipped away during the excitement leaving the company street as clear as before. Angell Jennie was again mimicking the guards by blowing a whistle the others very carefully but tremblingly removed the carpet from the table, folding it up and placing it in a secret panel in the wall, when this was done they all stood still, still looking scared indeed. There was scarcely a sound from either of them.

"Maybe that was only one of the guards looking in again if we were all right," said general Brown in an encouraging tone of voice though of course he felt like the rest and more suspicious.

"Yes but it was a strange wicked looking face," said Catherine's face that I'm sure I even recognized. "I'm afraid he has seen the map which we alone know how to make. It has taken us three days to prepare this map but what it really contains just now would be worth the price of all the victories in the war, and many a Glendolinian general would give all he possesses even their lives to obtain it. When our excitement and fear has cooled down, we'll put the map in a more secret place but in the meantime we must now watch it carefully, less suspicious persons get away with it."

The two generals both stood quietly looking at every window but saw nothing to be so excited about, and therefore were for that moment more interested just then in the peculiar names and sentences written on the envelopes. Thinking at least that it was really one of the guards looking in to see if everything was all right inside and believing it both unfair and unkind to suspect any of the very least selected sentries of being a disguised spy they both took down every writing on record book on a shelf near a table and looked through the pages to see if there were any directions written within that told how to make out codes. None of the little girls knew just then saw them do this for all were looking fearfully at the windows, but soon as there was no reappearance of the face they remembered the codes themselves and came back to the table.

"Let's see," exclaimed Jennie. "We whistled for the guards to show themselves but none appeared. Taking her she went down from the wall or hall tree she started toward the door. Her sisters became uneasy at this, for they feared there was unseen danger lurking in the darkness, but as she was heavily armed, and quick on the shot they did not think it necessary to follow, so they comforted themselves with the thought that one cannot be clever enough to surprise her or even themselves in the day or night time. Jennie quickly went out while Joice now brought a powerful glass to the table. Angell reproduced the map and placed it again on the table, while Daisy went to the door leading to the outside outside, and remained hiding securely behind some curtains to surprise any strange person who happened to sneak in.

"Now we are ready to examine the envelopes and their contents," said the general, but violet replied:

"We have got to think of some secure place to hide this map before to-morrow morning morning, but I think I'll have time now to fold it properly."

"Very carefully she folded it up, and then looked it up in the drawer of a secret cabinet in the wall.

"At last," said violet hugging herself gleefully "we have ample time to examine these packages before bedtime. So let us girls all sit down and enjoy ourselves with the work. After spending three days on the map we can be glad to have time to do something else."

"I'm afraid you little Princesses will have to do most of the work," said general Brown "for you understand how to work out codes more than we do, and use less time."

"I know that," declared violet, "but that renders us agreeable companions despite our high rank. Most people grow impatient over the least thing, so it is a relief to find to two good hearted generals who always helps us through our difficulties."

Both men looked at violet and her sisters with much awe.

"Don't you little Princesses find it very thrilling to reside alone in such a small building especially at night?" asked general Marcus.

"No, we are quite proud to be alone sometimes," was Joice's reply.

"I suppose we are thoely ones in all the world that the enemy would give anything to destroy, or see us destroyed. There are many dangers we have faced but as yet they are not so awfully exciting."

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS ARE ROBBED.....!!

WHO EVER SHE WAS, she was about the size of Joice, Vivian herself..... AROUND her neck however was a ring of beads made of apparent delicate purple beads which appeared like jewels, and she wore on her breast a locket in the shape of a heart, and appeared to be made of a blood red ruby. Her eyes were gray blue and she was delicately formed but perfectly. She had beautiful hair, that was like spun gold, and though she was delightfully pretty and always had a smiling expression about her face there was an expression of light in her eyes that evidently showed she was like a ferocious wild cat when aroused to anger or excitement.

"Well violet dear, do you mean to make us an introduction or not?" demanded the new arrivals in a tone of cheerfulness, "coming to me by a dear friend are forgetting you have two generals as visitors."

"Excuse us," returned Jennie laughing. "This is general Charles Brown, commander of general Vivian's light Grand divisions."

"It seems I've seen him before and many times too though he has seen me not," observed the child bowing gracefully.

"True indeed, so I recognize you," replied the general giving her his respectful regards. "but it has been so long that I have forgotten your name."

"Yes I have been so busy lately for many days," the girl explained.

"I've been in the heart of the forest, and the enemy lives, and though that rebellion is dangerous to approach, I accomplished my mission without an exciting adventure this time, who is your companion?"

"It's general Paul Marcus," answered Brown....

"I have never seen him before," she said.

"You have not? Well that's strange. He's been a general since the war started, with more years of this conflict he will be a very great general."

"If he survives that long won't you consider that magic?" the girl inquired.

"It may be but it would be our blessed Lord's work which is more wonderful than anything known to us. For instance its his protection power that made you and the Vivian girls Princesses able to perform your brave deeds successfully, and it would be a poor poor job if any one else would try to do what your stunts, because you girls are experienced to them, are useful to the nation in all ways, and a tremendous bother both to the enemy and their spies, but all that don't make you proud. I believe you will always be the same sweet little good little girls, some what may and the same saucy foes of the rebels, with clever brains and lion's hearts."

"No one can regret more than I the fact that the war is so severe," said the little girl slowly away her locket from side to side. "This is very war is making the whole world a most uninteresting place for me. I've wandered through the camps of many Glendolinian armies, until the excitement for me never seemed to cease, and now when I come into this house the sight of a strange face looking into the window just now from the outside bores me dreadfully. We are all facing unseen danger."

They all were surprised to hear this.

"That may have been the same face we observed in the window over twenty minutes ago," said violet.

"Did you not try to find out who it was?" asked the girl.

"Jennie did but came back with you instead."

"That was because she met me as soon as she left the house, and we had too much common sense to stay out in the dark company streets alone in such a stormy night."

returned the girl. "Can't we all go out then and investigate so we won't need to feel so uneasy all night?" asked Angeline pleadingly. "I'm afraid to go to bed now for fear we'll be robbed while asleep."

"Perhaps so, we can try it after these letters are carefully put away," said violet, "but we will have to be very watchful that no enemy of any kind surprises us in the dark."

The girl who had from her excitement forgotten to introduce herself to the two generals now walked up to the window followed by Joice and violet, and raising the sash looked out, and in every direction searchingly.

"Are you sure you saw the strange face?" violet asked.

The girl nodded.

"It is my belief that it is the face of some living my 'she said. 'Then behind me, in the dark, the work you plan to do is being done. He looked at me with a horrible expression and gave me a most ugly smile. But whenever he is I'm not going to allow him to touch me. He expects to do it. If we get our mitts on him we will make him regard us respectfully, and also regret that ugly look he gave me."

"I won't let him get in here," said Violet. "I could not repay respect and spine who are mean enough to rob little girls under any circumstances."

"But if he tries there will be more or more pain than he will like," cried Jennie in a whisper.

"Why did you not close the blinds?" said the girl. "You beautiful Princesses are too pretty for a ghoul-like ghoul to look at. They are not worth your very presence. Sometimes I believe it was a mistake that you were created to be so pretty, very pretty indeed, for it makes every movement an unusual thing to you. I should have also made me pretty, very pretty indeed, much too pretty, and yet I'm sorry for the ghoul-like ghoul who has me, and every place I go to, and every hour I've been watched closely and closely, and often in a quiet room, I get some afraid that my very heart beats may bring a dozen men upon me and that I would have to strike like a 'pattin' he left the window and went to the door as she said this, and opening it stood in the doorway looking in every direction very sharply, and with such caution. 'But I do not see any one outside.' 'I'll bet that pretty stranger will hate himself for letting me see him as he evidently knows me,' continued the girl. 'If I were you, Violet dear, I'd hide that map somewhere else than in this house or make another for safe keeping. That map may burn the house down to destroy it.' 'Your advice is excellent,' declared Violet much afraid to even carry it with her on all occasions. 'But I don't think the map would understand the map, considering what it is made of. Even the rubbers in the sky have not so many colors, and you must admit the window is a very pretty thing.'"

The girl softly closed the door, and then the window and looked it. 'Have it your own way then,' she said. 'If something happens I'm sorry that's all. Ghoul-like ghoul are not to be trifled with under any circumstances.'"

Yet so excited and apprehensive did they all feel that not one of them dared retire for the night, and Violet and her sisters were glad the two generals were intending to stay for the night, because they felt more protected.

They feared nothing for themselves, for they could not see their enemy first on all occasions. In some cases one tried to kill them. It was the loss of the map that was depending they feared. And yet none dared go out for fear of some one entering the house and robbing them of the map while they were gone.

Violet and her sisters were wonderfully beautiful little creatures, to the two generals, who had never seen or known anything of beautiful children before, although they had lived in a magnificent roomed the world over and seen and knew countless pretty children. Children over since they became men, or a time now having put the lights out they remained perfectly quiet but nothing unusual happened and they could plainly hear the rain dashing against the window panes with redoubled fury and it was beginning to thunder and lightning with great fury. The two generals who had forgotten to mention their loss, and would not have had, but had not this excitement occurred a account of the strange face at the window had retired into the darkest corner of the room with Jennie and Violet, and they decided to remain all alone here for the present until some exciting something exciting occurred.

Only that the strange face at the window had caused them to fail to remember their own important mission, but now they had started at to mingle with new adventures, and the first exciting experience proved so thrilling, and even interesting to them all that they could not yet find nerve and comfort to retire and sleep despite the number of guards. And it could be possible that some of the very guards would be spies in rank disguise. The girl who had admitted the two generals though only eleven years old was an excellent cook for her age, and had given the two generals a fine supper before admitting them into the presence of Violet and her sisters. When they had thus been quiet in the dark for sometime, and nothing now happened, Jennie who was standing beside general Brown said:

"This is one of the most trying experiences I and my sisters have had for a long time, for twice already that a man's face has appeared at the window. I shall be glad when it is daylight again. What a relief the coming of day will be to us."

"It will indeed be relieving and save us from much anxiety," said general Brown. "By the way general what brought you and your comrades here to see us. What was the purpose of your visit?"

General Brown then suddenly remembering said it:

"We came to see if some of our important articles we had been taken as a temporary loan by you or your sisters. I do not worry as you know if they are in your possession as therefore they are safe. But if they are not, and are really gone, that would be a dangerous loss, and would make me scared and discouraged for of course they would be of great value to the two generals" and he explained the things he missed.

Jennie was somewhat disturbed as she listened to this, and the general began to fear it was true, that the Vivian Girl did not have them. But if so it was too late for regret, since all this time he had forgotten to mention them. He might have suspected this of what he had lost, and now he feared his loss might incur a disaster. He now believed a spy had seen him look up his things, and had slipped past the guards and added his room when he was not there. Jennie went to her sisters and spoke to them about it, and asking lights again they all went through every thing they had even through a book case.

"We can't find them," said Violet in a whisper. "and I believe we were not even at your headquarters this afternoon. We girls believe that some spies, tried your room, and in their efforts probably performed one of the greatest acts possible for any experienced spy even to one of the hundreds of men that ever raged in the world. In no other case could it be done at all. I think tonight that you two generals have been robbed. And it is very unpleasant to reflect that since you only told Jennie now and it is such a long time since you missed them that it would be too late and useless to attempt to pursue or trace their captors now."

As she spoke she went to the window again to gaze out and then seeing nothing but the rain falling in streams down the glass she pulled down the shade and looked the watch.

"Hear!" and uncomfortable things will always occur during wars," remarked the girl who had come in with Jennie (who is she) "but I see no harm in taking that important map with us when we go to general Brown's headquarters tomorrow. By that way we can heat the map to it."

Jennie removed the map from the hiding place in the secret cabinet and unfolded it to place upon the table. They all bent over the table on which the map was placed. The two generals stood behind near the window, general Brown at one side and Marcus in front, where he could have the freedom to see if the face would appear again.

"All ready to fold it properly?" asked Violet.

"All ready," they answered.

So Jennie started to fold it and at that moment there was a sound as if something heavy struck the ceiling and a heavy shower of plaster fell directly over all of them and onto the table. This surprised them all none too much and they all ran or sprang from the center of the room, Violet grabbing the folded map as they did so. All of them were so startled that even some of them had sprang backwards so quickly that Violet and general Marcus bumped together, the general throwing up one arm to shield his face from the flying wreckage. Accidentally struck the folded map from her hand and sent it flying across the room, striking striking Angelina in the face. General Marcus had joggled a big book case behind him and upset a wing mantle clock that was standing on top and overthrew the book case which fell with a deafening crash splitting the book out and shattering the glass of the two doors.

Jennie and Jennie uttered such a wild cry that the others nearest the book case jumped away, and the other girls sprang after the two generals, Catherine clamping her arms around general Marcus in her effort to prevent herself from falling. The little girl who did not give her name, started and drew her gun and made for an object lying out of a window and firing ten shots, and so it was that when the clock and the book case fell, the clock crashed only upon the head of general Marcus. Then when all the excitement was over they all stood motionless in exactly the positions they were when the confusion died down all covered white with the plaster dust.

Violet then ran to her sister Angelina, filled with a terrible fear for the map that had been hurled from her hand in the confusion. She did not have it either, even though she had received it full in the face. When they all looked around for it they could find no trace of it. Even the strange envelopes, and the letters had mysteriously disappeared. Angelina was now dancing around the room in a frenzy of fear and despair, calling upon her sisters to summon the guards, and help to recover the map again. The others quickly recovering from their fright and confusion now came together in a group looking at one another with deep despair in their faces. The other girl looked at them all and sneered.....

"I don't blame you for feeling alarmed," she said. "We have been outwitted by that darn spy at the window. Can't he hear it?"
"Horrid!" repeated Violet. "Why it was thoroughly dreadful. This incident in origin? If you please not forgettable. Of all the dastardly shenanigans and amazing disasters the world ever had this must be the worst. Indeed, she but poor Angelina suggested the making of the map and now its possession the window has been pried open."

They all crowded to it in a moment shouting for the guards to show themselves. Jennie noticing something cold and round lying on the floor stooped and with some very great difficulty picked it up and calling the attention of all the rest, they all stood and examined it. It was evident that this thing had been thrown at the ceiling and the fact that it did not hit any one was a marvel as it was a round ten pound piece of granite stone. Gone our outside had flung it at the ceiling from the open window. They were filled with amazement, who ever would have realized that stone on the head would have been killed instantly. Then addressing them all Jennie exclaimed:

"Someone threw this at the ceiling from the open window. If it had hit one of us good night, that one would be playing the larp with the angels now. But I'm glad it didn't. I'm awfully happy that it missed any of us that's just what I am, and nothing else."

"Let's be quiet," said Violet in a whisper. "Be quiet, I think I hear a strange scratchy noise. We must recover that map for if a big misfortune comes to the nation through the loss I'll go mad."

"Let's go outside and search," said Catherine who had wanted herself in a chair and looked very dejected indeed.

"Think of searching all of you if you want to but we don't dare without a strong escort and plenty of torches," cried Violet frantically. "It would be useless on such a dark and stormy night, and such thunder and lightning. Here that scratch it just shocks you."

"One but one thing has got to be done," said Catherine speaking in a voice of despair as a terrific thunder roll crash like army in the sky and shook the house to its foundation. "I'm tired of letting Glandelinian spies doleful cross us all the time. I wish they'd cut it out and take a rest."

They all looked gloomily at her.

"Let's be quiet," said Violet suddenly. "The guards do not respond to our call. The spy or thief must have done something to them."
At once all the girls went up to the window and fairly screamed screamed but to no avail their shouts were drowned by the crash of thunder booming and booming every second with all its violence and therefore brought no response, and they feared exceedingly that there had been more than a dozen spies, and to accomplish their purpose they have done something to the guards, or maybe they were the spies, themselves in disguise. Violet felt an angry and afraid, and disconnected as well as broken hearted that she furiously kicked the round stone into a corner with such force that it knocked loose the planter, and then sat down on the chair not knowing what to do.

"We have had many bad things happen to us before," she said resolutely as a flash of lightning lit up the whole outside like day. "But this misfortune is enough to drive every sane person in the world dark or stark or mad."

"It's no use now to feel so bad about it," answered general from an ear-splitting roll of thunder almost deafening them and rattled the window pane like an earthquake. "You know it is partly my fault as I accidentally hurled it out of your hand during the confusion. I did it my dear girl so don't blame any one else."

"So the spy has bungled everything," said Violet almost ready to cry through grief over the loss. "It's all our fault in some way. I believe we all have been born unlucky you know. I wish that angry thunder would come. You'd think the sky was blowing to pieces. My god listen to that crash. It's dreadful."

"What's more than nonsense Violet," retorted in a the girl friend. "You and your sisters never have been unlucky and who in this world has the intelligence to accomplish all the marvellous stunts that you have done. When you girls even direct the actions of all the boy and girl scouts. Some day I think the unlucky ones will be the Glandelinian generals who have made all the trouble for you and chased you all over the country. What did you lose anyhow?"

"The map," answered Violet as another deafening thunder crash filled their ears. "General Brown accidentally hurled it out of my hand during the confusion."

"Well why don't you summon a crowd of soldiers and search the whole house?" asked the girl friend. "The thief could not have gone very far and probably he would not risk going out in such an awful storm."

Violet suddenly jumped to her feet as a flash lighted up the whole room.

"My gosh I'll do it she joyfully cried amid the ear-splitting crash of thunder, and grabbing her whistle she ran to the open window and blew upon it as hard as she could.

Her sisters rushed forward to open the door but Jennie reached it first. The soldiers all dripping wet came and the search continued until morning the storm quitting toward midnight. But not a trace of the spy or the map could be found. So excited were Violet and her sisters that they had not gone to bed at all that night. There was not a place in the building that had been overlooked and while the search had been going on, all the sentries and pickets had been ordered by telegraph not to allow any one to leave the lines not even if he was general. Vivian himself, but when the search was over and it had been futile, Jennie who was the first to enter the building threw her dripping and wet hat far from her in her fury and grief and with a wail of despair.

"The map is surely gone," she cried. "We wanted so much to see in making it, hoping by its use it might have saved our nation from so many disasters."

Then she bowed her pretty head in her arms and began to cry. Her sisters did not cry but some of them patted. The two generals were sorry for them and so was the girl who herself went up to Jennie and said:

"You can make another map just like it Jennie dear. Why not do it?"
"It is not that," said Jennie tearfully. "We would not worry if it took sixteen long years, but I fear in it will get into the possession of general Gormann Delight. You cannot hide anything from him. He would understand that map surely and it would be the ruin of us all. The very war would be lost."

"Good God is that true?" was the girl's agonized reply. "While we stand here idle our poor nation is at stake. We must act quickly. General Delight why that Glandelinian general could find difficult places on a map in the darkest room God help us if he gets possession of it. Why stand we here idle like marble images?"

"But what else can be done?" asked Violet.

The girl shook her head at the question. Then suddenly she seemed to remember something and looked up.

"There is only one way we could frustrate the enemy if even if the map is not restored," said she. "The two generals you know are out with large forces now trying to trail the spies down. It may be hard, difficult, and dangerous to do the thing I plan, or it may be hard to find the spies, but if they were recognized and the papers seized from the one who has it we could do in an instant what will otherwise be impossible to save our nation from the fatal effects of an immeasurable disaster that we would not recover from."

"If right then let's go out into the rebel lines and find the spies then," suggested Violet hopefully. "Though it may be risky that seems a lot more reasonable than moping over our loss."

"That's the idea Gertrude Angelina dear," said Violet approvingly. "I'm glad to try anything once, but we will have to wear disguises that are exceptually good to use and we'll have to go some to come across the Vandal spy if we suspect them as we know their faces anywhere."

"It'll be dangerous though," repeated Gertrude Angelina for it was intention?"

"I—I believe I we intend to follow our plan Angelina dear," said Violet. "But to think of it. I don't like the idea of spying on spies. It's like jumping in a hot fire with gasoline on your clothes. She replied looking grave.

"It's fits my plan better to enter general Delight's headquarters, hide somewhere and seize or destroy the map which ever in the quickest and safest. It's better to do that and nothing else. Have you other plans of your own?"

"I had the foolish idea of shooting the spies down in the very confines of the enemy's camp, but it would be quite and unbecoming and most dangerous thing for me to do," answered Gertrude Angelina. "This incident to me seems to surely bungle everything."

"Yes indeed," sighed Violet. "This whole incident in a very and hangle taken in all. I almost feel we did wrong to make the map as we did for it may be useless to a many other Glandelinian generals but if it get's into the possession of Marshall Gormann Delight then good night. Such a misfortune never happened to us before."

"The situation may not be so awfully bad as you may think," retorted the girl hero ne heroine. "I've been through many thrilling experiences a good many days during this war so far. I've never met with any misadventure or been seriously injured by the enemy once."

"You seem to have been captured once," Jennie said with a laugh, and then Gertrude Angelina laughed too.

"Tell me please Gertrude," pleaded Violet. "What must we all do you to prevent general Delight from securing possession of the map, and if failing in that how can we find a way to save our biggest armies from a fatal disaster that many end the war in favor of the enemy?"

"First," was the reply as Violet and her sisters were working hard on their disguises. "We must secure a fake passport and pass for each of us into the enemy's lines. Their passes are written on a piece of paper clipped or cut in the form of a four leafed clover. We can only secure that by making them ourselves. Passes into the rebel lines are very scarce & on now and very hard to secure."

"We can easily make them," said Violet.

"The next thing," continued Gertrude "is to enter General Delight's headquarters on the left wing, while pretending to be a Glandelinian boy or girl scout. We will have to secure an extra pass for that also. That pass may have to be original and can only be secured in the Glandelinian Tribunal house in the center of the rebel lines west of Delight's headquarters."

"We'll find some way to secure it," declared Joise putting on an old gray hat. "Is that all now?"

"Oh no, we'll have to carry a fake book of recipes to use to deceive the Glandelinians should they question us," saying this she drew out a very small book covered with red leather. "We must disguise ourselves well and enter the enemy's lines at moon time. We won't be able to attract attention then."

"But what kind of a building is General Delight's headquarters?" asked Angeline.

"It's a two story frame house in a section of the woods where few ever dared to penetrate and where our spies never found their way. When we go we must take care that no rebels see us reaching it or entering it, and we must avoid the disguise readers."

"We can accomplish all that well," said Catherine. "When we must find out which room he usually does his military writing in, and must find some place where we can hide in the same room without he or his officers seeing us."

Violet and her sisters looked grave at this.

"Won't that be a suicidal business?" Daisy inquired.

"There may be some sort of danger but I don't think it is like suicide or I would not suggest it. He is a good crackshot with any gun and so are his officers and men but I've never seen any Glandelinian who could outdo us in marksmanship just so far," replied Gertrude.

"If we can find it safe we will do it that way," said Hottie. "We must prevent him from getting that map come what may. But is there any chance of entering the general's house? And will the spies, whose names are Francis Pedro and Christie Morofania bring him the map or find out what we are doing and show us?"

Gertrude thought for a full minute, then she said:

"That's the only thing those spies will do. And of course we must do everything I plan or our efforts will be of no avail. We can never even shadow the spies ourselves if we come across him or the both of them. We all know their faces. One the tallest is a Glandelinian and the other is a Glandelinian or a Glandelinian. We don't need to do anything rash and there must be a chance somewhere to accomplish our adventure or I would not dare think of suggesting it."

"All right," returned Joise trying not to feel scared or discouraged. "We will all try to do the best we can. Our nation's welfare depends on it."

Gertrude Angeline looked at Violet and her sisters in a doubtful way and then said:

"Come to think of it all this will mean a most perilous adventure for us perhaps we will have to face thousands of perils for we must search through different portions of the woods and rebellious and even elsewhere in order to locate the general's headquarters. He has thousands of scouting parties out everywhere."

"I know it," Gertrude but we must do our best to locate the map we lost."

"And also the papers and envelopes with the queer words we found. If we find one we can find the other for both were taken from us by the same spy or spies. Of course the letters of are of no real importance to us but the recovery or destruction of the map will restore our courage. We must do the best we can and while we are gone we can have our boy and girl scouts on the continual lookout for us so that if we don't return on the time set they can work their way into the foe's lines and see if we are delayed or in trouble. Then if we should unluckily fail to recover the map we will have lost no time in putting that general out of commission. But if we succeed we can return to the Christian lines as quickly as we can and if we are successful we can frustrate the enemy."

"We must start on the way to the enemy's lines at once," said Violet.

"And I will go with you," declared the other girl leaning in the room just then for she had hid behind the door and heard every word between them.

"No, no Mildred," exclaimed Joise. "We do not wish to have you run into any unnecessary danger for us. You are only a mere child much younger than any of us and have not yet gone through any adventures that we have. Please be reasonable. The Glandelinians hate little girls worse than a snake."

This little girl who had been dancing gracefully before her royal child friends stopped and looked at them.

"What do you mean?" she asked.

"Why you are only eight years old. You do not know the dangers," Gertrude herself explained.

"Very well," said the little girl. "But if I am eight even it is my duty to serve you and your friends the beautiful Glandelinian girls by helping you find the map you say two bad spies have stole from you. You need a lot of assistance you know, such as are not found so easily. I'm not a fighter like either of you but I know how to use my brains."

"It is true," sighed Violet. "But little girl are you well aware that we have undertaken a very serious and dangerous task?"

"Little Mildred only laughed and resumed her graceful dance; sang sweetly;";

"Here's a task for seven brave girls

To recover a loss from a foe of Earls,
A pass like a four leafed clover to enter thereon,

To secure the map and letters or begone,
Every one is needed for the work right well,

And people with brains to breathe the magic spell,
The crazy quilt map. To find they must also try,

And if we get them the Nation need not cry,
And if we leave the foe's lines without harm,

The country will make out of us a perfect charm,
But if we get them not then,

We might as well be the rooster as well as a cackling hen."

Gertrude and Violet and her sisters looked at her thoughtfully.

"You have recited that piece pretty good," said Violet. "And if that is true what you recited we won't have much encouragement when we start our adventure. However I believe we shall let you go with us but if we see it is too dangerous we will not let you into the foe's lines under any conditions whatever. Yet we think you may be able to help us for you seem to be more clever than we ever expected you to be. But we warn you to be very careful of yourself and do not allow your self to become separated from us. Try not to expose yourself or the enemy will suspect our mission. And remember when you are with us stick close no matter what happens, and we will reward you when our errand is accomplished."

"I'm going with you too," announced Angeline Ritchie who was the girl who had admitted the two generals.

"It is foolish for you to go too," said Gertrude. "You can't?"

"Why not?"

"You'd get too excited in no time and therefore you could not be any use to us for you are like liable to shoot even without necessity."

"I surely beg to differ with you," returned the girl in a dignified tone.

"Ten heads are better than nine and I've seen those spies face to face more than a hundred times and even again last night and know them on sight. One is a Glandelinian and he is that queer funny looking whiskered shorty that reminds me of Jesse in some comic paper. I've seen in Chicago. And the other is a Scoodler and he is like Augusta putt. You can even now see the mark on my forehead where one of the spies and the tall one at that struck me when he knocked me down. The tall one is Francis Pedro. And the shorty is Christie Morofania."

"Well you can go along," said Violet cheerfully. "You would have something to return his compliments from that blow. We are glad to have you any how, and I am glad to know you can recognize them too."

"Thank you," she answered.

Joise now took a small wicker basket from a cupboard and packed several things in it in a hasty manner.

"Well we are ready to start," she said. "I'm sure we'll find strong friends on our adventure who will assist us in our search. Let's go."

"We will and must succeed," said Violet and placing their guns in their hostlers, and putting on their cartridge belts they all left the building. Of course little Mildred Maxwell though a brave little girl had never been accustomed to the same stirring adventures that Violet and her sisters were, and had never traveled far outside the Christian lines or had really ever yet saw a Glandelinian soldier or knew what they were like despite the much talk of them she had heard. She did not even know the proper path toward the enemy's lines or where the thicket of the woods was situated. That was the reason why Violet and her sisters hesitated to take her along on this adventure.

Angeline riches was quite new to this portion of the country and did not know anything of this portion of the rebel armies of Hanleys command or of the portion of general Hermann Delight though she was an adventureress in her own way and was never captured because she was like a ferocious wild cat to the enemy, and like a little female demon when aroused in Abbiannia's cause.

There was leading from the Christian lines more than a dozen roads and paths toward the woods, so no matter which way they took at the start they could not miss their way and for a long time they walked on in silence and in silent thought, each one of them being impressed with the danger and the great importance of the adventure they were on the way to undertake. Suddenly Jennie laughed, almost screamed. She looked doubly pretty when she smiled or laughed and her eyes beamed brightly.

"Has something funny occurred that caused you to laugh?" asked Violet who was feeling very blue and joyless through thinking of the loss of the map.

"Yes indeed," she answered, "to think of the common incidents of this adventure pleases me for it is a queer and funny plan I am figuring out and the outcome of it will be queerer and funnier still. Here we are upon another adventure caused by that darn map we made which we intended to use for future plans or our own, and which is gone by an incident, that none of us girls had ever anticipated. Nevertheless we enjoy thrilling adventures))) for this war gives us a chance to show what we can do despite being girls, while the many cowards remain home hiding...D... under the (EOD)... bed. If that is not funny enough to see cowards shivering and covering under beds and other hiding places and to laugh at I don't know what is."

"I suppose you haven't traveled far from the lines or been through many adventures yet Mildred have you?" remarked Gertrude. "The operations of wars does not consist wholly of battles and scouting adventures or any other scenes that are observed on all sides of us-----"

"But I will this time going along with the pretty vivian girls, and are they not at good-----as they are---pretty...f...f."

returned Mildred-bobbing her head until her golden curls fluttered in the gale then blowing. "going along with them however sort of fills me with awe because it is like going along with celestial beings. If the rest of all the 'little girls in this world are only half as beautiful as they are and as good as they are I shall be glad they are here."

"I don't know what the rest of them are like I'm sure," said Gertrude, "but I'm going to find out as soon as possible."

"I've never been outside the Christian lines," Mildred added, "but to me the distant woods, are gloomy and look frightful, and the air is so moaning with sound that even very nature seems to be lonesome. Times must be near where nature is more beautiful and there is no great war going on."

"I wonder if any of the glandelinians we shall soon meet will think I and my sisters are as splendid and pretty as you say Mildred?" asked Joice. "All we have seen so far is nothing but the horrors of war, great battles, big fires, most with many sad adventures, and have seen nothing but immeasurable misery, when we go out on our many adventures. Yet to many people who know us we appear to be bright and contented. Yet very often we feel blue and sad."

"I think for one thing that your father the Emperor or made a great and most serious mistake in giving you and your dear sisters so much liberty in going on those dangerous adventures," observed Gertrude Angelina. "Perhaps as many generals have said you little Abbiannian Princesses will have an overdose of adventures some day, and then fatal consequences consequences will happen."

"What do you know about our adventures?" asked Joice. "A whole lot," replied Gertrude. "Just now to my way of thinking the Glandelinians mean to give you few stirring and exciting experiences with them for a time-----only a few----- just enough to keep you girls going strong--- but some day when you are least expecting it----- they will add a good many more of the worse and most horrible kind--- more exciting than those you've ever read in any of the most exciting story books."

"Thanks very much," said Violet dancing along the path ahead of her sisters and then dancing back to them. "If a few more exciting adventures are for our good, many thrilling experiences must be better for our cause. I don't care a snap for wicked glandelinia and I defy her generals and her whole kingdom of officials officials as I would a small fly. I and my sisters fear nothing wicked."

"But you ought to realize that all the dangers you may face are no always evenly balanced," said Gertrude. "And at every time all of us must be extremely careful. You girls from your ways, your beauty, your rank, and your dignity, are to the nation worth more than the armies, the Counts, Lords, Dukes, and every one else combined. I'm telling you right smart Violet that your death or the destruction of your sisters combined would mean the fatal ruin of our poor Emperor and the loss of the whole war to him. And yet from the way you and your sisters are acting I guess that fact does not bother you. You may think that because you are so good and holy that you'd go to heaven straight. Maybe it's true."

But you are foolish if you girls do not heed my advice. What you are always doing should be left entirely to the members of the Gemini. What I've seen you do often is even grab a color from a fallen color bearer and even lead a regiment in a into the thickest of the battle. I'd be insane if you saw me do it."

"You did once!" laughed Angelina riches and then Violet added. "We have brains enough to know when times are getting too exciting so don't worry." And Jennie walked along in a very dainty and graceful manner. "The only dangers worth considering just now are the adventures we are looking for right now. I can remember Gertrude you have placed yourself in dangers often, that were far worse than a mouse jumping into a dragon's mouth."

"Yes but I did that for the nations cause."

"Go do we, so why argue further?"

After traveling for half an hour they came to the banks of the large Mico-Holleston run River that crossed their path, the woods and the enemy's position being on the opposite side. The day had been very hot and windy after the nights of dreadful thunderstorms, and the party being tired and hungry as well as uncomfortable from the heat, sat down to rest and eat something from the knapsack each carried.

Each one had the same morsel, bread, cheese, a little meat, boiled eggs, and some brown cake and butter and milk. One of them cut the bread and with the eggs made sandwiches. While they were eating they all gazed closely and intently at the river. At this point it was as wide as a good sized lake and for a time they almost fancied that the enemy had placed the river there to prevent their crossing it, and reaching the camps. There were no pontoon bridges, not even a boat in sight. To swim this river with the current very powerful they did not wish to try unless compelled to do so under necessary and life saving conditions.....

"Ah," said Gertrude Angelina. "We are stopped as if by a work of magic. This is a wide river and deep with a most powerful current, and the rebels have seen to it that there are no boats on this side of the shore, so it will be keeping me guessing how we will be able to accomplish our journey however much we need to go on."

"Why don't you flag the rebels with a white piece of cloth and have them row us to their shore," suggested Violet mischievously.

"Why do you suggest such a thing?" asked Gertrude gazing at her in astonishment. "Do you wish to have the excitement of being prisoners right away?"

"No," said Violet smiling.

"Then why don't you think of something more safer such as crossing over in a boat of our own?"

"Because their guns would blow us out of the water and send us to heaven quicker than you wish us to go," said Violet.

"And why don't you go over and steal or capture one from the enemy?" suggested Joice.

"I don't need that kind of excitement," said Gertrude. "It's too much fun."

"But by means of a boat is the only way we can get across is it not?"

"Yes but to get one is the problem," Gertrude admitted. "If we do not find some means to cross we'll have to turn back, and we'd have to make the crossing in the dark or if we try it in the day time they would use us as a target for their high explosive shells."

"Why not swim across," suggested Mildred who was like a fish in the water at all times.

"Ah we did not think of that," said Joice.

"Yes but the river has a powerful current and will pull us under," replied Gertrude. "If I did not think of suggesting that in the first place then I would be telling a lie. But I'm afraid if we try to swim we'll be dragged under by the current and drowned."

"Oh I didn't know that," said Mildred. "Give me some time to think."

Joice seeing she had no cake gave Mildred some and as she started eating it Violet asked,

"What next? How are we to cross the river? Pray tell us!"

"Swim," she said, scarcely able to speak with the mouthful of cake she was chewing.

"I tell you the current is too strong," said Joice. "Up once you tried that with all our efforts we would be unable to rescue you because you'd be beyond our reach in no time."

"Why not fly over?"

"Who will supply the wings?"

Being unable to win her suggestions Mildred finished the cake and then laughed.

"We must remain on this side then till we find a bridge, for it's true no one could swim the stream here," she said.

"That's what I said" declared Joice. "and I and my sisters are not fools enough to try. Can't you understand Mildred that we told you before that we would be likely to meet with dangerous adventures. Though being Princesses and superior children we are sharing perils that we do not wish any one else to share for their own good. Suppose you find out you cannot stand to accomplish the things we need to do? What then?"

"Why shouldn't I understand all that or anything else?" asked the little girl. "Please don't bother me by asking questions. I beg of you. I will not back out now under any conditions. Just let me discover everything in my own way."

As she said this she began to amuse herself by giving one of her graceful dances.

"Be careful don't dance too near the edge of the bank or you'll slide into the river and get drowned," warned Violet and her sisters all together.

"Never you mind."

"You'd better before it is too late Mildred, here is an twenty an mile an hour current here and if you fall in we'll all perish trying to rescue you. No one can swim in the face of that undertow except a Blongiglamenian Creature," Violet said.

"Don't you think the fish too can swim the current?" she asked.

"Yes but we are poor humans, not water creatures."

"Then" said Mildred "I'll be careful for if the river is as bad as that we'll never cross it until we secure a boat or find a bridge to cross. But why not try to bribe the rebels over there. They may be easily deceived, you girls are so unaturally beautiful."

"Do you think they'd fall for that plan?" asked Violet laughing.

"Fah," answered Gertrude Angeline. "We are as ugly women to those Glandelinian soldiers. We are not beautiful to those rascals the worse enemies we have. Please remember that my poor body has scars all over from wounds I've received from them. If I was transparent you would see instead of an exquisite red heart in my breast, a rolling cloud of fire. That's how much I hate the foe. Glandelinia is responsible for my sisters death and shall pay." and her eyes flashed as she said this and her face appeared suddenly transformed to that of savage fury.

"Sure thing" cried Angeline picking dancing around and looking quite excited. "and to think of the horrid things they do Gertrude. The Angelinian scouting parties have missed what we have seen, but we can't forget it, and I notice you Violet, and also your sisters have some very great accounts to settle with Glandelinia too. If you were ten thousand times more beautiful than you are now you'd be persecuted only that much more. The Glandelinian nation is too stuck up for anything. When continuing her excited angry dance she sang wildly;

Whoop-tee- doodle---do, hoop-tee-doodle---do.

A million foes have gone, and lost their hue;

Their feet are bare, but I don't care;

For what they'll do the odds are up to you, so why do we care for the fools who hide in their great big shoes."

"Goodness me" said Violet "don't you think Angeline picked a little Daisy of a Poet?"

"She may be but only in human form and not in that of a flower" answered Jennie, "urmer with a puzzled look for she too was with them." But if general Kormann insults us I'll scratch his eyes out" she suddenly declared.

"Let's find some way to cross the river please," pleaded Catherine rising with the intention to resume the journey. "Let's be all good and careful what we do and be as cheerful as possible for we are likely to meet with plenty of trouble with the Glandelinians pretty soon. Let's be on our way."

It was nearly time for the sun to set when they came to a line of nine big trees standing far apart in a straight row facing a smaller stream which ran into the river. This stream was known as Joe Callen Run. The trees were Poplar pines.

Beyond the stream they observed spread out before them a most delightful scenery. There were broad green fields of waving corn, stretching for miles over this portion of the Mc-Holleston Run Valley which was strewn thickly everywhere with myriads of pretty flowers of every kind, and here and there could be seen magnificent houses and farm dwellings none of which however was very close to the spot where they now stood. Just at the place where the road went beyond the nine pine trees stood a large wooden mansion covered with the leaves from the vines and not far from this stood several men in uniforms of gray with shouldered muskets. They seemed very much surprised and startled when the party of disguised girls emerged from the shadow of the tree as but as Gertrude approached nearer one of them covered her with his rifle and said;

"Halt where you are!!!"

They obeyed, but he looked so funny that the girls laughed. Whether these two guards were Glandelinians or not they were not so sure but they seemed to be all alone and there was no Glandelinian camp in sight here. However he had bushy black whiskers and merry blue eyes and his uniform was new and though gray in color was a great deal different than any of those the rebels wore.

"Mersey me" he exclaimed when at last he stopped looking at them so in such a quizzical way. "who would think I would ever meet with the girl n yivian Girls in such queer disguises. Who would think they could and would make out of themselves such a funny group of harlequins in disguise. What part of the christian line do you wish to enter, and where did you all come from Violet. You and Jennie are dressed up as if both of you were wearing crazy quilts cut out in the form of dresses. What's the idea? Going to a children's ball?"

"No you mean all of us?" asked Violet taken aback by being recognized by the soldier.

"Of course" he replied. "I'm a disguised picket guard. This is the outskirts of a portion of general Hanson yivian's lines."

"You misjudge our designs. We are not intending to enter the christian lines and coming here we must have gone way out of our course. We were heading for the insurgent camp under general Kormann," she said.

"That makes no difference" he replied beginning to laugh. "Why I was a little boy my mother used to sew such things like you two now wear and call them crazy quilts. But I never thought you two dear little Abbieannian Princesses could ever think of wearing such things for a disguise."

"It was a most important purpose that we did it" explained Violet. "We were robbed by a Glandelinian veldal."

"Oh then you have come out in that disguise to spy eh?" I should have known it at that. Well I declare. Here is Abbieannia's fiery Angel Angolinia Aronburg. But you will all get into serious trouble if you approach general Delight's army. For any one else it is against the law just now for any one to enter the enemy lines without general Hanson yivian's permission. So of course your own word is the law also so what you do is your own lookout. But if you Abbieannian Princesses go near general Delights camp you will surely be recognized by the Glandelinians and be shot down in cold blood or arrested as spies."

"We are going there any how for we must," declared Violet sitting upon a green chair swing and swinging her legs.

"I see" said the guard nodding. "You girls all of you are as brave as the very angels you resemble."

"We really should be brave," remarked Jennie. "But that is not to be wondered at when you can remember how many had to come to our rescue often. For my part many say I'm made out of a brick. Did you notice how the rest of us are disguised? You see we mean to do our work right well."

"So I understand" replied the guard. "but I don't see where you will be able to accomplish very much this time. To go into the foe lines during these exciting times is sort of useless. Yet your disguises surely make me laugh, and laughter is usually the best thing for us all to live by. Late this morning I saw two men in our lavender purple uniforms pass by who were strangely contrasted in size. One was a tall six foot man and the other seemed only to be four feet and several inches. The tall man was smoothly shaven but the small one wore a mustache. I almost laughed when I saw them for they exactly resembled Mutt and Jeff in the Comics of the Chicago Daily News Papers I receive from across the seas."

"Two men like Mutt and Jeff" said Violet her heart suddenly beating loudly. "That is strange. For God's sake where did they go. Where are they. I know them too like my own names."

"I'm not sure which way they went but I admitted them into the lines. One of them seemed careless and excited. The tall one had a roll of paper in his possession. When I questioned him about it he said it was a map he was bringing to general Hanson under strict orders to see that he got it personally. So I let him and his companion pass as they gave the proper counter sign."

"and you let them pass?" gasped Gertrude Angeline. "Why in the world did you not place them under arrest?"

"They had papers with them that showed that Emperor yivian favored them greatly so I could not. I would have if I had known who they were though. The papers said that the tall one is a great favorite of Empress and Emperor yivian and they have made him and his companion a Count and a Lord. He is called Jack Ambrose Evans and his companion's name is Penrod."

"So is Penrod?" inquired Jennie feeling very sick all of a sudden.

"Did you retain the papers," inquired Joice looking as scared.

"No" said the guard. "It was the man's personal property. I know only of one Jack Evans and that is your best friend, but I never saw him."

"We know know
"We have known him ourselves and there will never be another man like him," said Angelina vivian herself. "my goodness why did you let them in," she demanded stamping her foot and almost crying. They are professional spies and the tall man is Francis Pedro and the other one is Christie norf Nerf Nerofania.

"I suppose we must see general panson vivian for now we must shadow these two within the very christian line if we can get them without within our sight."

said violet.
"but for?" asked the guard.

"We must secure that map as it is ours."

"It's a long journey to his camp," declared the guard "and you will go through through lonely woods and traverse dangerous spots before you reach them."

"guilt's us all right," said joice "the spies not suspecting we are shadowing them will not suspect anything, and will therefore remain within the christian lines in a disguise to secure more information if possible. We may find a chance to capture them."

"You are crazy girl. Those who dare shadow glandelinian spies are likely to meet swift disaster. Better sent the Gemini to shadow them, and stay at home."

The guard who was really one of the Angelinian pickets then invited them all to remain for the night in his little cabin or house but they were anxious to go on, and so left him, and crossing the creek by a small bridge continued swiftly along the path which to their surprise was much wider now and more distinct even in the coming dark darkness. They expected to reach the christian lines before it grew totally dark but the twilight was very brief and violet and her sisters began to fear they had made a mistake in leaving the two guards.

"I cannot hardly see the road," said Violet at last. "can you see it Jennie?"

"No," she replied, and Mildred was holding fast to Joice's arm so she would guide her.

"I think I can see it faintly," declared Gertrude. "My eyes are good and if only the moon would!"

"Never mind the moon please," said Jennie Turner hastily. "just lead the way and direct us on. Wait a minute every one. I hear a queer whistling noise far off. What is it?"

They all listened but they admitted they heard nothing. They continued on more cautiously, Gertrude Angelina guiding them along the road. Though the others did not, Jennie Turner still heard the strange noise, and she grew more nervous. In deed she and the others had proceeded in this manner for more than an hour when suddenly far before them there appeared thousands of large twinkling lights, and they were all the colors the artist knows and were in a perfectly straight line.

"Goodie there's the christian camp at last," cried Mildred.
"When we reach it the good christians will surely welcome us and help us catch the two spies."

Yet however, far they walked the myriads of lights seemed to get no nearer so after a while Gertrude said:

"It seems to me the lights are moving forward too, and whatever they are, or mean we shall never be able to catch up with them. But here is a small tent by the side of the road so why go further. The spies will still be there to morrow."

"here is the tent Gertrude. I don't see it!"

"Just here on our right violet."

They went closer and they were now able to see a small tent near the road-way. No one else was near and it was silent and dark inside, but violet and her sisters and even the others had not slept the whole night before, and had traveled hard during the day and they were good and tired now and wanted to rest badly, so after a short debate violet went up to the door of the tent and called:

"who's in there?"

"who's out there?" cried a man's voice from within.

"The Daughters of Emperor Vivian Vivian, and with us are Gertrude Angelina and three others," violet replied.

"What is it? Are you in danger?" asked the voice.

"No we want a place to sleep until to morrow," said violet.

A light suddenly appeared and as they were admitted they saw only one soldier. Seeing that they wished to go directly to bed the soldier set up the extra cots that were in the tent. Then he went outside to go on guard for them though he laughed quietly to himself at the funny disguises one or two of them wore. As soon as they put the lights out they retired. It was now very dark inside and they could see nothing at all. Then feeling suspicious Gertrude said:

"I'm nervous about this. Why is it that he is the only one here?"

"He's a guard," said Joice.

"I can't believe it."

"He must be," declared Joice. "he spoke so nicely to us. I could see everything in the tent and no other soldier was present. But he put up all the beds, all made up so we may as well go to sleep and stop worrying."

"But what is that queer noise?" inquired Joice.

"It's just what I've been mentioning," said Jennie Turner.

"Well why not one of us," remain on guard," persisted Joice.

"Here, here let's not pay any attention to the noise," cried violet.

"Keep quiet girls please, and let's go to sleep."

However Gertrude went outside and looked sharply around for the cause of the strange noise but could discover nothing although the sound was not very far away. She felt a apprehensive and excited. The soldier whispered to her:

"Ain't you going to bed with them?"

Gertrude went in without a word and felt of her bed and found it was big and soft with feather pillows and plenty of blankets. So she took off her shoes and clothes and crept in. Yet still she felt puzzled over the strange noise. Mildred sat up looking scared.

"Lie down and go to sleep," whispered Gertrude.

"Can't I sit up for a while?" asked Mildred. "I'm scared of that noise too."

"Better forget it," Gertrude advised.

"Are you sure we are safe?" she asked.

"I'm not sure."

"Then I'll stay awake until to morrow," said Mildred.

"Listen Listen Mildred no you must keep perfectly still and go to sleep," said Gertrude in a soft musical voice.

"I'm afraid to," replied Mildred speaking as loudly as usual. "I get scared when I hear that noise. I feel like getting up and going out."

Before she could say anything more there seemed to be some kind of a concussion and instead of being in bed she found herself rolling and bumping on the floor of the tent and when she got up she heard excited cries from violet and her sisters.

"Goodness and Gracious what has happened to us!" asked violet for she and the rest had been dumped out of their cots also.

"Maybe it was an earthquake," answered Gertrude. "I felt my bed jump. But never mind lets go to sleep or we will never get a rest at all."

Recovering from their confusion they all got in once more and smuggling down in their beds fell asleep and so tired were they that no one not one of them awoke until the sun was far above the eastern horizon. Violet was the first to arise and she looked carefully around the tent. The tent was larger than it had appeared to be in the dark and had ten cots set on all sides of it. The bed violet slept in was nearest the door.

Joice and her other sisters were still asleep, Joice lying on a bed opposite violet's, the others were in the beds by the opposite wall of the tent, and the others were the next.

In the middle of the tent was a large round table on which a special breakfast fit for queens indeed already was placed smoking or steaming hot.

Ten chairs were drawn up to the table there a place was set for all of the little Heroines. No one was in the tent except a soldier who was to wait upon them. violet got up and put on her clothes, finding a military toilet at the head of the bed she washed her face and hands and rebrushed her hair and fixed it the way she had it the day before.

Then she awoke the others by blowing a bugle and they were all ready in a minutes time. Violet and her sisters were at the table but though the others went to the table they hesitated because the food seemed to be only for persons of a kingly or queenly rank. Gertrude seeing the three bashful girls hesitating said:

"What's the matter?"

"I wonder if we are to eat here too?" Angelina Riches said.

"Come and eat with us," commanded violet. "Don't be bashful."

The three girls were hungry indeed and the breakfast looked so excellently good so they bashfully took their places and ate all they could after saying their Grace before meals.

LOOKED IN.

THEN WHEN the after grace was said they arose, took their hats, and started for the door. Violet glanced at the soldier who had waited upon them.

"Come," she said. "we wish you to accompany us to the lines. You have been kind to us and therefore we will grant you this favor." The soldier made no answer but saluted, and after glancing about the tent room, went out the door, the sentry entering to take charge. In the middle of the roadway stood two powerfully looking sentries pacing back and forth.

"Oh there you are," one of them exclaimed cheerfully. "I thought you girls were never coming out. On't you know it has been daylight a very long time? It's half past nine."

"Did you have any excitement during the night?" asked violet.

"Nothing to do but remain here and gaze at the stars and the moon," replied the guard. "They were interesting last night. I never saw them so bright or so numerous before."

"Did you catch the two thieves?" asked the other guard.

"Of course not," said Joyce. "We did not even see them yet, but heard they are in your lines."

"You guards were foolish to allow those crafty spies to put anything like that over on you," remarked Violet. "One of them has an important map of our's."

"That's all right now," said the man. "All of our generals have been notified of your loss. If I had not been obliged to remain at my post I'd go with you. If I had not been here I would not have been able to see them nor the his companion."

"But companions did they have with them?" inquired Angelina.

"Two tall men and they came for the tent you girls occupied three times during the night."

"I cannot understand what they should want," said Catherine thoughtfully. "but we had plenty to eat in that tent for we all had a most fine breakfast, and we all slept on fine cots."

"Did you not all feel scared last night when the queer sounds filled the air?" asked the guard noticing that Mildred alone yawned.

"Why yes, and I feel still tired yet just as much as last night, and yet we slept well."

"But why did you all delay for the night. And you afraid the thief might have succeeded in returning to the rebel lines?"

"It seems strange to be but I don't think so and don't believe so," replied violet. "we have a good idea who the thieves are, and yet as we are in a hurry, I think I and my sisters with the others will resume the journey to Hanson's lines and not the enemy's this time. We want to spot the spies if possible."

They bid good bye to the guards and now were well on their way walking as briskly as possible. They could see the mass of stripped tents far in the distance and even where they were walking there stood tents scattered far apart but thickly nevertheless and they knew in which part of general Hanson's lines they really were. When they thought of it, Violet and her sisters still felt bad over their loss, and hoped desperately they would be able to discover and capture these two professional spies and recover the map. On they went. They continued on for a whole hour in silence when Angelina Riches started to dance up and down the road as she sang:

Kissle Kissle Korse;
I've seen a foolie upon the floor,
There's nothing to see but a battle without victory,
And the foe coming back
Looking like the nuts from the tree called Hickory."''

"What does that song mean?" asked Catherine.

"Don't ask me," replied Joyce. "I just composed it myself but of course I know nothing of the ways of the foe or anything else."

"No," said Catherine. "but I've seen them do things that is enough to drive any one stark, raving crazy. They fight battles-----"

"Both of the battles," cried Violet. "who cares about big fights now any- how. I am thinking of the map map. Have you noticed how far away general Hanson's vivians lines seem to be yet? It seems we'll never get there."

It was just then they heard a sound of swiftly running footsteps pattering along the broad path close behind them, and all turned abruptly to see who was coming. To their astonishment they beheld a very short and sized man running toward them as fast as his legs could carry him, and he wore a purple uniform and a big hat with a gold rim. He also wore a beard but no mustache.

"Hold on please," shouted the man pleadingly. "wait for me. I wish to talk to you."

"Goodness me, that man almost looks familiar," said violet. "it must be the small professional spy who we were looking for all over."

"Probably it is," returned Joyce in a nervous tone of voice, and then as the small man overtook them she added sternly; "who are you, and what do you want here, anyhow?"

"I'm a forgerer really, and have ran away from the army," said the man. "After you took left general Vivians army I and the general had a fearful fight and he threatened to shoot me if I did not get out of his camp immediately. Of course I had to do that because the Angolinians threatened to mob me at once. So I slipped out of the lines while most of the camp was sleeping and I've been running after you all night. Now that I've found such pleasant company in you beautiful little girls, I can hope to take refuge in general Hanson's lines."

As he had a most suspicious manner, and looked so cowardly all of the party including the accompanying soldier were greatly annoyed by this mans appearance and therefore did not like this unwelcome addition to their party. Also they did not believe his story, for if he really had a fight with general Vivian he would not have succeeded in escaping at all. Also they felt sure that they recognized him as one of the men they were intending to shadow, but not wishing to be rash by showing their suspicions too soon, as a spy is most dangerous if suspected they did not care to apprehend him just then. At first therefore they did not know what to say to the new comer but a little thought decided a decided them to be cautious.

"We all are traveling to general Hanson's headquarters on the most important business," declared violet. "and therefore you must excuse us if I say we cannot be bothered."

"A beautiful as you are, you are very impolite to your superior officer," exclaimed the bearded man, not knowing who the girls really were.

"I'm sorry but we are telling the truth," said violet almost laughing. "No one is superior over us but our parents. You must go somewhere else. We have no use for those who desert the army just because of a quarrel."

"This is surely very unkind treatment at the hands of you Abbieannian Princesses then (I must declare) whined the man in a most injured tone. "Every one in the national army hates me and yet I intend to fight on their side to help them win their cause. And yet even you who they say are as good as Angels turn me down when I'm in trouble and deserted the Glandelinian army."

"We don't hate no one and neither do we reject any one especially."

observed Angelina. "but there's something in your very actions and words we don't like. Before you said to deserted general Vivians army. Now you say you deserted the glandelinians, and before we left general Vivian's lines we suffered a severe loss. And we are bound to regain that article too. It is a map."

she said this to see if he would chance in aspects of his face but it took no effect whatever.

"But that is not my fault at all. It's the fault of those rebellious glandelinians spies. When I lived in the same building with you I used to hear so much squeaking growling, grum grumbling and clink clinking sounds so that it spoiled my sleep at night and the racket just frustrated every attempt to sleep I made. I must admit that I have a clean record, that you are wrong that I never deserted the glandelinians or general Vivian either, that I had no fight whatever and that you are wrong to be suspicious of me," answered the man.

"Just the same we'll demand you to please go away," said Joyce determinedly.

"Wait a minute," cried Gertrude Angolino. "something in this man interest's me. I believe I have heard about him when I also left general Vivians lines and I would like to find out for sure. What is your name sir?"

"Historia Collierbra Edisonia Peenbois, Gallenannia grandertonia Allenby," he answered.

"Well I shall call you Hic for short as your name would take a days study to know it by heart," said Angelina Aronburg. "go ahead and prove to us that you are a worthy companion. Please for the first tell me your name again."

However he did so without a mistake.

"You're You're crazy to allow him to accompany us," warned Angelina Riches. "I don't trust his face and besides no man ever had such a long name. He's kidding us."

"The whole world is crazy according to every ones statement. Loosen up and show that you are a true trust worthy companion Mr Hic."

"The only proof I have with me" explained the man in my hand, "is a paper, the recruiting officer office allowed me to get in just before I went into the battle. It's a highly classical slip of paper, a composition."

"A what you said say?" inquired Gertrude.

"It's a classical slip of paper signed by His great Excellency general Robert Angeline Vivianston. He had it manufactured. You are supposed to accept it whether you like to do so or not, and if you don't why the proper thing is to get out and look as if you did. I understand."

"Not in the least bit," said Gertrude, "but we have no general by the name of Vivianston. Let me see the paper. I believe you are hoodwinking us."

"Here it is. Take a good look at it."

At this he handed her an envelope and Gertrude first glancing over its contents showed it to Violet and her sisters. Just as they were looking over the slip of paper there all of a sudden came a horrid volume of sound in the distance, and in a moment Violet and her sisters put their hands to their ears to shut out the dread noise, and the others began to laugh but Gertrude snarled.

When it was from, the dreary horrid noise continued. Gertrude put the slip of paper back into the envelope and handed it to the man who receiving it apparently attempted to place it in his pocket but it dropped and fell upon the ground in the road. Joice picked it up and handed it to the man saying with a laugh:

"Violet it out. You let it fall on purpose."

Still the noise in the distance continued being something like a jerky jumble of sounds that proved to be so bewildering that after a moment Joice said:

"Let's run from here" and they all started and ran down the path as fast as they could go. But the short man was right behind them and he called out reproachfully:

"What's the matter! Don't you like my company?"

"It's not you we are running from," said Catherine halting. "That noise is getting on our nerves, but just the same we don't really know who you are and as you resemble some one we don't trust we are afraid to share you our company."

"Then here's my passport. That will prove to you that I am speaking the truth."

"How do we know? There's no one we know to identify you."

"Well look at this and see."

"All right, will," said Violet. "If you fool with us though I'll arrest you."

she added threateningly.

The man handed over what he called the passports and as she glanced over it carefully the man turned his head from one to another of the girls and said in a voice of great indignation:

"What's the matter with you now? Is it possible that you still can't appreciate me enough now to know me and trust me?"

"It is true we ought to be a trifle more suspicious," said Jennie, "but we can't understand anything and it is this. You look like some small man we'd arrest in an instant if we knew you were him. We cannot help being suspicious."

"Yes and we suffered a dreadful loss," exclaimed Joice with a shudder.

"Yes it's enough to drive an insane man mad," murmured Angeline. "I'll tell you what. He's about to drive an insane man madder to him for some reason or other you have missed your guess. You are not a real foreigner, your face and speech betray you. I bet you are the very man we want."

"You are greatly mistaken," asserted the man sadly. "I thought you girls who have beauty and charms enough to soothe a savage beast would not turn a poor soldier down."

"But we are not charming savage beasts. I advise you to go back to general Vivianston and beg the general's pardon."

"Never, never. He'd put me under arrest."

"That's what we will do if you persist in keeping company with us," Violet declared firmly.

"Run along. He and go along somewhere else," advised Jennie Turner. "Find some one who can really identify you to us, some one we know, and then we'll trust you with us. In that way you can do some real good in the world."

The man turned silently away and trotted down a side road toward another portion of the distant Christian lines.

"Shall we go that way too and shadow the man?" asked Gertrude anxiously.

"No," said Violet. "I think we shall keep going straight on for I or my sisters cannot be too hard on him. I don't believe our suspicions are justified but if we are mistaken he will surely come back with some one to identify him when we come to the next group of guards we will inquire the way to general Hanson's headquarters."

For a long time they continued on their way and an hour and three quarters of steady and brisk walking brought them to the edge of the main encampments of general Hanson's army and therefore they approached a tent which appeared somewhat better than the other two they had already passed. It was somewhat large and stood close to the roadside and over its top on a high pole fluttered the National Abissinian flag. From the appearance of the flag it was evident the headquarters of some officers and before the entrance of the tent stood two sentries.

"Maybe here is the place where we can get all the aid and advice we desire," said Gertrude. An Angeline. "Maybe they can tell us all we need to know. Let's admit ourselves into their presence."

They all walked up to the entrance of the tent without being even stopped by the guards. Violet then said to them:

"Why did you let us pass so easily? We are expected to be hailed."

"Because I know who you are despite your disguises," one of them answered.

When she received this answer, she looked sober, then she said:

"It's all right for us to receive the respect due to us, especially because of our rank, and other reasons too, therefore we may thank you for allowing us to pass unchallenged. But nevertheless you sentries must obey orders to the limit for the safety of our officers. You know us despite our disguises but supposing we were rebel boy or girl scouts imposing as Emperor Vivian's daughters, which could happen, and entered the tent unchallenged. We could rob those generals of some papers whose loss may be fatal to the cause if brought to the rebel lines. Therefore you are bound to challenge even our father the Emperor. We are going back on again, and return return and you must challenge us please."

With this they all retraced their steps and then headed toward the entrance of the tent. This time they were challenged.

"Halt who wishes admission to tent?" demanded the guard.

"The daughters of His Majesty the Emperor Vivian, and their companions," Violet answered.

"Give the counter sign," demanded the guard.

It was given.

"Pass," said the guard.

"All right," said Violet in a satisfied tone. "But for the sake of the cause you are fighting for do not make this mistake again. Do not be afraid of us. We wish to save our generals from losing things through spies."

Then Violet being ushered by the first sentry entered the tent where an officer dressed in a sarol or scarlet uniform and wearing a black hat with a blue rim and bells on the rim was busily engaged in conversation with three other officers. They arose when the visitors entered.

"Good morning," said the general in a deep bass voice that seemed loud in the room of the tent. What is your desire, pray?"

"Why we came for a good reason," replied Catherine. "We suffered a serious loss and we wish for some advice. It's free to ask for it is it not?"

"Certainly to those we know," said the general eyeing them searchingly.

"Usually advice does not cost you anything unless you do not follow it. Permit me to say by the way that you are the queerest lot of child travelers that ever came within the encampments. Judging you little girls generally from appearance you are so beautiful that your very eyes cut one to the heart. I think you had better converse with the officer over yonder. He's the chief."

They turned to look at the officer which they at once recognized. For a moment he stared back at them with searching eyes.

"It's general Vivianston," cried Violet.

"That beats anything that you children know my name," said the general frowning.

"Who are you Angeline beauty comes! And what is your errand?"

"We are what you once called us," said Joice. "The Darlings of the Nations."

"It's just nonsense," declared the general. Glandelinian girl scouts have tried the same thing and failed you are under arrest for!"

"You are rescuing foolish intentions for a general," laughed one of the officers.

"Yes indeed," said another admiringly. "You are the one who claim you can read the cleverest disguise and they have fooled you. They are real: the daughters of Emperor Vivian in disguise. Listen to what you should know from them and you will be wiser, and cannot go wrong."

"I don't believe it," retorted the general. "I say they are under arrest and!"

"No you are mistaken said Violet. Look us over carefully and see."

General Vivianston looked more carefully at them but it was a long while before he really recognized them. Then Angeline picked up said:

"The Vivian Girl Princesses have very charmed lives, They are no ones enemy, yet suffer and almost lose their lives, Yet lacking fear, and loving every one, They'll be loved even though full of fun."

"He is giving you quite a compliment. Quite a compliment indeed I declare," exclaimed one of the other officers looking at the child heroines with awe. "You are certainly wonderful children my dears, and I fancy you have foes among the Glandelinians. If you were my daughters your sorrows would make me a ruthless foe of your enemies. Your beauty when dressed in your queenly uniform is so dazzling that I'm a maid I would have to wear smoked glasses when I looked at you."

"Why do you say that?" asked Hettie. "It is usually said that most beauty is only skin deep, and usually goes with old age."

"It may be true for me for many but not for you," said the officer. "Even the disguise two of you are wearing are gay and gaudy."

"If it is only our beauty that dazzles you then you had better let the matter drop and wear the smoked glasses for fear you'll go blind," asserted Joyce. "While we strut around in our stupid purple or lavender uniforms we allow too many spies to slip into our lines unseen. We are robbed by some spies and they are in the very camp here."

"I'm afraid you are wrong about that," said the officer. "Four sentries and our pickets are too watchful and therefore no one can slip into our lines without being questioned. So I'm obliged to say that we are free from spies just now and I confess it is a very pleasant sensation."

Violet is searching for two spies,
Her sisters are searching for the same or the nation will die,
Cause their important map has come to harm;
Such maps are scarce, they are hard to make;
They've got a job you bet for their country's cause is at stake."

"Don't you think that your poem sounds kind of foolish and out of place Angeline?" asked Gertrude.

"Extremely so at that," replied Angeline. "Iches but don't you realize what warning I'm giving you. At I can admire you just the same for the reason that your poems are never foolish. Some say that you are wiser than most of the best learned generals, and that you are very unusual and therefore are sure to be a very interesting to your cause. When she started one of her graceful dances and said or rather sang:

"It's hard to be a war Princess;
All may soon know all of that at many glimpses;
Their beauty is so transparent;
That every one does an act/
That is always clear to us,
And that's a fact."

"Have you heard anything about the spies?" inquired Violet ignoring Iches poor poetry. "One of them has our map. With it in their possession, they can outwit all you generals."

"No we did not," said general Lindernine looking worried. "Of course it was so dark last night that the sentries could not see very well. But we'll look right into that immediately. But my advice should be excellent. I advise you all to follow it."

But surely you have not given us any advice yet," Violet declared.

"I know it. I was attracted by those queer poems recited by your comrade. What does she call those peculiar verses?"

"She just recites them for foolishness," replied Jennie. "Mildred sometimes does the same thing."

"Of course it may be a little foolish at that. We must all be a little foolish or would we allow ourselves to run into so many and unseen dangers? You are trying to be very complimentary to me indeed!" asserted Angeline. Iches rubbing her hands together as if highly pleased. Then turning to general Lindernine she asked:

"Which is the best road toward general Hanson's bivouac headquarters?"

"Westward," said the general.

"I know but what is the road we shall take?" was the girl's next question.

"The Big Girl Knool road of course, or road of yellow bricks. It leads directly to the main camp, and also through it."

"And how shall we find the Big Girl Knool road?"

"By continuing along the same road you were on before. You will come to the Big Girl Knool road before the approach of night. And you will know it when you come to it because it is paved with bricks made of yellow sandstone."

"Thank you," said Jennie. "At last we have found out the way we should go."

"Does that road extend just as far as Hanson's bivouac headquarters?" asked Mildred.

"No," replied Violet. "It goes to the big city of Angolinda Agathia from the city of Big Girl Knool. I know many other plane places but they would not interest us just now. The sooner we'll start the sooner we'll reach general Hanson's headquarters."

"So off we go through rain or snow,
When we'll recover from our loss, we don't know,
Patched up, ivian girls, three poor adees and lad,
All facing perils, all good and bad,
Meeting a thousand dangers, all making us grave and sad,
Steadily worried, feeling sometimes mad,
When we'll recover from our loss no one will know,
Nor do we for we're all glad,
Put off we go. But off we go."

"Sounds like she is giving us a hint," said Gertrude Angeline.

"Then let's take it and go right away," replied Violet.

Then they said good bye to the general and his officers, and at once resumed their journey. They continued for a long time and finally, Joyce said:

"We are entering the general part of the camp now. There are so many tents."

"Never mind the camp or the tents now," said Angeline. "We are not looking for tents but rather the yellow brick Big Girl Knool road. Won't it be strange to run across a yellow road running through a camp and stripped a tent?"

"On some occasions there are many worse things and having worse colors on in their coats than hearts than yellow in our armies," asserted Hettie in a spiteful tone.

"Oh do you mean that old cowardly Greenhorn of an Englishman who they said caused the disaster at the battle of Delight's junction?"

"He is one of them if you must know it," growled Joyce. "He is not worth a pair of pink brains, yellow heart, and green eyes."

"You are right," laughed Gertrude. "You'd be surprised if you knew how many more there are like him. I wouldn't give a piece of candy obtained free or a spoonful of cantal for their cowardice. I'd rather have a variegated complexion."

"Neither would I," retorted Violet. "We saw to it he was immediately deported. We had a hard time of it though in saving his life. The generals all wanted him executed as a coward."

"I'd of had had him shot," declared Gertrude.

"I see you don't understand about him," said Joyce. "He was a foreigner and therefore we had no grounds to condemn him to die though we were for it. Anyway we abhor condemning any one to die. It is not our nature."

"Please let us not talk about that any more," begged paisy. "We are on a most important journey now and such subjects like that at this time make me very discouraged. To be brave one must keep cheerful and not engage in unpleasant subjects so I hope we will be as good as possible."

They had now traveled for a long distance being continually gazed upon, and even questioned by guards and soldiers. When the tents began to change into wooden barracks and they went down the main company streets they suddenly came face to face with a fortified high line of breastworks constructed of every material known, and which to their surprise also stopped them from going any further in that direction altogether. A part of these breastworks lay across directly across the company street and was manned by a small forest of gatling guns not about ten paces from each other. When the group of child adventurers stood on top of the breastworks and peered beyond they saw a gloomy and forbidding looking encampment than any other they had ever observed in their lives before.

However they were not interested in these low fortifications just now and after traveling along its broad top for nearly all its length they soon made the discovery that the road way they had been following through the camp now made an abrupt turn and passed around the trench but what made the party stop and looked look thoughtful was an officer thirty feet away beckoning to them.

Not knowing who he was but deciding to be cautious nevertheless Violet halloed through her hands:

"We are the ivian girls with some companions. If you wish to speak to us come over."

The officer came as he was surrounded and saluting handed an envelope that was sealed to her.

"A tall general with a smoothly shaven but wearing a short mustache told me to give this to you," he said. "He told me it was very important. He wanted an answer." Violet looked nervously at him, and seeing that he looked honest, and trustworthy took the enclosed envelope which was sealed with sealing wax. She shook it first to make sure it contained nothing else but a letter and then she slit it open with her pen knife and this is what she read:

"BEWARE OF US TWO.

We are aware of it that you, civilian girl Princesses are shadowing us. We know why. Try to capture us and you'll find out you are trifling with two ferocious Tigers. Instead of you shadowing us, we two are shadowing you. Look out.

The Giant.
The Shorty.

"What does the message say?" inquired the good soldier noticing that they looked excited and were slightly trembling.

Violet showed him the note and his face whitened like marble.

"That means that the man who gave me that note may have been one of those two spy spies," he said looking as scared as a frightened cat. "It's a fact that there are two professional spies here in this camp. He must be trying to throw you off his track and that of his companion, or he would not be sending you this note. They are dangerous spies."

"As long as they know what we are doing, then let's keep out of their way and quit shadowing them," suggested Mildred. "As long as the road leads to general Hancock's headquarters we can see him and explain the loss to him."

"You indeed?" said Angeline. "I see you are backing out already. Our errand Colonel (to the officer) is to regain the map some one stole from Violet and her sisters. And we'll regain it if we have to trail a ghost."

"Let's go and get general Hancock to help us find the map," suggested Mildred. "These two spies are ugly in nature despite their funny faces and dangerous or they wouldn't spy like they do. Maybe they will be caught when they are not looking."

"Perhaps there is no chance at all now to regain the map," answered Jennie Turner. "The letter warns that instead of us shadowing them, they are shadowing us which may mean that they know every move we make."

"Nevertheless," said Violet, "this officer says that the man who gave him this note to deliver to us took up his abode in his headquarters three blocks down the company street. Suppose we go with him and try to capture him if he is still there! Very likely if he values his life in case we corner him he will politely surrender to us and if he is only a follower we can force clues from him."

"We may be compelled to force him I'm sure," said Joice as they started the officer leading the way. "and yet if he is a cross patch nothing could make him tell anything."

"But he may be dangerous also," said Mildred.

"You need not worry, Mildred," remarked Catherine. "For if there is real danger you can remain outside with the soldiers so that if we get into trouble you can bring help. I and my sisters, or Gertrude and Jennie, Turner besides Riche are not afraid. You surely not are you Angeline."

"I am a little," the child admitted, "but this danger must be faced if we intend to recover the map. How shall we find the room the man is in for here is the house before us now?"

"If he don't answer the questions we'll call some soldiers to break down the door," answered Joice as she and the rest began climbing the stairs leading up to the entrance. The other girls followed and found themselves entering more easily than they had expected. When they entered the hallway they began to walk down to the other side and soon were in the main corridor. Here they saw doors leading to the rooms but none of them were occupied when they looked in. They then began retracing their steps the officer leading the way and looking and wandering into every room until they were at the other end of the corridor. They now came to one last room which door was ajar. So far they had met no one in the building but when they saw the door open they knew the man they were wishing to see surely must be in there. Indeed for the bravest it is hard to face any savage landolinian spy who may suspect he is being shadowed without a sinking of the heart, but we know it is still more terrifying to face an unknown spy who you have never seen or had a picture of. So there was little wonder that the pulses of all the little girls beat fast and loud as they stood facing the door.

"I guess the deliverer of the message is asleep," said Gertrude Angeline. "I shall give a shot up into the air to arouse him."

"No please don't do it," answered Mildred Maxwell with her voice trembling a little. "I'm in a hurry, and I'm scared."

There was no need to fire the shot however and they had not long to wait either for the man who was in the room heard the sound of voices and trotting out of the room stood at attention before them. He was not exactly the kind of man they had expected to see. He was very tall and wore a hat that was square shaped and had an upper part whose top was flat. He wore no beard, had large eyes and gray pupil pupils and had a long mouth. His face was dark complexioned like that of a Mexican Indian and his features were not fierce or ferocious in expression but rather good humored and droll. He was absolutely a foreigner a true Mexican but who could speak the Abbinannian tongue well. Seeing his child like visitors the strange soldier folded his arms and took a good look at the girls, especially Violet and her sisters.

"Well, well," he exclaimed, "what a queerly disguised lot of pretty children you are. He. Trying to hide your beauty? Oh! He can't be done. At first I thought some of those miserable sneaking landolinian skunks had come to raid this place supposing it to be vacant, but I am greatly relieved to find you Abbinannian beauties instead. It is plain to me that you are a most remarkable group of children as remarkable in your features as the angels and saints in heaven—and so you are welcome to my hospitality, hospitality. Nice place here is it not put to day it is lonesome, dreadfully lonesome."

"Why did you join the army being of free foreign nationality?" asked Jennie Turner who was regarding the Mexican with much curiosity and suspicion.

"Because I had a desire for adventure and I like fighting. The enemy hate me because I kill all their spies which the rebel general sent to rob the Christian lines."

"Are you fond of shooting down spies?" inquired Gertrude Angeline.

"Not exactly. But rebel spies are very dangerous. And our generals do not like to see their places raided by spies and so they approve of it when I kill one. Of course I could not do that always."

"And why not?"

"So many of the spies are so clever that nothing can be done to cause their capture. Spies have tried to get me and finding they could not succeed in their attempts to destroy me they have been shadowed always. Unkind is it not? But nevertheless I keep my eyes open for them all the time."

"But what are you doing now in this building?" asked Violet.

"Nothing at all. I just came when I arrived and entered. I saw some one slip out of a window and disappear into the woods. Anyway since then I've been sleeping for a while while for I've been with a general on a scouting tour all night much longer than it seems to suit my taste. But duty is duty. So there being nothing to do here to day I thought I'd make up for the sleep I've lost last night." Then he added, "you little girls must be awfully hungry. I can get a good dinner ready for you in no time. Would you like to eat dinner with me?"

"I feel as if I would like a bit anyway," said Mildred. "Anything would be gratefully to my appetite."

While the dinner was being eaten all the girls were silent and cautiously watching every movement of the stranger. Then Violet thinking of the threatening letter again exposed it to the Mexican's view. The man reached for it and glanced over it in a twinkling.

"That's rather a good smacking warning," he declared without any evidence of surprise in his tone. "Any more enemies besides these?"

"We don't try to make any," said Violet. "But we have then just the same."

He glanced over it a second time and then went to a open window and looked out toward the woods. Then he came back again.

"That's mighty suspicious," he exclaimed. "Who sent this to you?"

"We received it from our escort," replied Joice.

The Mexican sat down in his chair and thought for a long time while the girls finished the dinner.

"That will do for us," said Violet at last. "I'm quite full. I hope I did not eat so much that I'll get indigestion."

"I do not think you will," said the Mexican. "It's better than what I eat at home."

"Well anyway I must say that we are all very much obliged and we are glad to have come and find out you are not one of our secret enemies. Is there anything you we can do in return for your hospitality to us?"

"Yes indeed" said the Mexican earnestly. "on beautiful daughters of his Majesty superior citizen have it positively in your gracious power to do me, a common Mexican officer a very great favor if it is in your will!"

"What is it?" asked Jennie Vivian. "Name the favor please and surely we will grant it if it is reasonable."

"I want you Vivian, Iris for your own personal safety to abandon the search for this map and leave it to me and the Gemini," said the Mexican but with some hesitation.

"At once our search for that map! What we say that the welfare of the country depends upon the finding of it, and everything else," exclaimed Violet.

"and we want it very much," said Catherine.

"The map is the sole safety of the nation if recovered," said Daisy uneasily.

"If we abandon the search for the map our friends won't think we are as brave as before," said Angelina.

"Yet the nation must retain you too," said the Mexican firmly. "I know more about these two spies you are trying to shadow than most any one who ever existed." and he told them all he knew about these two professional spies, and their work and how cautious, clever and watchful they were and that they both seemed to bear charmed lives. The brave children listened with great attention and when the Mexican had finished the recital Violet said with a sigh:

"We always always keep our word for being good we pride our selves on being square when favors are reasonable, so you may gain that favor of us for I think under such circumstances it would be selfish in us to refuse it. But we will do that on one condition."

"And what is that condition?" he asked.

"We want you to help us secure the man who has this threatening note in his possession. He may be hidden in this house somewhere."

"I certainly will and with great pleasure," he answered.

"Thank you sir, thank you sir very much," cried Violet joyfully. "May you wish to help us now?"

"Any time you like," answered the Mexican. Violet got up, went to the door and taking hold of the door knob tried to open the door. She failed, she strained and pulled with all her might but the door resolutely remained firmly closed.

"What's the trouble?" asked the Mexican who had noticed her useless efforts with evident surprise.

"I can't open the door," said Violet panting.

The Mexican laughed.

"I was afraid of that," he declared. "I looked you in, or rather the door looks itself. You will have to turn the door knob twice toward the right and pull harder."

"I'll try it," exclaimed Gertrude coming to Violet's side. "You pull the knob and I'll pull you and together we ought to open it easily."

"Wait a jiffy," called her sisters and then they formed a line and hugged each other tightly so that they could all pull together.

"All ready now go ahead," Joice said. "We'll all pull together."

Violet grasped the door knob with both hands and after turning thrice to the right pulled with all her might. While Gertrude seized her around her waist and the others added their strength to hers, but the door would not budge. Instead Violet's hands slipped from the door knob and she and all the rest rolled upon the floor in a scrambling heap and never stopped until they crashed against the wall.

"I give it up," said Violet as she arose and assisted the others to their feet. "A dozen strong men could not pull open that door. I believe it is nailed fast."

The Mexican after laughing for a few minutes went to the door and then said:

"You are surely prisoners alright. We have been double crossed while we were eating our dun dinner. The door had been locked or nailed from the outside."

"Then what shall we do?" asked the girls in a despairing tone. "If we get outwitted like this so often and a fail to recover the map the other exploits we wish to accomplish accomplish will be a loss on no use at all and we cannot save our armies from a terrible disaster."

"He makes a guess I guess," said Jennie Murmer.

"Never mind," added Gertrude. "I can't see that old 'Mutt and Jeff' can use the map themselves. Their efforts are not worth the trouble any how."

But Violet and her sisters did not feel that way. Violet was so disheartened that she sat down on a chair and began to cry. The Mexican looked at Violet and her sisters thoughtfully.

"Why don't you shoot upon the air and summon aid?" he asked. "I can break the door down but I don't like to do it unless I have to. Then when the soldiers come they can surely find a way to open it." sure.

Violet and the rest were overjoyed at this good suggestion.

"That's it!" Violet cried wiping away the tears and springing to her feet with a smile. "A couple of shots will bring help."

"But if the bullets hit the ceiling they will rebound and lodge into one of us," protested Mildred.

"It can't matter in the least. It'll only bring plaster down," said Angelina Aronburg. The shots were repeatedly fired but no one came up not until they each had kept up a perfect fusillade. Then a man shouted from below the window thirty feet above the ground.

"Who's there please. We can't get in. Every door is locked. All our generals and other officers are locked out, and ten thousand men are poisoned and many dying just after meals. What in the world does this mean?"

"We are locked in the general dining room," said Jennie Murmer looking down being surprised in hearing the strange news.

But the soldier not knowing who she was gave a little laugh and inquired in a scornful way:

"How do you intend to get out if we can't get in without breaking in or dynamiting the building. Not one of us have ladders. Someone of us are going to batter in the entrance. Everything is locked, and many regiments as I said are dying from poisoned food."

"It can't matter in the least," agreed Jennie Murmer. "If you can't get in we'll have to break out."

"One on then," said Joice picking up a chair, "let's break down the door. If that fails we can think of other things to do."

"How do you expect to break down an iron door with a chair?" said Angelina Aronburg laughing. That puzzled them all for a time. They now heard inside the building but below them the excited cries of men, a heavy banging and thumping sound, and something screaming to the floor.

"Let's go to the door and listen," suggested Gertrude Angelina. So they walked up to the door and then there was the loud tramp of feet and some of the men stopped by the door and a voice cried excitedly:

"How in the world did you get so locked in here. We had to break down every door in the building and hallways to get here."

"Someone must have gone in to escape capture," answered the girls. "We are the daughters of Emperor Vivian and have been shadowing a spy who stole a map from us. Please break down the door so we can get out."

"I cannot do that," said the voice outside. "It's a heavy steel door and the only means of opening it is by blanketing. But the force of the explosion would cause such havoc that it would kill every one in the room."

"If you can secure a ladder from somewhere we can climb down from the window," answered Violet. "We can also jump that high if you could secure a net. We had thought of climbing down from the roof but there seems no way to be able to do that at all."

There was silence outside for a moment as if those outside were trying to think what they should do.

"Can you break the lock?" the voice asked.

"No," answered Violet for we have no such tools. How can we pry away the ketch as we have nothing to do it with."

"Who ever looked at these confounded doors were not such numbskulls after all," some one remarked the sound of his footstep approaching the door. "And just think, ten thousand soldiers poisoned and many hot boys and girls counts also. How can that be?"

"You have not seen or heard the whole of it, or so you would not say that," declared some one else. "Every officer in this building has been robbed, and a threatening letter left behind for each."

"Robbed?"

"Yes, cleaned out, I also. This locking up business was done by some two professional spies or half a dozen of them."

Suddenly as he ceased speaking there was a strange loud growling noise whose sound echoed like rolling thundering cannons all through the valleys and woodlands which caused the girls to tremble with excitement, and Mildred to cover her head with her neck clothes. To them it appeared there was nothing in the world so terrible to hear than this sound. It lasted fully a minute and then suddenly ceased as suddenly as it came.

"I wonder what that awful growling sound was just then?" asked Violet in a most apprehensive tone.

"I do not know," answered Joice. "It is some kind of a danger signal and I'm sure it was anything else but an explosion. It was indeed the most fearful ear-splitting and soul shuddering sound that I ever heard in my life. I felt scared for a moment as I almost fancied a volcano was breaking into explosive eruption right under our feet. It sounded that way and yet theirs was so no earthquake."

"I saw flashes of fire and clouds of smoke along the horizon," admitted the Mexican.

"Real fire?" did you say?" asked Angelina.

"Of course it was real fire. Do you suppose it was flashes of imitation fire?" inquired the Mexican in an injured tone.

"I've just solved the riddle. 'Tis an Alamo, riches dancing with gloom." There is a way to get up to the roof for there's a ledge along the wall from the window and under the eaves and if we can make our way along it we'll be free. Then we can reach the roof easily enough find the sky light and go down it into the hall below."

"Ah I have never thought of that plan or we would have been free long ago," said the Mexican. "But I cannot dare risk such a trip unless we had supports to hold onto."

"Some of the girls looked at the ledge.

"Can't you think of something easier to do please?" asked Hettie of Angeline, riches.

"I'll try it myself first," she answered. "Just watch me."

"Will you dare to make that dangerous attempt?" inquired Catherine.

"I'll dare anything," said Angeline, riches. "And I don't ask you to go anywhere where I would not go myself."

"What do you mean?" asked Hettie and Angeline, riches together.

"I don't know but I'll make the attempt," she replied. She then lowered herself out of the window and was in a moment standing on the ledge below with her head a few inches above the first window sash. Violet then called out:

"Don't do it. You'll fall. And it's thirty feet to the ground."

But she paid no attention and started slowly along the edge until she reached the fire escape. Then up she went, the girls watching in breathless silence. Seeing her on the roof they all cried "BRAVADO" together and that gave her more courage.

Meanwhile the soldiers had tried desperately to force open the iron door but all their fierce efforts were unavailing and during this time the girls had already worked their way along the ledge and were now on the roof.

"Ah we are all got here safe and sound," said the Mexican. "It was a happy thought for us to make the trip, one by one, for it made me feel sure of escaping. Fine work was it not?"

"Rather risky though," replied Mildred with a shudder. Violet broke the glass of the sky light and then seeing soldiers below doggedly the falling glass shouted to them to bring a step ladder.

"We are all out," they said. "No need to break the door down now for we came up here from along the ledge."

The soldiers looking up were greatly surprised when they saw they had escaped.

"So a step ladder it will be," declared a captain chucking gleefully. "When those spies learn of this they will be scared for they expected to be a long way from here before you were out."

"That reminds me," said Violet as the ladder was being placed "that you soldiers must promise not to mention this incident to anyone," while we are in this part of the camp."

"Not even in general Hannon's?"

"O sir, you would unintentionally get us into trouble with more spies and just now we cannot afford to have any more trouble than is necessary. We will reward you as much as we can and that must satisfy you."

"All right we promise and pledge it under penalty," said the officer cheerfully. "And when we promise anything you can depend on it because we are always square on the promise."

They had now all descended to the floor below and went along with the soldiers. All the soldiers were all right they had observed one man who they felt they could not trust but as just now not knowing him they did not want to say anything.

Besides just now he could not do anything if he wanted to.

"I do not like the man who had just gazed at us," said Hettie as she watched him go into a side door hastily.

"No he looks like one who is liable to do anything," asserted Catherine. "Don't don't blame me if I also regard him with suspicion. Many of these strangers are wolves in sheep's clothing."

The others did not speak but they had uneasy misgivings that they really were being shadowed. As they reached the stairs leading to the floor below they saw a man dart from a hiding place, regard them for a moment and then disappear.

THE ADVENTURERS UNDER FIRE.

ABOUT TWO HOURS after this experience, the party of child adventurers were well on their way toward general Hannon's headquarters and had left the building they had been locked in far behind. They had traveled until about two o'clock in the afternoon always being talked to about the number of men having been poisoned by food and child scouts also, and being weary and excited over the news had topped for a short rest when Angeline, riches who had gone on ahead to do a little scouting of her own came running back to announce to them that the Big Girl Knool road was just a little way before them. They all at once hurried forward to start on this great road which was said to be so famous in the history of their country. The road was about one hundred feet across but surely it was not a straight one at all. (hire a ball) for it was stretched over a hill and dale, and the ones who may have constructed it had picked out the hardest places to go. It was evident that all its length and enormous width was paved with large bricks made probably of bright yellow sandstone and it was smooth and level at every point.

"I am wondering just now," said Mildred looking carefully up and down the big road "which way shall we go to general Hannon's headquarters at least?"

"Ask for it and it'll come over to you," suggested Jennie Turner.

"And what direction do you think general Hannon's headquarters is?" asked Violet.

"He a Hannon's headquarters is," she replied.

Violet and her sisters laughed.

"You misunderstand me," she said. "We have to go onward. I know this big road well and so do my sisters for we have made many trips over it."

"Have you ever been to the big city of Big Girl Knool?" asked Jennie Turner.

"No have you?"

"No I'm very shy by nature as you may always have noticed and have never mingled with people anywhere. I'd rather remain out here in the country when the war comes to an end."

"There is said to be a big war now there. Are you afraid of the Glandolins?"

Joice inquired.

"Well, when I'm so handy with the pistols, I should say not. I'm not afraid of anything, not even the fiends," declared the girl decidedly.

"I wish I could say the same," sighed Mildred. "But I don't think we need to be afraid when we reach general Hannon's headquarters for there his place is in the heart of the camp where spies and vandals do not dare show themselves. The general though stern is said to be very kind and does everything possible to help every one who is in trouble. But they say there are many great dangers lurking on the road outside the Christian lines and so if we go on out we must be careful, very careful."

"I hope nothing will happen to us again," said Jennie Turner in a nervous voice as she fancied by the strange movements of bushes that some one was following the party. "I don't like to be delayed you know. If anything should fade the lovely patches of my disguise it would spoil everything on us."

"You are right," admitted the two disguised Indian girls.

"I'm sure you two could not make yourselves look funnier if you tried," the Mexican said.

"One day you'll find out," said Catherine. "Do you think our disguises are all very fast and of brilliant colors Jennie?" she asked of Jennie Turner in an anxious tone.

"They seem very fast when you run," she replied and then looking ahead of her she exclaimed: "Oh what lovely colored clouds of smoke over there!"

They all gazed in the direction she indicated and indeed observed rising far above the horizon clouds of all colors. They were very beautiful to look at and the travelers hurried to the top of a high rise of ground to observe them more closely.

"Why they are not clouds of vapor at all," said Hettie. "They are just monstrous rolling billows of varied mixed smoke clouds."

Indeed that was what the clouds really were, enormous masses of great rolling bulging smoke which rose from the horizon in different and separate columns far into the sky for perhaps a thousand or more feet until above they spread together into a magnificent differently colored wreath and as thick as the long stretch of a far distant thunder cloud. The rising clouds of colored smoke ascended in a long row along the horizon and elsewhere but in scattered columns rose a dozen or more clouds of most dense black smoke which rolled upward to a greater height as no wind was blowing, but the most curious thing about the other smoke was their peculiar way of changing color. Some of the clouds were dense blue but here and there at times other colors glistened through the blue, gorgeous yellow, turning to pink, purple, orange orange, and sometimes suffused with more sober brown and grays each appearing as other clouds mingled into the one and then gradually disappearing to be just as slowly replaced by some other color of a different shade.

The changeful coloring of these clouds of smoke was very beautiful and fantastic and fascinating, but it was strangely mysterious, and bewildering as well as the novelty of the magnificent scene drew our travelers closer together in awe where they stood watching it with rapt and excited interest, wondering what was causing them and the nature of their course.

So interested were they in this strange and fascinating scene that they continued watching it until it grew dark. Suddenly there was a strange sound behind them and Joice felt something touch her. Swiftly that momenting whatever it was enveloped her in its strong embrace and drew her back out of sight.

"My good Joice is gone sister," gasped Violet in amazement and she and the rest listened carefully believing they could hear the muffled screams and protests coming from the direction she had gone. But before they could think what to do to save her from the unseen foe something was seen to dart out from a dark mass of bushes and seize hold of Jennie and then she was gone.

"Look out every one!" cried Violet drawing her pistol. "Run away from here every body. Run quick or we'll all be lost."

Jennie Turner and the others turned and saw timid Mildred running swiftly up the road and screaming at the same time. But some dark form sprang out of the shadows and seized her even as she ran and both instantly disappeared from sight. The others including the Mac Mexican had no chance to escape. More than half a dozen of the strange dark forms were coming upon them from all directions and despite their attempts to open fire the shadowy forms clutched each at one in a firm embrace. In a flash they were among the dark bushes and a quick disarm. Then in another flash (what kind of flash?) they were hastily lifted onto the backs of horses, men in seemingly black uniforms and hoods mounted the horses and off they dashed at a full gallop.

They all struggled desperately to escape crying out in rage.

"Let us go. Let us go. What right have you to kidnap us in this fashion? Let us go."

But neither struggles or protests had any effect whatever. The soldiers in dark uniforms who ever they were only held them more firmly and said nothing at all and only urged their horses on full speed. Then the girls quieted themselves and they all began to think, especially Violet. Despair fell upon her when she realized her sisters and the little party of girls with them had been captured, even as she was and evidently there was none of the Angelinian soldiers about to save them.

"I should have expected this," she sobbed miserably. "I'm abused within the very Christian lines. I'll bet it is the work of those two professional spies. If our captors take us within the army's lines something dreadful is sure to happen to us."

She could now see her capture when they were more out in the open and saw that his uniform was too dark to be that of a Gladiolusian soldier. He had what appeared to be a black bandage around his hat and he held her so firmly that she found it very difficult to squirm in his embrace or even move her arms and legs in order to change their position. The minutes passed and on they galloped. Violet wondered how long it would take for her captor to reach the foe lines at such a gallop and if the foe would destroy them for sure this time.

Though she had had many trying times with the Violet at first had believed that the Gladiolusians would not really dare to harm her or her sisters for fear of Abbieanna's dreadful vengeance upon them. But they now knew different and her greatest fear just now was that she and her sisters if not destroyed would always remain imprisoned among the Gladiolusians, and never see the joy of freedom again. No sound came to her except the galloping of the horses. All otherwise was intense stillness. Violet wondered if Mildred had stopped her screaming or if her captors prevented her from doing so.

After a while the column slowed down by a huge roaring camp fire and one of the soldiers whistled. To the surprise of the prison prisoners the swarm of soldiers who appeared wore purple uniforms. What were they? They wondered. Yes surely they must be Abbieannians or Angelinians, she decided for there were too many to be rebel soldiers in disguise. Also far off she could hear the strains of some pretty Angelinian melody played by some kind of Spanish instrument that all Angelinians have. The sounds were sweet and low and though they reached her ears very faintly they were clear, distinct and harmonious. Sometimes the sound was nearer, and appeared to be just south of the pig girl knool road. In a few moments captors, and captives had dismounted some of the soldiers around the fire quickly scrambling to their feet.

Then the prisoners saw that a strangely uniformed officer was standing before them a man wearing a uniform so curious in appearance that they stared at him with round eyes. He was a big tall man in full Spanish dress of clothing with heavy shakers shaggy eye brows, heavy long bobbed hair, but totally brown eyes that were as brave as that of a lion. On his head was a tall velvet purple hat with a jeweled band. His coat appeared to be decorated with diamond buttons. The velvet breeches had jeweled buckles at their knees and decorations all around the hightens.

On his breast hung a medallion bearing the picture of the Vivian girl. Princesses and in his hand as he stood looking intently at the fair prisoners was one was an officers cane.

"Oh," they exclaimed greatly astonished at the sight of this stranger and then Violet added, "Why are we prisoners sir?"

"Can't you understand it is my order?" replied the man with a polite bow and tons of the hat trailing at the same time. "I'm general Bularibula and you disguised girl scouts are arrested on the charge of impersonating as Emperor Vivian's daughters. You can see we captured you nice and easy."

"Then I can see that," said the girl nodding. "Was it you who ordered us to be made prisoners in this fashion?"

"One other you may be sure. But take care and don't let me hold or I shall have to use harsh measures. You'll face the Vivian girls the morning to-morrow morning for they alone are going to judge you and God help you when they do. The penalty for posing as the daughters of Emperor Vivian is death no matter what the age."

At this Violet gave a jump and her sisters realizing they were prisoners by mistake fought hard and desperately to suppress their desire to laugh, for now they wished to see the joke run through.

At the order of the general their captors led them up the road past the great camp fire and not until they were in the general's well lighted tent did the soldiers leave them alone with the officer.

"You see this is my duty to perform," he said gravely. "Impersonating the Vivian girls is considered a very grave offense by them and the Emperor especially for spying work against us, and how they will judge you I cannot say. Better pray to God asking him to touch their hearts so they'll be kinder with you and only hold you for exchange and not have you shot as felonious spies. Yet you see they are as good as they are cheating and probably if you will try to behave and answer their questions nicely they may let you off with only a light sentence seeing you were caught only at the first offense. But just the same it does not matter to me what they do—maybe a good view of them will soften your hearts so that you will repent and if their goodness does not move you nothing will. I always respect most rebel girl and boy scouts but those that impersonate the Vivian girls for spying purposes upon our camps are an exception and a treacherous lot at that. To day as I returned I saw you leave my headquarters disguised just as you are now with all my valuables in your possession and know what you were. I suspect you believed I thought you were they, for being princesses they have rights to anything anything as all is theirs on how, but you couldn't fool me. I had all parts of my lines and others watched and here you are with disguised companions. Klucky for my country I captured you all in a bunch as it were, here's the things you stole. They belong to the Vivian girls. If you wish them to be marvellous you will reveal who poisoned the regiments of men and also women, and also reveal where you put those important papers. If you will refuse to confess you will face serious punishment. They are good little girls but they are terrible to deal with if they are your enemies and I'm telling you the truth for your own good. If you were I'd have shot you down right here wheel!"

"You are very kind for your advice," said Joice. "and we thank you. Will you prove to us that we are not the daughters of Emperor Vivian?"

"Certainly. By what evidence?" asked the general.

"By giving us a chance to be investigated immediately," said Violet.

"These are our girl companions and the man with us is a Mexican," declared Hettie.

"A what?"

"A man from Meci Mexicoanna. You know he is as true as steel though we don't know his name. And here's Jennie Turner."

"Jennie Francis Turner?" asked the general.

"Yes."

"And who is the other?"

"She is Angelina Alice."

"And is the other one Gertrude Angelina?" he asked looking from one to another in a most embarrassed manner for now he felt sure he made a mistake somehow.

"Yes," said Violet. "and here is Mildred Maxwell."

"What Mildred Maxwell you say?" inquired the general.

"Yes."

"Why I can't understand this at all," said the general..... greatly perplexed. "This is a most queer situation indeed, but I'll have you given the once over by some of Penrod's boy scouts and if they say you are telling the truth then the joke is on us and the papers are gone."

"What papers are gone?" asked Juana. "The letters to Emperor Vivian." "???"

"You will know just what it is after you are identified," answered the general. The general gave an order and soon some boy scouts were ushered into the tent.

"Are those the boys you say stole the papers?" the general asked.

The boys stepped forward and gave them one good look and then suddenly stepped back and out. One of the boys then walked up to the general and pointing to the girls said:

"My dear general, you are a wonder. I must introduce you to Emperor Vivian's daughters, Jennie Turner is with them, and also are Angelina Archburg, Angeline Nichols and Mildred Maxwell. The two soldiers who are in foreign I do not know."

For a moment this did not convince the general and he ordered them to have their disguises removed which they did right willingly. The general had to be careful and every one knew it for if he was fooled the right Vivian girls could surely hold him responsible. After this was done the general saw they really were, and realizing the mistake was for a moment furrowed and alarmed but one of the boys said:

"The thieves are really captured sir." Penrod and the "Rattlesnake" saw seven boys scampering down the company street as if in a great hurry. They resembled the Vivian girls a good deal to him especially like they do when disguised but Penrod did not like their hasty and rapid flight and he was therefore ordered by Penrod to capture them and after a lively chase we succeeded. One of them however tried to jab the "Rattlesnake" with a long knife but was captured after a hard fight. Only one of them escaped beyond our reach but some of the soldiers seeing him run so fast were sure suspicious and captured him after a chase down the field. They are now facing general Hanson sir and he doubt will be brought to face violet and her sisters tomorrow."

Soon the entire party of brave girls were gathered around general Gladerlinia quite beyond themselves with surprise over this strange and almost comical adventure. General Gladerlinia stared a first at one of the girls, and then at the others and seemed greatly interested in them as well as being greatly pleased.

"Indeed, since the war started I've seen persons in the cleverest disguises," the general said, "but never in my life, have I ever seen any one in such queer disguises as two of you adventurers are wearing. Let us sit down awhile in this tent and have a good hearty talk."

"Haven't you always been in command of one of general Hanson's Vivian divisions?" asked Gertrude Angeline.

"No indeed. I used to command an army of my own, but for the country's sake I came here to make a junction with general Hanson's Vivians, and Emperor Vivian begged me to remain."

"How do you like general Hanson?" asked Jennie Turner. "They say he is very stern but isn't his army and the gallantry of his men and officers grand?"

"It's one of the finest armies in the world even if it is not made up all of fierce Abbeennians, and I'm happy every minute I'm in command here," said the general. "But tell me something about your selves and why you are in such queer disguises?"

So violet herself related the story of the map she and her sisters had made, its importance to them and how they saw the strange face at the window, and how they had their suspicions, and then of the loss of the real map and of their suspicions of the one who took it and of their fear that it got into possession of general Kormann. Then she told how they had first set out toward general Kormann's lines in their effort to cut off the spies and of the big river barring their way. "We found out however that the two spies are concealed in general Hanson's lines and we decided to shadow them and expose them at the first opportunity but we could not trace them and we found they were either shadowing us or having us shadowed instead. So we decided to take this Mexican advice and ask general Hanson to give us redress for our loss to avert the disaster that is threatening. So we brought the Mexican along."

"I see," returned the general who had listened with great alarm to the story. "I also wondered why so many soldiers are being positioned in our area since three days ago. But perhaps I can notify general Barger the great genius for I'm sure he can locate the spies and apprehend them for you."

"Try it if you like," said violet wondering exceedingly about the position rumors they have heard and why so many were dying from the effects of ground glass in the food thousands of soldiers had eaten according to excited reports.....

So general Gladerlinia sent a call by wireless for the supreme spy but received answer that general Barger was on a long distant scouting tour and would not return until morning.... General Gladerlinia then left the telegraph table and as I said;

"He's out scouting this afternoon but he will return tomorrow. If you can keep the spies shadowed until you know exactly who they really are you can notify general Hanson who will find a way to capture them. But watch the other things that the spies seized."

"One of the things," said violet was a package of letters with queer wording on the envelopes instead of names and addresses."

"We surely must notify general Barger of this for he ought to be able to find the two spies and also who the ones are who are so secretly and cleverly poisoning so many of our soldiers and boy and girl scouts," said the general. "There is a law against allowing strangers out of the lines without a permit from Emperor Vivian so I think I can get general Hanson to grill the whole case. We'll get the spies if we can."

"Thank you," replied violet while her sisters nodded. "but the thing is to capture the spies."

"For that you must leave it up to the members of the Gemini," the general declared. "I've never heard of any rebel spies escaping from them, and their leader is a general Barger a good friend of general Hanson's."

"Oh I know I have often frequently heard of him," exclaimed Gertrude Angeline. "He is certainly a most wonderful man."

"So he is indeed, and his followers are as wonderful as he himself. And I'm sure general Barger will do all in his power to help you recover your map or at least prevent it from entering the enemy's lines."

"I'd a doubt if the map can be found now," said violet. "We lost it two nights ago and cannot tell whether the professional spies were guilty of taking it or not."

"Indeed? Well then that makes it more difficult," said general Gladerlinia scratching his head in a puzzled way. "but I never give up hope under any conditions do you?"

"No indeed," said the girls together.

"So you know in which part of general Hanson's lines the two spies may be found?" the general inquired.

"I can't imagine," said violet. "they are too wise to stay long in one place."

"Then we must ask general Penligan to have them looked up. He is investigating the poison mystery already."

"General Penligan? But surely he is in general Vivian's camp."

"Most people don't I must admit," answered the general. "Understand the mysterious operation of wireless telegraph. But we have many telegraph operators who are very intelligent. General Penligan is believed to possess the best ability in all general Vivian's army."

"Better than mine?" asked Jennie Turner.

"Better than mine?" echoed Angeline Nichols. "We should all have better brains or nothing can be accomplished at all."

"Well we can't say much about the brains of everybody but we all can do a lot of clever thinking if we try," asserted the general. "If any one can cause the spies to be located it is general Penligan."

"At what section of general Vivian's lines can he be located?" inquired Gertrude Angeline.

"He has a splendid headquarters headquarters in the center of general Vivian's camp near the residence of general Vivian and he is often to be found in the most important conferences at general Vivian's headquarters."

"Then we will ask him to locate the spies if they are still in the camp," said Gertrude Angeline.

"But what are the spies like?" asked the general.

They gave him an accurate description of them, and having several pictures of the spies with them, gave them to the general.

"I don't think there isn't a speck of a chance of capturing them two spies alive," said the general.

"That is just what I thought," replied Gertrude "but our cause is at stake is if that map is not recovered, or destroyed, and therefore we will not give up until we find the spies or frustrate their purpose. If general Kormann has it I'll enter his lines and recover it if I have to shoot him dead to do it."

"I surely wish you good luck," said general Gladerlinia shaking his head doubtfully. "but I don't believe you can accomplish that without a difficult and most dangerous job. Getting a plan or a map or anything from that scandalous rascal general Kormann is like committing suicide. And he is so watchful."

"There's a tiger's nature in his officers and men too," said the Mexican.

"I don't doubt it," said the girls together.

"But you are brave enough to do anything," returned the general admiringly. "You are regular dare devils and have more dignity than you care to admit."

"I cannot bear any one who is without dignity," cried Angeline, picking kicking her old hat up to the ceiling and catching it as it fell. "Half the fools, and all the wicked and cowardly people are willing to die, and the glandelinians are neither the one or the other."

The glandelinians are all just army," explained Gertrude Angeline. General glandelinia laughed.

"They're dreadfully like floods in their way," he said. "yet I'm sure you girls are pleased with your adventures and every soldier will die on all of you. Did you say you were traveling toward general Hanson's headquarters?"

"Yes," replied the little girls. "we thought that the best place to go first because general Hanson will do anything for us, and we can always depend on him."

"If you permit I will escort you on horseback," said the general, "and show you the way. It is so dark out now."

"Thank you they all exclaimed. "I hope it won't get you too much trouble!" "Now I'd be glad to do anything for you heroines," said the general, "as everything is quiet just now and I haven't anything particularly to do, so I can do this for you. I've been a soldier since I was eighteen years old, and although general glandelinia has given me two grand medals to reward myself I still get the desire to make a junction with the main army once in a while and fight with them against the foe. I've been away from Concentinlan army for four weeks this time and now that I've come again met the seven Abbotinlan Princesses, and their best friends, I'm sure it will be like a visit to heaven to for me to accompany you to the headquarters of the great general and bring the report of your loss to him."

"Indeed that will be very kind of you," said the girls gratefully.

"I hope we do not meet with enemies in the dark," observed Mildred. "There is some danger and some chances that there are not," the general answered. "But if you are scared little girl you a better remain behind. I never fear any foes even if they are true glandelinians in disguise. They may be lurking in ambush any time they like for all of me and we'd get safely through but the same."

"There is surely some chance in that," said Violet nodding her head in approval. "Come on let's get to general Hanson as quick as possible."

With this she ran and danced up the hill and also skipping and then turned to wait them.

"It's quite a long distance from here to general Hanson's headquarters," remarked the general, "so we shall not get there to night a not until tomorrow afternoon. Therefore we shall have eaten at its nearly noon time for the evening. Then we'll take the jaunt in an easy manner, you girls riding in a night carriage so you can get some sleep. As you know I'm an old traveler and from many experiences have found out that no one ever gains anything by being in a hurry. Always take it as easy as possible." In his motto. If you find you cannot take it easy take your time or quit goin altogether."

Supper was soon over and half an hour later they were on their way, the girls riding in a covered wagon so they could obtain some sleep during the long trip. After riding some distance over or down the big girl Knool Road Mildred said she was still feeling hungry and wished to eat some bread and cheese. so offered a portion to violet and her sisters who told her they did not desire any now but wished to get a little sleep. In the meantime the general and the Mexican conversed in the low tones as they rode alongside the covered wagon.

"When I first entered the christian lines," he said, "I carried along enough evidence to bring me through anywhere during my travels from one camp to another and obtain passes to last me weeks and sometimes months. Think I'll show you something important now as long as we are riding slowly and we have a bright moonlight."

Saying this he took a package from his pocket and as he opened it out it appeared to be about the size of a printed letter page.

"That," announced the Mexican, "is a map of the enemy's lines in perfect form an invention I learned from a boy scout whose name I learned is Penrod. It contains the city of Mac-Banner where Manley has his headquarters, also the stream of Zoe Gullen gun, the big fair grounds belonging to George gain, the rebel batteries near the seven pines, besides the big rebel positions all put on this small little map so it could be conveniently carried until I could hand it over to general Hanson."

"I'm square with you," said the general excitedly. "let me see it please!" So the Mexican gave the map to the general who stopped his horse for a moment and glanced over it in a twinkling.

"It is a six course map," declared the Mexican.

"Pshaw," said the general warningly. "This shows you are a spy or trying to be one. I want to tell you something for your own good. You are a forger and if the enemy know this the rebels will leave no stone unturned in their efforts to hound you down. I appreciate this but there is no fun in doing this sort of thing. You are playing with fire and gas together."

"One should do his duty for a holy cause to sustain it no matter what he happens," replied the Mexican, "and that map is equal to thousands of a million lives for general Hanson."

"I don't care what you say. You took a very serious risk and I don't approve of it at all," grumbled the general.

"I believe you are wrong about that, quite wrong my poor Angeline's friend," said the Mexican in a voice that sounded full of pity. "think how many dangerous adventures the vivian girls have gone through and yet how and why they are still with us yet."

"Adventures is not tireless for them it's just fun," maintained the general. "I always go out on scouting tours and always observe movements of the enemy. Give me time enough and I'll prove to you how dangerous and exciting a tour is while near the enemy's lines."

"No, no you can't prove nothing to me," protested the Mexican. "I've had experiences since the war began and now."

"Maybe," answered the general, "but I guess you will feel yourself on one of your spying exploits. I may not be too sure about those spying exploits or about this map you have but I consider this spying business beyond the safety of strangers to our nation. I like to realize myself what is going on inside the enemy's lines but I'll enter first before I'll send any one of my men into the same danger when they are not professional spies."

The Mexican however was not convinced and the general shook his head reproachfully and said there were no foreigners so terribly obstinate or hard to convince as a Mexican. At this moment the pattering of footsteps was heard behind them and glancing in that direction they saw a short whiskered man the same who wished to join the company of the vivian girls standing before them. He seemed to have passed through very rough but short adventures since violet and her sisters and their girl companions lost and his hat was ruined his uniform torn and his face and hands scratched in a way that made it a poor one if he had been attacked by some kind of wild beast and just escaped with his life.

"For goodness sake," exclaimed general glandelinia startle. "then he rode up to the man and said, 'what in the name of jumping grackles has happened to you? Been through a cyclone?'"

"No sir," replied the man in a sad and depressed voice. "I've entered general gormann's insurgent lines and sneaked barely with my life. I've had enough musketry fired at me since I broke through the rebel picket lines to have killed a thousand men. And I've had enough rocks thrown at me to attack a stone quarry and furnish bricks for half a dozen houses. I'm wounded in the leg, and---and---and---"

He reeled and would have fallen but the Mexican had leaped from his horse, and therefore was on the ground to have the chance to catch him on time.

"Are you so badly wounded that you cannot walk any further?" asked the Mexican giving him a good draught of brandy.

"I've been shot twice in the left leg but I believe I am able to walk long enough to reach general Hanson. Just now I have in my possession a very peculiar map that is really superb for it's crazy quilt like coloring. I killed the general and a rebel soldier who had it in his possession. The soldier relieved it from a spy so the map must belong to you," he added more cheerfully.

"It's too bad you are wounded," remarked the general as he dismounted. "We have no objection to your riding with us but concerning the wounds they must be taken care of immediately."

"I tried to gain the confidence of the vivian girls early to day but they would not trust me because I looked like one of those spies they have a picture of so why should I give the map up to them?" demanded the wounded man in a tone of indignant protest.

The general and the Mexican looked at one another inquiringly but neither one could answer such a question. Finally the general said:

"I'd like to see that map you secured from the enemy's lines."

The wounded man sighed. "I have risked my life and lost all I possess to regain it sir," he said as the Mexican was dressing the wounds.

"I know but your accomplishing this will make the vivian girls appreciate you much more. Tell me my son how you came to know of this map being stolen from the vivian girls which you say this is, and how you secured it."

"It's a very long story sir. I secured it so quickly that it was a marvel. The glandelinians have gone wild over it though for in my excitement during my effort to escape I killed general gormann and fifteen other officers."

"And so that made the rebels wild then it is a dangerous situation you are in," said the general. "You'll have to be placed under strong protection for the glandelinians will do anything to be avenged."

"None of my armors can enter the christian lines" explained the man as the Mexican placed him carefully on his own horse, later the soldiers have driven the pursuers off. Don't you hear the firing?"

They listened carefully and surely did hear the sound of many shots far off.

"This exploit of yours will prove a precious treat to you and the vivian girls I know" said the general as they now started forward again and going a little fast to catch up with the covered wagon which left them far behind. "The recovery of the map will make Violet and her sisters happy. They will trust you now for sure." They rode on kind of swiftly until they came in sight of the covered wagon. Then the party continued on for another mile.

"Here, who comes there?" suddenly cried some one out of the darkness, and a large number of soldiers suddenly made their appearance with leveled muskets. "Give the password."

"I'm general Gladorlinia according to the vivian girls to general Hanson's headquarters" answered the general.

There was a loud laugh from the soldiers a score of whom surrounded the general and the covered wagon.

"That's the latest popular lie and a good one at that," declared one of them. "If you are general Gladorlinia then I am emperor Vivian and these are the generals of the main army with me. I want from that horse the throes of you officers and prove it. See who is in that wagon men and if they resist drag them out or give them the bayonet."

"What do you mean by such impudence?" demanded the general. "I'm general Gladorlinia. I'll let you know and the password is Abbieanna over."

"General Gladorlinia?"

"Yes. The vivian girls, and their girl friends are in that wagon. That therefore makes a popular truth I'm telling you and welcome to reach general Hanson's vivian lines or headquarters by tomorrow."

"That time will come to you all right but as prisoners" said the soldier sternly. General Gladorlinia passed here half an hour ago with a short man who said his name was general Benigan. He proved it by some papers he showed to us. He also told us to keep our eyes open for spies riding on horseback and in a covered wagon. So this is as far as you'll go until we see who is in that covered wagon. I'm something of a disguise reader myself and I don't intend to be bamboozled or hoodwinked and flabbergasted by any of you gosh darn rebel spies. I shall break the wagon to pieces Mr make believe general, and as a matter of kindness to my country take you all prisoners and scatter your kind far and fine wide. Having performed this painful duty I shall--"

At this moment there came a cry from the soldiers looking into the wagon. All of the picket men had been looking into the wagon in a moment more and saw no one in there but the vivian girl and their girl companions. At this there were excited words from all of them and after apologizing to the general they scattered moved off from the road and disappeared from view while they heard one of them said any:

"Telegraph to general Hanson at once that two spies are in our lines. Come down road half an hour ago. Go quick for God's sake. We pickets have been doubled crossed."

The general now urged his horse on again and seemed well pleased. Probably by and by some one else will save us the trouble of doing away with those two spies" said he to himself for "for it is not reasonable that such spies can remain at large within the christian lines very long. When the vivian girls try to get some rest some thing happens to disturb them. If this happens again we will not continue our journey till tomorrow. That's a cinch." During the hours before midnight the travelers found themselves in thicker parts of the encampments. Even many big campfires were still smoldering and the camps began to resemble a vast city tent city included with rows upon rows of huge barracks buildings. The Big Girl Knool road running through this part of the camp seemed to have been repaved with fresh yellow bricks and was more easy and even to ride on. Scrubby underbrush grew on either side of the way the camp was well shaded in the day time by countless big and small trees while huge rocks were fencd up on each side of the road with openings in the walls here and there. All this scenery however did not stop the general, the drivers of the covered wagon and the escort from continuing on and the general and the Mexican to keep themselves awake beguiled the journey with jokes and cheerful conversation as well as songs. Toward midnight they reached a large army canteen and near this canteen was a large sprouting crystal spring, and beside it a very large private looking tent. The general halted here and said:

"We may as well fill our canteens here for here is good water to drink. One guard said the road beyond here is more strictly guarded and we will have to answer to many challenges so let's rest up until we fill ours and the canteens of the girls."

The Mexi can agreed to this readily enough, and as the canteens were being filled the Mexican went toward the army refreshment store to buy some tea cream cones and some sandwiches. Mildred Maxwell who had remained when the party stopped was delighted by the magnificent glare of the flickering campfires, and she had a desire to dance before one of them but she did not for fear she might set fire to her clothing and be fatally burned. She therefore remained with the others and tried to get to sleep. The canteen being filled the general, and the Mexican filled their bread baskets with the sandwiches and then ate one or two themselves and also an ice cream cone. They had desired to buy some for the girls but did not like to disturb their sleep. They both sat on their horses as they ate giving a portion to the wounded man who was lying at this time in an empty part of the wagon. Mildred however was so fascinated by the numberless gleaming camp fires that she still was unable to sleep and seeing the Mexican looking in at her she begged him to sit in the wagon with her and tell her a story. At first he shook his head and she asked:

"Why won't you tell me a story? Don't you know any?"

"I'm not good at telling stories in the Angolitan tongue" was his reply. "But I can do some good singing if you don't mind. I'll awaken your friends."

"What kind of songs can you sing?" asked the general.

"A y song that you wish providing I know it. I'll prove it if you like and sing a song that I composed myself. Don't tell the vivian girls. I've got them mentioned in the song for they might want me to write a story about them. Don't tell them I'm a good singer or they will want me to be their chief entertainer which of course I would not object to at all. Haven't time or nerve to wake up the whole camp so I'll sing you this song as softly as possible and make the words as plain as I can for your own amusement."

They were glad to have heard this and they listened with interest while the Mexican chanted the following version of the song in a pleasant tone: |||||

"I've come to Abbieanna land where wonderful cities and people dwell,
And excellent fruits and flowers and shadowy bowers abound in every dell,
Where Christianity is a power and where all receive a surprise,
When amazing things take place before my very eyes."

Abbieanna's ruler has seven bewitching girls whom the nation loves to please,
Through all woes and misfortunes they always kept their sceptres to enforce all decrees;

To keep their people happy, contented and gain their love for all the bees,
Though supreme, their hearts are kind and true,
And to get the needy and distressed all brought by woes of war is what they long to do,
Rather than to all the rebels show.

And still there's Princess Jemima,
Much sweeter than any flower or even the rose,
A Fairy Sprite from Abbieanna where she makes fairies jealous I suppose,
Brave, good, and true, and love to roam,
No one can tell them to propose,
And there's the brainy little Angelina,
With a heart as pure and as true as steel,
Who by bravery and shrewdness escapes from haughty Gladorlinia's maw,
Who in time of peril utters words,
Of wisdom rare, that fills us all with awe.

I'll never forget her sister Catherine the vivian girl who is as brave as if made of tin,

Whose tender heart abhors all things that is a dreadful sin,
Nor dreads brilliant Joice Vivian whom many think her bravery is highly magnified,
And looks so beautiful to everyone, that the whole nation's filled with pride.

Daisy vivians a dear little princess who might be called a wildcat,
For she wins renown by doing dangerous stunts,
Like upon a magic gump and tit for tat,
Hettie rides a splendid steed and though she's as her other sisters be,
She does as many thrilling stunts,
To her the enemy are like the small fish in the sea.

And now I'll introduce a princess that the whole nation adores, Violet herself makes the enemy shake with fear every time she hear the cannon boom roar,
For she does the bravest thing that the hardiest soldier might,
Because she knows that her country cause with gods is considered right.

There's Gertrude Angellier who 'at like a fiery angel and to the enemy a fearful sight, she often and does her work as if mechanically when her excitement is aroused perfectly right.

And we've Janita Turner who would always love to free, but never does live the luck for Glandolina is always one more.

It's hard to name all of the horrors of war this holy land acquired;
would make my song no longer the world would soon be fired,
But give attention when I mention one wise general Hanson,
And countless fine christian armies ready to find a home in gods own Mansion.

Just rose the world over--and the song from coast to coast, Ready History upon history no other nation in creation having fiercer wars can beast.

And now my recent expedition has included those I've longed to see,
Emperor Iviana daughters and last but not least,
Children brave and as busy as a bee."

Mildred applauded the singer as loudly as she could with her hands she was so pleased with the song and the general followed suit by also clapping his hands and Joice who had been asleep was the only one who awoke and sleepily asked what all the noise was about.

"I seldom sing before a crowd of soldiers for fear they might want to go to opera for them" remarked the Mexican who was pleased to see that his effort of effort was so greatly appreciated. "My voice least of training just now robably made cultivating."

"Well no please" said the wounded soldier earnestly. "Do all the boy and girl shouts really do the same stunts as the Indian girls?"
"Every one of them. I even forgot one person. The Indian girls best boy friend Schofield Marco ended Penrod."

"For goodness sake" exclaimed the Mexican sitting up straight on the saddle and looking surprised. "See Schofield Penrod. How surprising. Is he in love with any of them?"

"No he is only a loving friend."
"That" loving friend" sounds if it amounts to much indeed. I have suspicions and no arguments either. Yet he's worthy of their love alright."

"He's a great favorite of the Emperor" said the general smiling.

The Mexican was more surprised.

"So you think any boy like him could not be a favorite favorite?" he asked.
"Can't say," replied the general yawning again. "But here's a word of good advice. that may be of service to you. Make friends with the boy and you'll be solid with Emperor Iviana and his daughters. If you do not and the Indian girls despise you look out for disaster."

"I'm solid as gold with the boy now" said the Mexican. "I'd give the world if he was my son. Would Emperor Iviana like me more if it was so?"
"Yes, you never can tell. He's a man as righteous as a saint. And now let's continue our journey. We must be there by tomorrow."

The Mexican considered the general's advice so carefully that his brains were busy long since the journey was resumed. All the girls were now fast asleep. By morning they were still on their way toward general Penrod's headquarters. The general and the Mexican were beginning to feel tired from riding on their horses all night.
Mildred who had awakened again in the morning now had a very great many things to think about and to consider besides the events of the journey though so vast a christian encampment. At general Penrod's headquarters which she would reach by noon were so many strange generals and military persons that she felt half afraid of meeting them and wondering exceedingly if they would be just as friendly and as kind as other christian officers had been to her. Above everything else she could not think of anything, but the important errand on which Violet and her sisters had come on and she felt determined to do devote every energy to help them find the thieves who had stolen the map. He also feared that unless the map was recovered Violet and her sisters would not feel happy for anything and often she wished that her friend Penrod could be with the expedition to observe observe observe all the astonishing and exit exciting things she and those with her were observing. But alas Penrod was no far away in Conventinian Aronburg's army and therefore she alone must not falter in her efforts to aid Violet and her sisters. The part of the vast encampment though which they were now passing was more thickly tented than before, with many stately trees to make the scenery as imposing as possible.

Mildred noticed from the wagon but far in the distance a line of very tall pine trees, especially because they were seen in height and had such long fine needles and each tree, there being none of these were so beautiful in shape. As the wagon stopped stopped for a moment she saw a cluster of trees apparently towering if their branches could make Christ Christmas trees for little children. Suddenly after she had been looking at those trees for a long time for at least five or six minutes and she had remained sitting in the same position she became aware of strange objects appearing and disappearing beneath those big pines.

At this moment the movement of the wagon had stopped short, the Indian girls and the others were beginning to awaken and an Indian tried to awaken or arouse them them and attract their attention to those gray objects below the trees she looking again discovered that the trees and the whole landscape beyond as well as the gray objects suddenly became obscured by a rolling wall of white clouds. For as that was there came a rattling crash or shattering roar that aroused them all and shook the wagon like an earthquake and made the general's horses rear and plunge with excitement.

Mildred uttered such a cry of astonishment that Violet and her sisters first were fully aroused. The others became wide awake too and all jumped out of the wagon and walked up to general Laderlin.

"What's wrong over there?" asked Violet pointing toward the clouds of smoke.
"What's wrong over there?" asked Violet pointing toward the clouds of smoke.
"Why it's nothing to be excited about a bit now no matter how it looks."
declared the general. "No that we have stopped we might as well look for breakfast.
We received a wounded man to our addition last night and -----and for goodness sake what's that stream of smoke in the sky. Can't you see it? Just notice how it curves and stretches!"

All of them looked upward and said together:

"Why it's nothing but a long thin cloud of smoke moving in the sky."

Just at that moment they saw the front of it suddenly bulge out into an immense billowy cloud there was a thunderous report that almost stunned them, and they found themselves suddenly on their backs in the air. The road. Violet arose first and looking at the cloud said:

"The Glandolinians surely are not having long range guns to shell our camp!"
"But I'm sure they are" said the others rising to their feet. "See all the soldiers are aroused. The camp is awakened."

"True quite true." agreed the general. "I know all about the tricks of those Glandolinians and their guns. But I have been thinking of something very important
I was going to tell you and did not realize what was going on there."

"One of those shells will hit us before we get started again," predicted Gertrude beginning to get nervous.

"No" said Violet. "those shells if any more explode won't hit us for I know a trick to beat those rebel guns. I've traveled under shell fire before and so have my sisters. Mount horses quick, and we'll all ride forward. Leave the wagon behind. It's liable to be their main target."

"What good will that do?" asked the Mexican.

"You'll find out if you obey me" answered Violet. "If you don't it's suicide."

So they all quickly mounted the horses and rode forward with all possible speed taking the horses of the wagon and the wounded man with them. In an instant they noticed a commotion by the distant trees and as they proceeded on in this way they had just left the wagon when there was an ear splitting crash and an eruption appeared where the wagon had been. At this time they had been nearly a hundred yards from the wagon, but so terrific was the force of the blast that every one was thrown from their horses by the vibration and every horse killed under them while at some portions of the camp it rained fragments of trees, showers of earth, stone and grass and clouded the air with tent fragments and other materials.

Terrific crashes also roared in the sky simultaneously. For a moment they were all stunned and soldiers came running from every tent to see if they were injured.

"How long will the enemy keep this up?" asked Gertrude as they all got up being greatly excited over the mishap. "Until we can get out of their range!"
replied Violet as soldiers took care of the wounded man. A few moments later they were altogether many of the soldiers stepping forward anxious to know if they were hurt but Violet called to an officer to notify one of the artillery generals to silence the hidden Glandolinian battery as and as he rode off to obey the order they learned from the other soldiers that the lost map had been found.

"Our task we started on is well over then," Violet observed. "That map is a little too risky and the only way to prevent it from getting into the hands of the enemy is to deliver it to general Hanson at once for safe keeping. One of you send the finder to me and have another man send the map to Hanson. And if any one tries to take it from him tell him to destroy it."

The soldier selected ran off to do her bidding. With recovered courage and energy they now left the crowds of excited soldiers and trudged forward on foot and after a few minutes tramp to a part of the camp and to a place where the Big girl Knool road cut through a wall of army barracks leaving high wooden buildings on either side of it.

As they were travelling through this wide avenue when the general noticed the Mexican with one arm and signalled a caroling to the others to halt and shouted "STOP".

"What's the trouble now?" they now all asked.
"See there, beyond that barracks building!" pointed the general pointing with his fingers. Direct in the center of the road stood a number of motionless soldiers who were heavily armed. They were tall men and strong looking and the guns they shouldered with two foot bayonets attached, looked very imposing indeed.

"Well what of it?" asked Jennie Warner.
"Those are professional road guards or military Police and I'm afraid we will have lots of arguments with them before they'll let us pass" was the reply.

"Military Police? What are Military Police?" asked Mildred Maxwell.
"I say they are guards of a special kind that have duties like a city policeman but here in this army they are considered national army and road sentries. They are different from ordinary guards because they have stricter guards duties to perform than common sentries do. That's what makes them so dangerous to spies. No spies can sneak past them. When we get near enough and they don't know you they'll fire shots into the air to arouse all the soldiers if we don't answer to their challenge correctly and promptly."

"Then we'll be foolish to try to pass them," said Angeline Riches.
"I'm afraid not or I'm not afraid," said Gertrude. "Those guards may know us I'm sure and if we answer the challenge correctly will let us pass."

"There is no use in being afraid of those guards at all," declared Violet.
At this moment far in the distance there came an awful and strange growling sound that was exceedingly frightful and if they were not as brave as their actions showed, they surely would have been scared stiff.

"Oh goodness what was that awful growling sound that we just heard?" asked Mildred.

"That was the most foreboding sound I have ever heard!" asserted the general with evident alarm. Just as he spoke there was an earthshaking crash that could have probably swamped the loudest thunder roll. So loud was the noise and so severe the concussion caused by it that they almost thought the world had cracked into eight pieces and was flying into space or hied upon and against the other planets, and hearing also the rattling sound of falling objects they all scattered and ran as fast and as far as they thought it was safe to go. After it all appeared to be over the Mexican said:

"Since the excitement is over we can now go back."
"In this case," said Violet, "you are now able to do us all a great favor. Please follow us on some different route. We are especially under fire."

"But you forget," returned the Mexican, "those tremendous shells may get us anywhere and if one of those things hit us we might be blown out of existence."
"Then the Abbeonabun nation might expire," said Angeline Riches.

"True, but just now we must take that risk," decided Violet and her sisters bravely. "Being warned and aware of what is to occur we must try to bear the terrific noise of the high explosives but if we still did not expect it it would scare us all into fits."

Yet all the others were seen to hesitate. They knew the enemy was purposely firing at them and not at the camp.

"I'm fond of you all and hate to lead you into an unseen trap and shock you to death," said the Mexican.

"Never mind," said the girl.

"We may all be killed."

"If so God will take us to His Home," said Gertrude.

"Very well then," said the Mexican in a determined voice as they all began to advance a few steps forward with loudly beating hearts toward the group of guards. Pausing to look back the Mexican said:

"All ready to make a swift dash?"

"All ready," they answered.

"Then lay low and brace yourselves firmly as you run. Now then let's go."

As they came forward, the guards rushed toward them excitedly calling to them to halt. Of course they had to halt as long as bayonets were presented in their direct directions. Violet then said:

"Go ahead and challenge us."

"Why we did challenge you," returned one of the men who seemed much surprised at the appearance of the clothing of two of the civilian girls.

"Why we did challenge you," returned one of them men who seemed much surprised at the appearance of the clothing of two of the civilian girls.

"Well we are superior civilian daughters. Let us pass pass quick," they cried.

"What, and you two of you in that disguise?" They demanded. "Well all right since you gave the proper pass word put--"

Again came that awful growling noise in the distance and which was repeated, being the worse noise that was ever heard on land or sea in caverns or sky and then came a stunning ear splitting crash high above them but they did not even wince.

"I wonder you stood the shock so well," said one of the guards. "Didn't you feel the ground tremble even though the crash was overhead. Any one else would have been quite dread with fright."

Violet and her sisters laughed merrily.

"Poor guard," said they. "Those shells wouldn't scare a fly, let alone us." For a moment the guards seemed to feel humiliated and looked surprised at this very remark. One of them hung his head for a moment as if in shame or sorrow but then he said in renewed confidence--

"Anyhow those shells at night when exploding, can flash fire like sheet lightning and just as bright good enough to blind a person."

"It is true at that," declared the Mexican. "I've often observed their flash flashes myself," but their ferocious crashes stunning as they seem are not as loud as the tick of a needle compared to the shattering roar of some of the big explosions I've heard."

"Perhaps," said the guard lamely. "I have been mistaken about the noise of some shells. I've heard some big explosions myself and seen the havoc and horror they wrought and it had sounded and looked very fearful to me but that may be because I had been too close to it and observed too much horror and misery and destruction that was good for mine eyes."

"Never mind," said the girls soothingly. "It is a great talent to be able to stand the noise and shocks of great explosions. Very few can do that."

As they stood hesitating for a few moments there was another crash close by and suddenly a big cloud of earth and earth rocks showered over them almost burying them under it was so heavy. They realized in an instant that one of the shells had exploded too near for their safety but fortunately the walls of the nearest barracks shielded them from the shells fragments though they were struck upon all parts of their bodies by the showers of flying and falling stones. The Mexican was hurled flat upon his face by the concussion, but one stone struck him in the left leg with such force as to inflict a severe flesh wound. As for the others the stones rattled upon and about them without even making a scratch and not even one of the guards were hurt at all. When the shock of the explosion was over they all ran to the Mexican who was moaning and groaning, and Violet promptly pulled the piece of a stone out of his left leg. Then at the same moment one of the guards saw a man running down the road as if in a hurry and two of them ran after him and caught him bringing him back a prisoner. The man had a uniform on as smooth as silk except for the holes where the button buttons should be for he concealed by his motions to be a Glandelinian in disguise.

"Let me go," he shouted angrily. "How dare you make me a prisoner without questioning who I am?"

"We are liable to do worse than that old boy," replied one of the guards. "You had started off mighty fast when you saw us and now as you have acted so suspicious we'll have to investigate you. You spies have annoyed us guards long enough and if you are one we will rapidly put an end to you right away."

"You can't find proofs on my person that will tell you I am a spy," returned the man. "You will not find evidence on me to face me before a firing squad and if you search me you will find that out perfectly well." They however searched him thoroughly and finding nothing on him said in a tone of disappointment:

"I suppose that you have spoken the truth. Seemed to me I've often been told that Glandelinian spies seldom carry evidence about them that would condemn them as spies. But if I am compelled to let you free what will you do?"

"Return to my own place again," said the man in a sulky voice.

"And then go spying about the camp some more. How do I know you ain't a spy. Mine for my part that won't do. You must make a vow to go home and stop roaming about our camp."

"I won't promise any anything of the sort."

"And why not pray?"

"Because I'm a soldier in uniform and when I'm off duty for a few hours it is my natural desire to roam around the camp and I have a right to do anything I intend to do. It is not fair for you christian d--- Angelinians to blame me. If it were wrong for me to roam around the camps then I'd better ask for my discharge from the army. The proper thing for you to do is to let a harmless unoffending soldiers alone."

"Why there's some sense in that argument," admitted the guard thoughtfully. "But how come you almost said we are christian dogs. We stop and investigate all strangers and you are in a strange uniform whether you are a rebel or not and therefore we don't know who you are and we got to investigate all strange persons coming our way. It is the or der."

"Tell you what," said Violet who was trying to comb the gravel from her hair. "Let's summon some soldiers to take him to some tent to guard him. Then if the man can prove he is not of a suspicious character he can go again."

"Ah that's a clever idea. You Max, must signal the soldiers while we hold the man a prisoner for if he let him go now he may be able to cause us a whole lot of trouble. indeed."

So the Mexican went to signal the soldiers and in a few minutes they came and ordered the man to come along with them.

"This is the meanest meanest trick I ever had played on me" muttered the prisoner gloomily as he was led away. "How would you like it if the soldiers would place you under arrest?"

"If we were not suspicious and unreasonably worried about a camp when not trusted you would be welcome to make us or sons prisoners." was the reply.

Then being permitted to pass the special guards they walked on, and the prisoner was led away by the soldiers, silent and very disconsolate. The Mexican limped badly as he walked for his wound caused by the rock fragment still pained him and the rest were quite annoyed because the debris was in their hair and also on their clothing. When they came to a long bench by the roadside they all sat down to rest and then they opened their knapsacks and took out their last provisions, while Violet took out her red cross outfit which she and her sisters always carry with them.

"We don't seem very lucky on this adventure" she said "or we would never have been under fire or met these suspicious men. I will see if I have anything that will cure your wounded knee."

Soon she discovered that one of the medicine jars was labelled "For bad flesh wounds, relieved from rocks, shell fire, cuts and the like."

It was a salve made from some mineral and dried medicine root but she rubbed the salve upon the wound made by the rock fragment and in a few minutes had it bandaged neatly and the Mexican leg felt much better than before.

"Help me Mildred get all the dirt out of my hair" suggested Gertrude Angeline. Mildred tried it with a very fine comb but without much effect.

"But we need now is a good bath" said Violet. "But do not worry my dears a little dirt and gravel does not look badly at all."

"But it makes me feel uncomfortable and I don't want the general to think we tried to bury ourselves in the earth or that we are stuck up with dirt" said Jennie Turner.

"You certainly were stuck up with dirt until we pulled ourselves out of the debris" observed Angeline Pichoo with a laugh.

"We all were" said Jennie Turner. So they went on again and coming presently to an army bath house they all went in at separate places and gave themselves and all their clothing a good cleaning.

After they were all cleaned up they started out again and from here on the encampment improved and the many tents began to give way to barracks entirely.

The camp was soon to extend on and up the small hills with barracks studded valleys between them and on reaching the edge of one of these hills the travelers found before them a high wall of stone breastworks running to the right and left as far as their eyes could see it. Immediately in front of them where the wall of rocks crossed the road way stood a big cannon wheels having beside it a big gun cussion and a large pile of shells before and beside it. They found in coming nearer that this gun was placed to guard the roadway.

"Well" said Angeline Pichoo "I guess we will have to stop here."

A DS DASTARDLY ATTEMPT TO POISON THE VIVIAN

GIRLS.

THE SPY STORY.
THE DASTARDLY ASSAULT UPON VIOLET AND HER SISTERS, AND THE RESULTS OF IT, AS WELL AS THE QUESTIONING OF TWO SPIES WHO WILL NOT CONFESS UNDER ANY CONDITIONS..

"I'll say it is a good guess" replied Gertrude Angeline "Our way is barred by this great wall of breastworks and gun. It looks as if a thousand rebel armies could not pass over these works in a thousand years."

"Looks are deceiving" declared general Laderlinia laughing at their disappointed faces "this barrier is just placed here to make the camp appear impassable."

"It prevents the enemy from going any further if they tried to capture the camp anyhow." said Violet "but why is it not fortified as it should be. It should be guarded by a great number of cannons."

"True" replied general going a little nearer to peak over the top by climbing high. "What shall we do general? Shall we climb over it if we go around it we will have to walk clear out of our way and won't be able to reach general Hanson's lines and headquarters on time."

"All very true" answered the general quickly "but I know these works having passed over and even through them many times before."

"How they allagorily inquired."

"I'll show you how" said the general. He stood Gertrude, and Angeline Pichoo in the middle of the roadway and placed Mildred just behind them with her hands on Pichoo's shoulders. After Mildred came the Vivian girls who did like wise.

"No" said the general "you must all shut your eyes tightly and keep them shut until I tell you to open them. There is a chance of the rocks does not want any one to see how they get through."

"It's difficult to keep our eyes shut that long" objected the little girls "or better blind fold us all. That would be better." So they tied their handkerchiefs over their eyes so that they could not see anything.

"But game is this blind man bluff" laughed Mildred Maxwell.

"Keep quiet" com commanded Violet sternly. "All ready! Then follow the general."

General Laderlinia took the Mexicans hand and led him forward over the road toward the breastworks. A holding fast to one another they all followed in a long row expecting very much to climb up the breastworks. The general also had his eyes closed but to their surprise and wonder they were marching straight ahead instead of climbing and after they had taken more than two hundred steps by actual count he stopped and said:

"No you may all remove your handkerchiefs."

They did so and to their astonishment found the wall of breastworks far behind of them while in front the interior portion of the camp had given way to tents with pretty little barracks scattered among them.

"That wall" explained the general "has many secret openings in unknown portions so we passed through it as if it was an optical illusion. Of course the works are quite real but as we went blind folded we did not see the secret opening in the barrier at all which we went through though if you look at it it does not seem to exist at all. It's the same way with the other breastworks, they have secret openings which does not seem to exist and yet it is truly there. You will notice that the wall separates this part of the camp from the main section that divides general Hanson's Vivian army from his brothers and whose headquarters lies exactly in the center of this vast encampment. There are three branches of this Big Girl Knoll road leading through different sections of the Californian country but the one we follow is the main path. Violet and her sisters came traveled on one of the other roads and met with a great many serious perils. But for a time I believe all our troubles are over at least for the present as another hours journey will bring us to general Hanson's headquarters."

Indeed they were all delighted to know this and proceeded on their way with better courage. In a few moments more they stopped at an army drug store or dry goods store where the quarter master sergeant was very hospitable and not only supplied the girls with the uniforms they asked for but invited them to dinner in his big tent. All the soldiers at this part of the camp regarded the crazy quilt disguises of the two Vivian girls with great curiosity.

but no great amazement was experienced for they were greatly accustomed to seeing the vivian girls and in even their followers dressed in the most extraordinary disguises. A red cross nurse who sat with the quarter master sergeant got her needle and thread and sewed up the rips and holes in one of the disguises after which the officer assured the girls that they were as beautiful as ever.

"You two who wear those clever disguises out to have a hat to match the ones of every quilt dressmaker" remarked the quarter master sergeant. "I have some patches and also some cloth put away and if you will remain at general Hanson's headquarters for two or three days I'll make two lovely hats that will match the disguises you wear."

"It's a kind offer but we cannot stop here so long" said Violet but if you wish to make these general Hanson will reward them for us. I can't see that the colors of the disguises have faded very much as yet despite the shower of debris we received, on you sir!"

"Not much" replied the quarter master sergeant. "Yet you little heroines are still very dazzling and gorgeous in spite of all your exciting experiences. Most of the officers in command here want you to remain for a while and be entertained and you will be offered good amusement if you will remain long enough." But Violet and her sisters being too much interested in the desire to save general Hanson of the two spies a refusal politely to stop.

"We are being shadowed by two professional spies who are quite rough playmates for us" Violet remarked to the officers. "And although it will be a great sacrifice to refuse your offer I fear the two professionals would be sneaking the whole christian army and causing cause our cause to be smothered to pieces before our general generals were rescued."

After they had rested themselves and dined with the sergeant they came within Hanson's headquarters and after telling him of their experience discovered that a most astonishing thing had occurred and that indeed this made it evident to them that they had had a very narrow escape.

Probably the most exciting tale of any disaster and most adequately that could have ever been discovered or ever been carried out in any war or crime wave.

Had been known in no time to many christian generals only a few days and during the very time that Violet and her sisters had been heading for general Hanson's lines. Hanson had learned of it two days after the incident had really happened and which was indeed indeed without any parallel in the histories of the world itself, or the worlds histories of alluring and wickedness.

Unfalteringly with not the slightest trace of remorse or feeling this had been done by the accomplices of the two professional spies in an effort to get the vivian girls out of their way. It had been thus in this style the spies knowing where the vivian girls would go during their travels to general Hanson's headquarters had while working in a large mess hall where they were coming to have their meals secretly and most carefully mixed around poison in the food for a whole division of soldiers in the hope that also the vivian girls might eat this and die. It was found out also how they had also tried to kill by means of poison a large number of the boy and girl scouts by secretly and without the slightest detection putting rat paste and other poison into their food and other things they were preparing to eat. And with equal audaciousness and composure they also had secured bottles of sulphuric acid and had endeavored to kill every one of the generals at a military banquet hoping that Violet and her sisters also would be there and receive the same share.

"Yes those spies and their many helpers are exceedingly dangerous for they succeeded in killing many" said one officer who was investigating the case and trying to have the vivian girls located to warn them to eat no where but where they can make up their own rations. "And they poisoned many more just because they want to destroy the vivian girls to get them out of the way."

It seemed very incredible to the main general who listened to all that was said about it.

"It surely cannot be true" they said. "surely it cannot be true. The spies would not be able to do that."

Yet from one division the bodies of many soldiers had already been buried. They indeed suffered greatly before they died, and the army doctors at first thought that maybe the soldiers died of enterogastrosis an intestinal disorder--just the kind of a diagnosis that any doctor would make. The investigators also found that on the records of the base hospital the names of hundreds of boy and girl scouts dead from what was thought of as cancer of the stomach, and other soldiers just in places where Violet and her sisters had been expected to eat when they reached the mess hall were recovering from some strange and peculiar illness. Violet and her sisters who escaped because they did not eat there were fortunate and many soldiers led the investigation over and over again, cross examining every strange person minutely and having the left over food examined, but not once could they find clues left by the ones who did it.

The discovery of all this came by mere chance. On the first time it happened Violet and her sisters had gone to eat their dinner as recorded before with general Kindermann and many others at the place known as the Beldon headquarters. While they were just about to begin one of the girl scouts rushing into the house crying with terror and in her fear forgetting to salute the general or the vivian girls who had just been leaving and went out without hearing of the incident.

"General" she sobbed when the vivian girls were gone "all the soldiers are dying of a funny sickness. It came from the food you also are eating."

The astonished and alarmed general and his officers went to the scene and finding out it was true questioned the child scout.

"Are you really very sure the food caused it all?" she was asked.

"Why yes" the child replied.

"But why?" exclaimed general Kindermann.

"I saw one of them do it with the purpose to try and poison the vivian girls. I saw some of the Kitchen Police putting poison in the coffee and on the food, and when I warned the officers about it they laughed at me and would not believe it. It was the astonishing reply. Then the little girl went right on and told the general what she had seen the very Kitchen police doing and the general remembering a burned rag taste of the coffee and an unpleasantness of the other foods and in fact that every one also was complaining of severe stomach trouble sent soldiers to arrest the offenders but they were gone. The mess hall kitchen was empty. No one could be found and when the roll call of the proper division of soldiers was called no one was found missing."

"It was this forenoon" the girl scout told them "that the men put the poison in the food."

Every attempt was made to capture the murderers but without avail. It was another half day later when another attempt was made elsewhere by either the efforts of the same captives or their helpers. Again said the rescuers who over they were took a large number of glass jars out of the Kitchen of the Mess Hall in general Kindermann's camp and in a place where they were not seen broke the glass into rattling pieces. This they gathered up in cloth bags and brought it back into the kitchen. The glass was then put into the food which the soldiers were to eat and where the vivian girls were expected to eat. What chance saved the vivian girls this time was that they changed their ideas about eating here and ate in the general's tent.

While the rescuers were eating the rescuers cleared up all such as was not to be discovered. The soldiers in that division about ten thousand of them got sick two hours after and all of them on the same day and hour. It was astonishing to the army doctors who thought the soldiers must all have been seized with typhoid fever at the same time. None of them however could be saved. They all died. Simultaneously to this the large number of boy and girl scouts in another column of child scouts were also poisoned. The doctors did not like this. They became terribly suspicious. An investigation was made and in the food for the scouts and rat paste and other poison was found. One of the scouts who escaped said she saw a man acting very suspiciously and she told of the events of how they were poisoned.

"I got up at night in the middle of it to get some water at the time when all the soldiers were sleeping" she said. "I saw a light somewhere in the Kitchen of the Mess Hall and going to a window saw a man with some bottles working on something. He was using a spoon and putting the stuff into a can and some in the coffee tank. I did not drink any of the coffee this morning because I knew the man had put the stuff in it and I warned all of my companions and tried to force them to listen to reason but they would not believe me. They all got so sick I thought they would all die."

"And when they were sick and in terrible pain how did you feel?" she was asked.

"Just like I would have if I had drunk the coffee." "I called for help and soon the doctors came. All the boys and girls were always good to me and I am so sorry and angry that so many of them died. A number of them were so pretty. I'm glad and thank God with all my heart that the vivian girls missed it though. It would be terrible if they died. The boys and girls got very sick all of a sudden, every one who drank the coffee but all of them did not die."

The girl scouts voice was eloquent in her disappointment that the culprits were not apprehended. She had lost some very dear friends when so many died.

One night one of the girl scouts belonging to the companies lead by the vivian girls made a discovery that surprised her. That same night she had gone to bed rather early but she could not sleep as a very loud and noisy thunderstorm was going on. So she lay awake picturing over and over again the thrilling pleasure of seeing the down downfall of the wicked glandelinian armies. At last when the storm was raging at its worst the girl feeling thirsty tiptoed down stairs in her little night gown and was about to take a glass of water when she noticed a light shining through the cracks of another door. Opening it carefully she saw a uniformed man standing over a table with a bottle of acid and pouring the dope into some pan. With a picture that little clear-eyed beautiful innocent faced child watching, standing there by the table with the flickering light of a candle playing upon him and the ugly finger of death pointing his white, she suspected the truth at once. The man was poisoning the food intended for her and her girl and boy scouts for he was putting the acid on some of her own back-chaps that were in a frying pan in on the table to be ready for frying the next morning for breakfast. Her comrades were all in bed when she saw them do this and the rebels fortunately did not see her or he would have shot her dead and her efforts to save her companions would not have been accomplished. She also saw him put some of the acid in the coffee and some on the oatmeal. It was evident that the rebel wanted to kill her and her many comrades by this act of treachery. She did not like the looks of the man even though he had a prettily decorated Argall bay uniform on. She decided it was much safer for herself and every one else not to disturb him but that she would not eat any of the oatmeal or any of the breakfast at all, and not let the rest eat any either. In the morning her commander asked at the table at first almost refused to believe his truthfulness. Yet they knew that scores of thousands the last three or four days soldiers and child scouts had been ill or died and their sickness had been a puzzle to many doctors. The physicians in attendance had called a consultation but at that time they had been unable to make anything of it. The poor victims who lived through it or died, had been in great agony for several days or hours. Yet even officers and privates knew that soldiers in their own uniforms used to act very suspicious and even officers sought the looking over different kind of bottles.

But at that time that was all. No one then had been poisoned. They thought that the first poisoning of the soldiers came when the Vivian girls arrived in Kindomina army while looking for the trace of their stolen map. This happened a hour after they arrived according to the investigators. The victims this time had been the girl scouts only. Four of them were suddenly seized with violent stomach pains and strong spasms. The doctors noticed they appeared burned about the eyes and believing they might have taken smoked opium by mistake the surgeons gave them the usual antidotes. They were delirious for two days and many of them died. The doctors who treated them were at that time unable to diagnose their ailments. They were all particularly puzzled by why the strange sickness held on and also suspicious. Later when a full investigation was made it was all explained. By examining the organs of the dead girls the doctors discovered acid in their stomachs. About this time a whole division of soldiers were taken ill. Every soldier usually have their private ailments and they thought it was just a coincidence that they were all sick at once.

Between that time and since the discovery different columns of soldiers were ill quite a number of times but no one really became suspicious until a day after when that little girl of Violet's command made her startling discovery. The others desired to know what the fluid was that had been put into their breakfast food.

An investigation proved it was sulphuric acid and so poisonous they would all have died if they had not discovered it on the proper time. The best of doctors who were alienists and psychologists had often examined the childrens and declared that while scouts they have the mentality of people of the age of twenty one and that should usually make them too shrewd to be tricked or misled in any way. Few children also were found who had the peculiar good tendencies of the Vivian girls and a surgeon declared it to be true. In fact ferocity and cruelty is a well known trait of the wicked glandelinians and there was no doubt that the wicked rebel spies made plans to poison the Vivian girls and that the attempted killings by the whole sale were carefully planned.

"The Christian lines should be more strictly guarded and every stranger thoroughly investigated." Said one of the doctors. "Even what security have the Vivian girls at large, or those who give them so much love and respect that the worse cruelty of these foe vandals will not sooner or later break out again and with greater force for being so long oppressed. And all over that confounded map that was stolen from them. And throughout it all Violet and her sisters appear apparently calm and composed, and despite all the supporting evidence I do not believe the murdering spies will be ever captured, not even discovered. But even if they are they won't allow themselves to be captured alive."

After all this excitement had passed and they had given the stories of their own experiences and of who recovered the map they asked Hanson to cause the capture of the poisoners if possible. As Hanson was writing an order to have the whole country scoured for the rascals the man who had the map in his possession came in and being begged by the Vivian girls this is the story he told them:

"General Dargers was the only great spy man I ever knew to be in existence. All points of the Christian lines was his hiding places of activities. Everywhere he had organized gangs of dangerous spies and those whenever the opportunity occurred systematically robbed rebel officers of plans important papers and things of value value and with or everything thus gained helped our armies to many of the successes already gained.

By him I was thought how to spy. Then one day general Dargers scouting for men saved many child slaves from destruction from rebel murders. I was just in the army for five months when I learned and realized what danger it meant to go out spying and scouting. Yet I wanted to go at it straight despite the peril. General Dargers did everything in the world to help me accomplish it. I had a tablet for drawing great maps, making plans and detecting different and very difficult codes and he sent me to a y school in Germanian Aroumburgs Mobilization camp at garth gate. I came back from there two months ago and just in time to hear of the loss of the map owned by the Vivian girls. I came home into Germanian camp later in the morning and learned from general Aron one of Dargers men that general Dargers had also sent many scouts to locate the map. I did not know at first what map it was. Yet I realized when I heard that the loss of it would surely break their hearts. I made up my mind to enter the rebel lines, trace one of the spies who had the map and capture it if possible if I had to shoot up the whole camp to do so. But I tried to interview them to be their companion and learn details but as I have a sort of resemblance to that well-known spy they did not trust me and sent me away. I made up my mind to prove my character under any conditions. In less than an hour after I tried to gain their confidence in me and I had left them in vain I was moving among the troops in general Kornmanns army searching first for that great general.

If I had not been so cleverly diagnosed as that well spy I never would have got past the rebel guards as it was I had a most narrow escape. Before leaving the Christian lines he I had put on my disguise and hoped that fate would be with me. All I could have worn for disguise was any other kind of uniform even a monk. But as an exact impersonation of that spy I could enter the rebel lines as I pleased, and so I did what I believed best.

Taking a boat from the Christian side I rowed cautiously across the river and being admitted into the rebel lines found many officers were drinking back and forth or entering big tents and houses. At general Kornmanns headquarters one of the guards who may have been an old-a-camp was taking the password from those who entered the building. But I had forgotten to obtain the password. Now in the world was I to get in front of me I saw a party of ten officers and one of them was a general dressed almost in identically as general Kornmann was. Luck would have it that he should linger for a moment and therefore I had the chance to slip into his place.

"Come on you slow poke" said some one who had come with him and taking my army arm he pulled me past the guard.

I saw general Kornmann Delight at the arch leading to the great reception room of the generals, greeting all his fellow officers and therefore I managed to slip away from my new found companion and hurried down a hallway. I dropped my cloak behind a pedestal and got into the generals reception room through a side door. The place was fairly filled with officers of all rank. I hoped general Dargers would also be among the officers so I wasted no time watching them but scanned about the outer edge of the great room carelessly as if I quite had belonged there.

I passed out into the alcove where many plans were being looked over in secret, but still there was no sign of the two spies I hoped to see for I knew them by sight.

One of Dargers Genial had said they were wearing the uniforms of officers of Mantley's rank and I had not yet seen any one with such uniforms.

Just as I had begun to wonder if the spies had not come into the rebel lines or had failed to get in I caught sight of a man in a uniform of one of Mantley's officers. But when I got to the soldier I knew he was not that spy for I could tell him by his face. The officers had sat down and I had mingled with them.

If those two spies had probably gained admittance they were no doubt interviewing the general and if possible I wanted to find out where he was and if he would receive the map in person. I knew from the reports that the famous map had many colors in it and its display would be just the thing to bring me on the clue.

But it seemed the crowd of officers was having too much work of their own to do to think about such a map and my eavesdropping gained me nothing. My nerves were already on edge and I was beginning to fear that my dangerous mission would fail. Had some one else stolen the map or had they failed to bring it here? I had they been caught in the attempt to leave the Christian lines. Did failure already stare me in the face already. I had not yet been able to find general Kornmann either.

And then just as hope was waning I caught sight of general Dargers. There was no mistaking his disguise, I would know him anywhere. And besides I would have known his standing posture and the manner of his walk anywhere. He was just turning off into a side room when I came up and touched him on the sleeve. He turned like a flash. One hand was hidden under the gray cloak like uniform he wore and I glimpsed he carried a dangerous weapon. A glance showed me there were no glandelinians at all near us at the moment.

"It's Callen Turner" I whispered.

Under his gray hooded mask I saw general Dargers face fall. At the same moment he replaced his gun. He then caught me by the arm and pulled me into a small room.

"What in the world is wrong Gallant?" and why are you here in general Kornmann's headquarters?" he asked of me his voice full of emotion.

"I came to get the map the givian girls reported stolen from them." I answered respectfully. "One of your men told me everything."

"Frank Austria told you?"

"Don't fear about him," I interrupted. "He's loyal to us all I saw the incident when it happened."

"But you don't understand Gallant," he said quietly. "This is to be a most dangerous job for you. In general Kornmann's headquarters. You had no right to enter here without general Kornmann's permission. It's dangerous to spy here. Better take my advice and get out before you are discovered."

It was the same old story. All his life general Darger had been doing that. I knew he himself never failed in anything he undertook. And he had been more than a father to me. Perhaps I had been wrong in forgetting to ask permission to enter the rebel lines. And yet I never had been asked by any general to join the ranks of spies from that day when I first entered, and yet I did. And now Violet and her sisters had suffered a serious loss, which was probably a serious menace to the nation. So that changed everything. I would go through with this duty under any circumstances, put other people and officers as easily were beginning to come into the room where we stood. If a single chance word had been overheard it would have gone very hard for both of us. I turned along to him.

"General Darger," I whispered. "You can't ask me to do this thing, back out after I go through all this to get here. Violet and her sisters must have their map. If they know it would be gone for good and some disaster to the armies would happen through it. Now it would surely break their hearts."

"This is the last time though Gallant, when you may be careful and only go when you are directed. I've thought of the poor givian girls. They shall have it back if possible."

I could see his mind was made up to help me and therefore I decided to play my last card.

"General Darger, you thought me to spy. When I asked you for a chance to learn everything straight forward you did so and did everything in the world for me. Now we must pretend to be enemies here so that we will avoid all suspicions. I'm going to get that map before general Kornmann gets possession of it."

"B--S--S. Not so loud," he whispered suddenly. I turned to see who was coming and observed a number of handsomely dressed officers. When I turned back again general Darger had gone. He had disappeared as completely as though the walls of the room had swallowed him up. Something else had happened out in the rebel general's main reception room and I hurried there hoping to catch sight of the two men or at least the one who had the map. The only consolation I got however was that that the two spies or the one with it had not yet appeared, and that if they did just now there were so many officers and soldiers about that I had no chance to prevent them from getting into the room with the general and also of preventing him from recovering the map despite my resolve to free frustrate them. And therefore I decided to wait now until after another hour when all was clear before making the bold attempt.

I looked then for general Kornmann. If I had found him I believed I would have at least seen him at the spot. That might have been one way to save the day, but I could not even find him either. Neither did I know as yet what he would look like.

From the conversation in the general's reception room among officers of considerably high rank I learned they were waiting for the coming of one of those professional spies whose approach had just been announced by the general's aide-de-camp, and therefore I was already on the alert.

At last that spy was coming. Instead of being the small man as I had expected it to be he turned out to be a special half funny looking man that put me in mind of a funny fellow known in the jail. News comics called Augustus Mutt. I firmly believed it was he at first. He wore practically no disguise at all and was dressed in the uniform of one of general Manley's special high officers. It was also about what I had expected at a function that general Kornmann had a hand in this. As I looked the two over from my hiding place with the eyes of an artist I could see that not one of the other officers possessed the crafty features of the spy or general Kornmann.

I also noticed that the general had some heavy cloth clothes or hangings drawn over something on the side of the wall and therefore girls I felt sure that the stolen map would be placed there for safe keeping. Probably to hide his own intention from even his own generals for whom he could not be sure whether a christ in a was among them in disguise or not he made an announcement that he had recently purchased an addition to his gallery of engravings. Probably under difficult conditions I might have thrilled at such an announcement, but from his ways and the way he spoke and noted I began already to hate general Kornmann bitterly and I felt desperate resentment at his whole manner and speech. But yet what could I expect of him if he discovered me as a spy?

"One of general Manley's special spies just secured something from the emperor's givian daughters and but I cannot show it to any of you officers now." I overheard the general say. One officer however had the map in his possession and it was shown to all of the general's officers. I was indeed surprised at the chorus of "Oh's and Ah's" and "How strangely made" that went up from the officers as they gazed on what seemed to them to be a peculiar map. But the sight of that map in their possession made my blood hot. But it really was the map itself in the possession of that peculiar looking man with the wicked general looking on plottingly from the front of the assembled generals and other officers.

"How awfully it is made," gulped some officer who was standing beside me. "Oh boy!" said a smaller general officer near me to another. "You never saw much artistic work among our artist and plan drawers."

So the property of the givian girls was being critized before a crowd of wicked devils in gray uniforms. I thought of myself and would have struck the man nearest me but I took care. I had a more even a more serious task ahead of me and therefore wanted to keep my own emotions in check for my own safety at least.

And then after some time had been given for all of the officers and others to see and in their way about and about, I noticed the general give a signal. The man in possession of the map approached me bowed to the nearest officers and handed the map to the general. The general then handed his cloak to three over his shoulders and the general then took his hand and handed his map down beside him with the purpose to lead him to his own room. The possession of the map indeed created a good deal of excitement. Every one around crowded around the general and the spy, and the way some of the officers started at him as if he were a great outcast and a great man annoyed me. I wanted to get possession of that map take it away from him and the general at once and give the general's officers a good piece of my mind. But then all I could do was to keep all my feelings to myself. Finally one of the highest officers went out and then I caught sight of general Darger again. I saw his glance at me with a warning expression but I knew it was useless for me to warn him further. He also must have seen the map and still was going through it with his own plans. He believed me going to try and outwit me as well as all the others just to try my presence and so therefore I could only try to watch him and not lose sight of him. The spy then reappeared in a prettier uniform still. The general and other officers kept hanging around him as if he was a pretty woman. Somehow this distressed and appeared no more than ever. One one else I also noticed from another place kept his eye on both of them what wherever he could and therefore I suspected another man was after the map also. Of course even if he was a friend also I could not just then dare to reveal myself to him for safety sake for I could not tell him why I was there then so many were gazing around. I could not let him know the truth about general Darger who had been as much a father to me as many of his mothers. At last seeing some one move out and others follow I believed I had a good chance. In all that through no one wanted to see that map more keenly than I did. Because the risk of it would tell me general Darger himself had failed so far in getting possession of it and therefore I made up my mind that if he would continue to fail to carry out his plan I would do it myself.

But for a while I had great difficulty in keeping him in sight and so I tried to move rather close to him when the arrival of some important person was announced. I felt sure he seemed to become tense, alert, and perhaps a bit nervous. Suddenly mysteriously all the lights went out. It was so dark so quickly that no one could see a thing but after some exclamations of surprise among the officers everything quieted down.

A few minutes later the lights were again lit. I strained my eyes to find the general and then moved through the crowd until I was close beside him. I knew what was passing in his mind. He was thinking of all the sorrow suffering and disasters he could avert with the possession of that map in his own hands. That may have sounded strange to me just then, but it was true. Again so soon my surprise the lights went out when they were relight again after some considerable confusion had reigned. I looked hurriedly about for general Darger. He had disappeared. Had he made off with the map at last? Suddenly I noticed some officer looking at me in a peculiar way. I felt he was trying to guess my identity. It seemed an age before I could get out of his sight as I could not tear my self rudely away from the crowd without making a scene and therefore he had chatted with me for several minutes asking me many questions while at the same time I was forced to keep my eyes busy searching everywhere. But when I managed to slip away I found I was too late. The general was gone. When I saw general Darger step out of a doorway and speak to a man in a darker gray uniform. He followed him back into the room and the door was closed.

I was now almost franticly skirting the great room trying to find General Dargor. If possible, but I could not find a sign of him anywhere nor of the other man either. Then General Kormann hurried from his room again not at all his usual sailing suave self but white, angry and agitated.

"Fellow officers!" he called sharply, clapping his hands for attention. "We are spied upon! That map has been taken, gone and stolen. There is a spy among us."

"I realize that," I replied. "General Dargor had broken me in to it in spite of all my efforts. I had felt it anyhow, some how when I saw the general and the strangely uniformed man go back into his room."

"The house is thoroughly guarded and of course no will will be permitted to leave until the map is recovered or the spy apprehended," the general went on.

"The map has not been gone more than a mile. That was the reason the lights went out twice. The spy put them out. If necessary we will have to permit our selves to be searched. Meanwhile please remain calm."

I felt sure if the general Dargor had been clever enough to get into possession of that map perhaps he also had been clever enough to get away despite the many guards outside. In that event every one would ultimately have to be searched. If I was detected I too would have to reveal my identity. I had not been invited. I had sneaked in. I was for one would be under suspicion. What could I do? I decided that if any thing was done I would escape if I had to shoot up the place to do so. And yet perhaps General Dargor had not succeeded in escaping. Perhaps if I looked around closely and carefully I would be able to find him. And in that event--I was near the general's room and therefore slipped back of some heavy hangings in the blind hope that I would find him there. Up one step in sight in that room now. I was just turning to go back when the door near me slowly opened with a slight creak. I leaped behind a huge palm and watched to see who would come in. I was up surprised to see it was General Dargor. He peered in a furtively. From the way he held his arm I knew he had the map in possession. When he was half way through the door I drew up to him.

"General Dargor for god's sake give me the map, let me make a get away with it quick. I'll catch. Otherwise you cannot get away."

"On len for god's sake don't interfere. I'm going through with this myself," he said, but cover my retreat will you."

"You are not taking much chance," I gasped. They have the place surrounded by guards. An you love God please give the map up to me. I'm not fooling. I'll reach the christian lines safely."

There was no time to waste and I pressed him but he would not at first give in. "No, no, I can't let you take such a chance yourself. You're good better get better plans. Callen," he whispered. "I have a plan for you now in the christian lines. You don't understand the danger."

"The mineral will have every one searched and you know it," I interrupted him. "You will be caught quicker than I. I won't permit it." I declared and I forced him back into the little room from which he had come a part of cloak room for officers.

He tried desperately to argue, to plead further but I was desperate. The alarm had been given. He himself had no chance to get out without being searched.

While if I was quick enough I did have a chance to get out, reach the lines and give you little girls back your map or at least destroy it so the rebels could not make use of it.

"It is to be my last chance," Callen. I don't want the "ivian girls to know of my desperate deed either. I would not have her know for the world or they would think I'm too reckless for my age. But I know General Kormann. Delight, you don't understand. Let me go with it and I'll explain it all to you later when we are back in the christian lines."

Time however was precious. I would not listen to another word under any conditions.

I wrenched the rolled up paper from him and pushed him out of the room so sudden suddenly he did not have time to counter my attack. Then I looked around for an opportunity to get out myself.

I peered through another door but two other generals were there with two men in black uniforms. I turned back determined to hide the map somehow and get out of the crowd or at least burn it if possible. I looked around quickly hoping to see a good hiding place when I felt a hand like steel grasp my shoulder. As I suddenly wheeled I saw another man in a black uniform with his mask off and his face was not of a glandelinian officer at all. In a flash I knew he was one of the rebel police or military police that detect spies.

"Let's have that roll of paper my christian dog," he snarled reaching for the roll of paper under my arm.

I drew my revolver but for a moment he was too quick for me and his own weapon was shoved into my ribs.

"Hey Hike," he called and another rebel in a black uniform came running in. I had guessed correctly. All those black uniformed men were glandelinian officials of the military police hired or placed in the general's headquarters to safe guard all his plans and other articles and to guard against spies. And now for me I had felt they had done the job too well.

In the scuffle I was shoved through the door just as the "Mutt" look up spy and General Kormann rushed up to us. And then other officers appeared on the word was passed around. "They've caught the spy. They've got him red handed."

Things seemed to go in circles for me just then and all I could think of what would the "ivian girls think if I failed in this? My mission, what they would say if they discovered that I was a failure. And they would have to believe I was a failure.

For I could never explain never. I felt sure for the moment that my face was whiter than the white paint itself and in that moment as both of the officials help hold me and another help hold the map they had taken from me I looked everywhere for a glimpse of General Dargor. Could he or others try to save me. Or would he be foolish enough to come forward and tell the truth in an effort to get me out of it? I hoped and prayed not. I would sooner lose my life as a spy than have the "ivian girls that is you know that I was a failure. And in a moment I knew that spying was the most risky job of war no matter what the cause might be or how holy or wicked. But I did not blame General Dargor. Officers and private soldiers were rushing about and through the bustle I saw him slip through an arch in the hall. I was glad. My mission had not failed regardless of its consequences to me. He was at least going to get away, you little girls I hoped would never know. I was happy--happy in the midst of my agony.

"Pretty clever spy this man," said one of the army police.

"Well taller who are you?" demanded another.

I remained silent. I hoped to get away however so I would not fail to deliver the map.

"He is a well known christian boy of that dreaded Angolintin gemini you can bet on that," the first officer said to General Kormann.

"Let's have a better look at him," said another.

The man stepped into the alcove picked up a napkin and dipping it into a water bucket came over and began wiping off the dirt on my face.

"O-o-o-h."

It was the first sound to break the silence while every one waited to see who I was. Then a cry of surprise came from another officer.

"What is he a spy?" he gasped.

The glandelinian army detectives stared at me and then at each other and then shook their heads.

"So you have to two professions ah?"

General Kormann snarled as he stepped up to me.

"Why why it's a Gemini member of General Dargor's gang," cried another officer.

"Do you know this christian dog. We don't!" one of the army police said.

"Yes indeed," snarled General Kormann. "He is George Callen one of the worse of general Dargor's spies."

"It must be a mistake. It's some silly attempt at a huge joke. Of course he can't be a real spy," said an officer looking surprised.

"It would be a foolhardy way to play a prank then because General Kormann man values that map," said another but his voice was shaking and he looked at me suspiciously. But General Kormann gave a mocking laugh and shook his head.

"Take him away to the court-marshal. Let him tell that to the tribuna officials," he commanded after the detectives looked over the map and saw that none of it was missing. Yet some of the officers not believing I was a spy tried to interfere. But they were ordered away and the general laughed when I tried to break from the military police and go at him. I knew then that he was glad to get me out of the way and I knew I could expect no mercy from him. And so I felt sure I was to face the firing squad immediately. But you may be sure I rested not at all. My mind was in a turmoil. Could General Dargor spoil the thing I had tried to do by telling you little girls the truth. Would it be better if I had let him get off with that map instead? He might have succeeded. I this believed I had been a fool to ruin my life's happiness in trying to get away with the map myself when he could have done it. As I was on my way to the entrance of the room and hall it seemed to me I must have dreamed it all. Many features of the assembly of officers had been like a dream. But the fact that I was a prisoner was real proof it was no dream. And I resolved to be a man and pay the price no matter how great that price might be. I had followed the very desires of my heart. I owed everything I had to you girls and General Dargor. If it had not been for him I would have been only a common private soldier in the army. It was no more than right that I should sacrifice myself for the general. But the time I was out in the hall and going forward with the army police I was calmer. Yet I began to feel if the map was not recovered the whole christian cause would be all broken up. I felt now that he had been right and that I had been wrong. I should have listened to him when he pleaded with me the first time and let him get away with the map. And I felt you little girls would be all for me if I had succeeded. I knew you were little brave white hearted janes and that you were heads over head in your love for your holy cause and those who defended it with you. At that moment I forgot I was a prisoner. The trouble I was in all of it. I too loved my cause and every one was loyal to me. Therefore nothing else

"Keep an eye on that corporal," he whispered to me. "If he gets too quickly out of here jump on him but don't do it - I know you have to. There's a safe in this room I want to lok into. Maybe we can prove also that he plans to do harm to us all."

general could easily win a major battle in the field. The general was going to jail when the spy said, "Just make one sound even the slightest and I'll drill you full of lead general Kornarian." "I'll drill you and take all these papers to general Ivan any how. You yourself are a spying snake general and these papers prove it."

"Put both hands up in the air general-----like that-----and keep them there."

The glandelinian general still it and trembling but recovering his nerve twitched as the spy read him the statement he had written. It would ruin him, his glandelinian army -- he knew that. It would give to the christians a glorious victory in the coming battle, but there seemed no way out.

The S Y forced the Glandelinian general into a chair at the small table. He sat down opposite and one by one they went over the papers, the securities the letters--all the evidence he had found in the safe.

"I'll sign it," said the general as his eyes wavered from the spys. "But I'll read the statements first."

"Hurry" he cried to me "take all those papers and the map--swap guns with me--get away for god's sake---quick---good bye" he gasped he indicated as he pointed to the stack of papers on the table and the map. He then grasped m my still smoking gun and handed me his own which had not been fired. I understood. The poor guy was done for. General Darger came to my help in time.

for our cause--go". The spy's head then fell forward. I leaned over and felt his heart for some beats. There was none, the spy was dead. I took the papers and ran to the window. Outside soldiers were running toward the building and footstaps were heard inside. I leaped back and into the big room and one soldier came hurrying through. I then hid for the moment for I knew the general too was dead. I forced the dying general before he expired to sign the statements which now he willingly did since he knew he was going holding him up, standing him as he tried to guide the pen with fingers that were fast stiffening in death. That inst ant of the general was the best in his life. He signed the statement, and then I left the building by a side secret way and after many frays through the rebel camps and outside in which I was wounded in the leg escaped."

"You were a brave and noble man," they cried.
Now that thrilled the soldiers, they loved him and believed in him now. Even great general Hanson put his arms around him as if he were a child and between weeping and laughing they were half an hour talking.

who had slain General Kormoran if he was caught. The urgent prayers of Violet on her sisters, their planula, and entré entreaties had failed to move him and their misery over the danger of fur future losses through these same spies left him utterly untouched by either sympathy or remorse. Appeals of the generals, and of the others and even of Gertrude Angelina and her girl and boy friends had a left him unmoved.

"I will give you only one more chance to tell where those two spies are and wherever they are within the Christian lines or not and I warn you that no man not expect no consideration from Emperor Yizian or his daughters or this court unless you confess."

The manlps were seen to only tighten a little more. His cold wicked eyes stared back at the general impassively. He knew where the two spies were, what that were doing, and every one knew that he did. By a few words he could have relieved the aching hearts of violet and her sisters. By only a few words he could have won the slightest sentence. The spy was over sixty years old, and was of more than considerably more than average intelligence. He knew that the court was in personal control of THE Virgin girls and that it was within their power to give him an easy sentence to a death sentence or a life sentence in the military prisoner as it was their will and that they would do it if he did not speak as they dramatized. However he would not speak and therefore Viola and her sisters allowed general Hannon to give him the sentence.

"You are utterly bad a criminal instead of a spy," he told him furiously. "A wicked man and not a soldier though you are in uniform. I sentence you to face the firing squad tomorrow at sunrise."

Not a muscle of his face moved not a shade of expression crept into his eyes. He sat like a statue this wicked man who had put a heart break and misery into seven beautiful children, he listened unmoved derisive and defiant and he was marched away still unmoved. The generals were astonished. They wondered exceedingly what was the secret of his strange and unusual silence. Was it his fanatical love for his wicked cause? As we all know from what was read already it was a windy night toward the end of the week that the Vivian girls with their friends were finishing the map in the small headquarters of their own. In another room an Angelina, Italian girl who for her love of them relied upon them like a parent. About nine o'clock in the night a face appeared twice at the window then some heavy object was thrown into the room that caused confusion among them all. They recovered their wits, and they found the object was a small round stone in the form of a ball. Forgetting for a moment the map they arrested the stone. Then looking for the map they found it gone and feared they would never see it again. As the hours wore on and while they were on their way to general Hannon's quarters soldiers were called to aid in the search by Charles Brown and Marcus who happened to be with them when the loss was discovered. After a few days of rigid investigation and search in which also general Hannon and his followers helped in search of Viola and her sisters found through the help of one of Marcus's men after the shooting of German found this rebel spy in Colonel Stunck's headquarters talking looking about the loss the Vivian girls suffered. Suspicion was at first directed to him because he was the one who had sent the morning note to Viola and her sisters and because the seven Princesses learned he was an assistance to the two Professional spies. He also had made himself suspicious because he had once quarreled with some officers about the war some little time before he received the message and had left to reside in Colonel Stunck's headquarters. He however had visited the old place secretly to get as he said his army clothing and supplies. During this visit he had gone into the room of general Gladerlin's headquarters, the latter accusing him of taking with him a letter and some paper that the general had found missing and had had seven boys disguised as the Vivian girls help him in the conspiracy so that if detected the Vivian girls would therefore be mistaken for the spies. He had been arrested but found without anything about his person had been released therefore and the general withdrawing the charge against him. It was also discovered that in secret conversations with himself he had threatened if he found the chance to take the lives of Viola and her sisters and had tried to lure the unknown hooded men to slay them in ambush. One of these men being arrested told the officers that the spy had asked him to do it. The trio had refused the officer offer of one million dollars apiece for the killing so he had said:

"Well I know of many gladerlinians who would be willing to do it for nothing."

During the first day the Vivian girls had set out with their friends some soldiers and officer officers and even boy and girl scouts, had told the general that they had seen two men, one tall and stout with mustaches and other wise smoothly shaven move out of the company street and act very suspiciously though wearing the purple uniform. But the threats and the letters to the Vivian girls mainly caused the spy's arrest. The spy when surprised was indignant. One day of the map a note being sent he said he had been on a scouting tour with general Vivian at noon, had gone with general Hannon at four o'clock in the afternoon, had returned to his room, fallen asleep on his cot, awakened at four o'clock undressed and gone to bed. This was his alibi. When asked the two generals said they were not out on any scouting tours of any kind that day, neither did they leave their headquarters.

Then three officers came forward to draw the net closer about the spy. One of them said that he had been stopped at sundown by three uniformed men, one who had an unusual large package in his possession. The third man had given him some information about the Vivian girls being shot to death, and when he had reached there, the place turned out to be all in confusion and no one hurt though the ceiling had lost considerable plaster. When he retraced the place where the three men had been he saw them darting away into the darkness over mounds of earth, and then into a old clump of woods. He picked out the prisoner as one of the men. A second soldier then came forward and said that a little later on that same night he had been hailed by three men who had forced him into a tent and told him to change uniforms with one of them or die the death. When this was done, they bolted after setting the tent on fire. Others also identified this man. Confronting him with all this evidence as well as the threatening note to Viola and her sisters the court marshal confidently expected a good confession, but none came. The spy stubbornly repeated his denials and monotonously again and again reiterated his alibi. Meantime a most extraordinary search for the other two spies was going on a hunt unequalled in the search for vandals. Two hundred and fifty thousand soldiers, the Gemini and others were assigned to the case by squads of boy and girl scouts who went everywhere possible looking for them, thousands of the most expert Gemini made canvasses of every tent in the lines, every house, in the towns and villages and cities every place were combed, rivers, towns, camps and all reservoirs were scoured, squads of men equipped with tear bombs searched tunnels and woods. The National papers in all cities offered great rewards for their capture or information which would lead to their discovery and capture. Not the faintest trace of the two spies had been found. Searching back through the lives of the spies the army authorities found some very curious things. The tall man a scoundrel had been always successful as a spy and had never failed in anything yet. Twenty one days ago he had raised general Gladerlin's tent.

Everything of importance belonging to the general had disappeared as completely and as mysteriously as the map stolen from Viola and her sisters. Soon after this he or his smaller accomplice had raised general Bonifano's headquarters and there was a great and dangerous fire following. Everything he had finished just as had the others. He had a wide acquaintance among all professional spies and the rebel generals and had received sixteen thousand to one hundred thousand dollars for one daring and successful exploit. What was it or what is it that lies beyond this strange silence of the spy this wicked man. Was it fear of the Professional spies, or general Mir-Hollander's punishment did he stay the map himself? The general who had sentenced him to die had this suspicion, for he said:

"The map was stolen by some one and I have a suspicion that is profound that you stole it."

He paused and looked at the spy intently. All eyes in the court room were on him for some sign that would betray him. He stared back at the general with inscrutable face and eyes-----and all in that army court room had a swift vision of this spy, as a tight lipped, cold eyed snake coiled in the desert of mystery with the map crushed in his embrace. And yet if the spy had actually confessed that he knew what had become of the two professional spies he would have suffered no sentence at all and would have missed the tragic penalty that he now must meet. It might even have been that the loss of the map before its recovery came about by accident, and although the spy would have been punished on the charge of being responsible for this he could still have taken advantage of the situation and made his bargain with the court marshal before he told where the two spies were and where they kept their hiding place.

In any event so anxious were all the generals to solve the mystery for poor Viola and her sisters that without doubt nothing heavier than a prisoner of war would have been inflicted, but those who watched the spy closely during the long trial the longest ever made by court marshal in the world believed that it was not fear of the rebel spies and general that kept him so silent.

"There is one thing about the work of spies that makes it more cruel than murder," said general Hannon. "It is the uncertainty of what will happen to the army if the spy is successful. There is not one officer who would not rather know that his stolen plans or maps and letters were not destroyed or captured than to feel that in the possession of some shrewd general of the rebels it was or they were perhaps threatening some terrible disaster to any of the big and most powerful of the Christian armies. Night and day the officers of lower rank or higher commissions and of course the lowest--- have visions of what will happen if spies are so successful and who knows of nothing that will happen. He therefore feels worse than a poor mother who has a vision of her lost one, who had known nothing but the tenderest love and care, lying bruised and beaten and calling out helplessly to her to come to it and deliver it from its misery. Or through the long sleepless night the poor officer or general sees his loss of the plan and imagines he already hears the exultant 'DEVIL YELL' of the successful foe, and there comes the thought of what, if the plans are in foes hands, what the after results will be. Disasters brought on by it, and generals ignorant of the true facts perhaps wonders at every tremendous fee charge that bet that widens the abyss between him and success, until soon enough the hour comes when the battle ends in a disaster heard of by the whole world. It is positively all this that makes the certainty of the destruction and immediately change of the plans preferable. Many a poor officer who has lost his plans through spies has prayed hour after hour that the plan is recovered, or lost by the reckless spy, or that the spy meets his own end before he reaches the rebel lines. Then he knows that at least the army is safe from defeats, and disasters and human losses in men and officers and disgraceful murderous losses in prisoners and slain. Undoubtedly this prisoner knew this, every spy no matter what's his mission must and does know it, and so it may be that his wicked hatred against the Vivian girl Princesses and also the Christian cause is so infernally black and bitter, and so fiery and his desires against Abbiannia so strong and his wicked determination so terribly strong and stubborn that he chooses to remain quiet giving up life and hope for life as nothing compared to the evil and perverted thirst which can be satisfied only as the disasters can do and satisfied only by the continued tears of Viola and her sisters and long drawn out heartbreak."

And many of the generals and others believed this too that it might be true.

"You are a wicked spy, you are desperately bad!" The general on said to him angrily. "It is true not that the map is not in the possession of the two professional spies, that general prisoner is dead, but the spies are hidden away somewhere by some friends who know how to conceal them. And yet it is most difficult to believe that this is true, when the reward for their capture dead or alive is so great indeed that it would not be an easy for it to be regarded or taken. Recognition by some one or soldier would be inevitable and a conflict might ensue with each other for possession of the two prisoners in order to gain the very reward offered. Yet again if the spies did escape then how could they get out out of the christian lines, or hide in a closely guarded and watched camp?"

There are of course many ways for spies to be hiding so they would not be found or detected but in fact I see the map now recovered was so large that a fat man could wrap it the paper around his belly four times and still have a portion of it stretched out. The map also could have been burned but this too leaves its traces and would be the satisfaction of the girls as the spy then would have been unable to make further use of it. What ever happened to the two spies or how they ever got out of the closely guarded christian lines is of their mystery a mysterious disappearance. All the stated movements of the three suspiciously acting men that night, from the face at the window until the time the map went, in the confusion caused by the flying stone are accounted for.

Between that and the next morning there was a lapse. From that morning unknown by the vivian girls who then were searching for the map, the very movements of the prisoner had been checked up every minute. What ever he did he did quick did quickly and with the extraordinary completeness and secretness. It may be that in that very monotonous passage of the hours in the guard house to which he will be brought to await the hour of his execution the iron will of the foolish and desperate spy will probably weaken and he will solve the mystery. He will still have a chance to tell and if he should it is possibly likely that immediate recommendations would be made out to me by violet or her sisters and my pardon heard and his death sentence will be withdrawn and that he once more would even be a free man and not a prisoner at all. But the vivian girls think he will never tell a word. They believe he will go to a spy's death with that cruel strange silence of his still unbroken.

No to go still further. One of the most shocking experiences of violet and her sisters within the christian lines at the hand of disguised glandelinians occurred that following night. Like all other good little Abhinnannian girls violet and her sisters to the surprise of all the other soldiers had continually withstood during the very trial the insults and wicked propositions of a certain number of strangely uniformed men whom they did not like and which they at first took to be a bunch of tough young foreign braggards at the trial. Regarding whom violet and her sisters were or what was their rank and profile these seemed suspiciously acting soldiers in purple grew bolder every hour during parts of the weeks trial as they found forth that time that nothing was being done to cause their arrest. Many of the Angelinean soldiers who were also at the trial were afraid they were glandelinian soldiers or spies in disguise because the tough young fellows were always seen around the place where an officer had reported a loss and as nothing could be found to prove any suspicions upon them the officers could not do anything and even every officer had reported even during the trial broken windows and other damage to military property while intending to take the suspicious ones to the court marshal would just then result in nothing as no evidence could be found against them. The serious incident happened the late Wednesday evening after the spy was sentenced when after the trial violet and her sisters dressed in their best riding uniforms like all others of the girls scouts of which they commanded went on their way to general Vivian's headquarters to find out something more concerning the plans of all the generals. They reached the general's headquarters without any unpleasant incident however but unfortunately on their return had unknown to them the disguised rascals (or an escort the very ones they did not trust and whom they had learned to dread). There was much snickering and whispering among the soldiers and presently the ears of the seven vivian girl Princesses began to burn with coarse wicked dirty and immodest remarks about them and their girl and boy scout followers. But they pretended just then not to hear and tried their best to give their attention to where they were going. The wicked rascals refused to be ignored however and after a while one of them rode over to violet and nudged her demanding her and her sisters to ride back alone and release him and his companions from duty.

"You cannot be off duty until your proper time comes and a new squadron relieves you," violet said quietly, "but as soon as we reach our own headquarters we will see that you are relieved."

The disguised rebel, an overgrown youth not quite twenty years of age was not satisfied with these promises. He claimed that he and the others wanted to be off duty and in the arguments and threats that followed between them and the vivian girls violet finally said that the soldiers must obey and he quiet or they will be placed under arrest. This made the disguised glandelinian soldiers very angry but such to the relief of violet and her sisters they rode back to the rear in a body. When they had traveled further on, violet and her sisters could have appeared frightened and embarrassed for free the way the escort acted and a conversation they expected more trouble and insults but hardly what was really to come. It was very dark but as they reached a clump of heavy trees by the side of the Big Girl Knool Road violet caught a warning look from her sister Joice. Before Joice could speak one of the men rode up at a gallop and suddenly starting an argument again struck violet in the face with a set of brass knuckles which not only cut her face but greatly increased the shock of the blow knocking her from her horse almost dazed. She rose to her feet and attempted to draw her weapon but another man almost rode over down and rode her down knocking the pistol from her hand with his sabre. The third time, bleeding, and only half conscious she staggered for her horse but discovered it had run away in the confusion. She supported by her sisters seeing this man take this vicious spite out of her would immediately draw their guns and cover the whole escort. However confused by the scene they snickered and Jennie and Angeline came to the rescue of violet and started to escort her to Jennie's horse. Then they hurried along in the darkness but suddenly hearing the voice of the rascals behind as if following hard for some evil intent they drew guns and began to urge their horses on faster. Soon they reached a fork in the yellow brick road and turned to the right because they felt sure the ruffianly escort would lose them in the darkness and take the main fork by mistake.

But the pursuers kept right on and caught up with them. The leader whipped out a pistol and shoving it against violet's ribs said;

"Dismount, leave your horse here and do it quick or you'll be a dead fairy sprite in a moment."

Violet looked at him and the other rascals closing in and obeyed. It was her belief that the rascals would surely have killed her and her sisters, and she probably was right. But right or wrong she absolutely refused to leave her sisters not even to walk a little way. Immediately another pistol and the same threat were applied to Joice. She too felt they meant murder but nevertheless refused to obey. Then the leader said in plain deliberate words as they refused to obey, they were going to attack them and their sisters they screamed out;

"You wouldn't dare."

"We will dare anything you dirty little christian dogs," came the vicious answer and a second time the girls cried;

"You would not dare."

"I'll show you," said the rascal in a rage and both of them struggled and screamed as the glandelinians threw them to the ground. Her sisters rode forward to protest the other rascals having still remained on the horses watching the struggle. Two of these rode forward drew their pistols and grabbing the reins of the horses of the little girls urged them down the road a few yards and warned them;

"Beat it and don't you girls hang around here any more or I'll shoot your bodies full of holes."

Realizing the situation fully the two girls rode off however only to bring aid and apparently their two sisters were abandoned to the mercies of the disguised glandelinian rascals. They screamed and fought some more and the rascals drew their guns placed it at their temples and said;

"Look here christian sprites. If you scream again we will blow your pretty heads off."

This threat did not daunt them and seeing a chance they broke from the throng of captors and remounting their horses urged them at a racing speed down the road. But they soon heard the roar of hoofs behind them and Jennie was suddenly grasped by the throat pulled off the horse and was again assaulted this time by another man. At the same time her sister had to again suffer from the others.

Then again it seemed as if they were really going to get away at last for there were no sound of horses behind now. But to their horror the disguised rebels again appeared from all sides and again they were attacked. While this was going on her other two sisters had secured a squadron of Abyssinkilian soldiers on swift horses the first men they could find and hurried back to the scene. The rascals evidently had more plans in mind for they had surrounded and stopped the terrified girls again when they heard the roar of the horses. Horses of the rescue party coming. They fled but could not outdistance their Abyssinkilian pursuers and were captured. And by morning were lodged in the military prison for rebel criminals charged with treasonable assault on the vivian girls.

There was great indignation at this and it was evident that the court marshal would take this brutal offense against the vivian girls very seriously. During the court marshal there however was none to defend the culprits and the jury within an hour after the trial began rendered a verdict of guilty and they were sentenced to face the firing squads immediately.

The spy was marched the spies were marched out, placed before a stone wall in the company street, the firing squad took their formation and with the order fire brought the spies down with one volley. The other spy who still had refused to reveal the other two spies that is the professionals also shared the same fate.

General Melhoff returned to the scene with one million Gladelinians and Condancinians and struck at the Angelinians with all his force but the Gladelinians could not pierce the line though they held it at bay. General Toe Gaden arrived to the scene however and attacked the christians with merciless fury sending the line backwards badly riddled and gashed. General victor now brought his his heaviest artillery and hammered away at the victor and very wise and clever. you boys who have never seen her will like her I'm sure."

"What a lass she came back to us!" asked all of the boys.

Just then the famous girl heroine came around the bend of the road riding swiftly on a magnificent horse which looked like one belonging to Violet. The girl this time wore the scarlet uniform of the Winkie Abyssinians and on her head was a large peaked hat with a large flat rim trimmed with small tinkling bells. She had a cartridge belt around her waist and a revolver on each side. Her face was interestingly beautiful and somehow or other her very smile bore a cheerful yet winning expression. She wore padded white gloves with the fingers long and rather limp and on her feet she wore riding shoes or red leather with broad turns at the top of them. The horse was almost as magnificent as its fair rider and also curiously decorated. This horse was a great and favorite property of Princess Violet who had caused him to be shod with expensive shoes and he was taken great care of so that he was a healthy animal. Its saddle was made of gold or cloth of gold richly encrusted with precious gems.

It had never worn a bridle. As Gertrude and Angeline came in sight of the party of boy scouts she reigned in the magnificent steed and dismounted and greeted Penrod and his followers with a salute and a smiling nod. Then she dismounted and stood to stare at all the boys in wonder while they in turn stared at her.

"Rattle snake!" Penrod whispered drawing his friend aside;

"Fix my tie into proper shape, there's a good boy."

While his friend obeyed he himself turned fully to Penrod and also whispered;

"Straighten out my coat please, its dreadfully wrinkled from traveling so much and all girls like to see a stately figure."

Both boys finished their hasty toilet at nearly the same time and again they faced Gertrude Angeline.

"Allow me Miss Angelina Aronburg," said Penrod to present my best boy friend the Right Official of Regiment "Radcliffe Radcliffe this Miss Angelina Aronburg. Miss Aronburg this is the boy known as the Rattlesnake. Angelina Aronburg--Angelina Aronburg the Rattlesnake boy."

The boy and the girl bowed with all the dignity they could assume.

"Forgive me for staring so rudely," said the girl.

"I'm at fault too for I stared also," answered the boy. "But you are the most beautiful girl next to Violet and her sisters our eyes have ever beheld."

"That's a high compliment from boys who are themselves so gallant providing my character is beautiful also," murmured the girl looking at the boys searchingly "but tell me boys are you not going on a scouting tour?"

"No we just returned. We almost got bunched up though in spite of all our efforts to keep ourselves hidden from the enemy. Did you just fit end going on one?"

"Oh not with this horse," said Gertrude. "I'm not that stuffed with cotton. It would never do to lose this horse or let the enemy get possession of it."

"But horses are easy to get anywhere in our high grade horse pastures. I may say it is a very stylish of you not to say aristocratic to ride so magnificent a horse you have there," said Penrod politely. "Still it is proper that a girl friend of Emperor Vivian's daughters so entrancingly lovely should have the best horse ever rode by any one. I'm--er-----I'm so glad I've met you again Gertrude."

"Introduce us again Penrod," asked the boys.

"Once is enough," replied Penrod laughing at the enthusiasm of his friends.

"Tell me where you boys were and dear me what a queer disguise you wear Penrod. What is it supposed to be? A Masquerade?"

"Something like that to confuse the enemy," answered Penrod proud that his disguise had attracted the girls' attention. "I've had more excitement to day than usual. I'm glad the enemy did not catch me. For a time I had wished we were transparent. I could see the rebels at work and though I've got a brave heart I at first thought I felt it leaving my mouth when the rebel gunners opened fire upon us."

"Just the same have I," said the girl shaking hands with Penrod as if to congratulate him on the fact. "I've other boy friends, one Walter Starring the boy say who has a very brave heart but the way I feel I could almost get along without one if my other organs would keep me alive. And so--well well here's your companion disguised to shake hands my little man, how are you?"

The Rattlesnake placed his hand in hers rather bashfully and the boy pressed and the girl pressed it so cordially that the boy felt more encouraged. Meantime one of the other boys had approached the horse and began to examine it with great curiosity. This horse resented this familiarity and aimed a sudden kick at the boy but fortunately missed.

"Keep away from that horse," cried Gertrude in a tone of warning. The boy never winked.

"To be sure I'll do anything if I have to. But don't make me angry my horse or I'll give you a shot between the eyes."

Gertrude looked at the boy and said;

"What a sweet disposition you have my lad for a boy scout. That fit of anger is breaking one of the rules. I advise you to try to calm your own calm yourself. If you killed that horse you would answer for it. He is the favorite steed of the leading Vivian Girl Princess who some day may be the ruler of the land of Abhinnani and she keeps him in a special stable behind her headquarters. He is as swift as the wind, untiring, and is kind to his friends. There may be something in you that the horse does not like. And all the Nation respects the Vivian girls highly and when I visit them or bring them a message Violet sometimes allows me to ride him as I am doing going to day. Now you know what an important personage the horse belongs to and if someone--perhaps you will tell me your name, your rank, and your history it will give me great pleasure to relate this incident to Violet or her sisters. This will be very interesting to them I'm sure but will lose for you their mutual respect and friendship, and cause you to lose your boy scout service in the army."

The boy was somewhat abashed by this speech and did not know how to reply. But Penrod said;

"This boy's name is Jacksona Wooley and he is quite a good boy except that he has a habit of getting angry too quick. I request if you will it that you please forgive him this time."

The boy looked the girl looked at the boy and saw by his eyes that it was true.

But she said in a puzzled way;

"What makes that so important? He threatened to kill the horse, called it a beast and no one has known Violet or I to ever put up with that."

Then Penrod related the unusual story of Hanson warning the Vivian girls not to go on a certain scouting tour, and told how they did setting out to find the things which they wanted to know in order to foil the foe's intentions and save Hanson's army from a defeat. This was before the battle. One of the chief incidents related was of the boy who snatched but however without results, not being able to gain satisfaction by it. Gertrude looked grave as she listened and she shook her head in several times as if in disapproval. We must see the Princess Princesses about this matter," she said. "That boy was seriously breaking the law by his snitching like that and if he is found out I'm sure Violet or even Violet or even her sisters will not allow him to remain in the boy scout ranks."

"Already I have spoken about that to the Rattlesnake boy," declared Penrod. At this Radcliffe looked angry.

"I want him found out," he exclaimed in his excited way. "I'm also afraid he may be in my own regiment and if so I'm going to expose him if I find out. What right has he going among us if he snitches on people like that?"

"Don't worry about that just now," advised Gertrude. "Go on to their headquarters and when you reach it have Angeline picket take you to see Jennie Turner. Tell her your story about the snitcher and I'm sure she will help you find out who it is. Jennie Turner beside myself is their best friend and if you can win her more than ever to your side, I'm sure the stool pigeon will go wrong." When turned to the boy who threatened to shoot Violet's horse she said;

"I'm afraid in one way your offense is not serious enough to be reported after all. I'll let you off this time."

"I've got a magnificent horse much better than him even," said Penrod. "I wish to make a present of it to Jennie Vivian but I'm too bashful to face her especially."

"Is that true inquired Gertrude turning to The Rattlesnake boy.

"Yes," said the boy and gave a description of the horse.

"Have you anything else?" asked the girl.

"Not just now," said Penrod as the other boys laughed merrily, and Radcliffe smiled. Bug put the laughing of the boys made Gertrude forget about the questions she had been asking Penrod. He then said to them all;

"Indeed what admirable boys you are and what joy good company you would make for us girls. Some day I hope we will be much better acquainted for never before have I have met a group of boys which such natural artless manners."

"No wonder they call you Gertrude the wise," replied Penrod.

"When you boys arrive at the camp I will hope to see you again," continued the girl graciously. "Just now I'm carrying news to general Robert Vivian have promised Violet and her sisters to deliver it for them."

"When you do you expect to return to general Hanson Vivian's lines?" asked Radcliffe.

"I hope to be there this very afternoon for I am anxious to have a long talk with the Vivian girls about something very important. My horse is equal for a swift run and I ought to be able to make it."

So Gertrude remounted to the saddle, and then waved her big bell trimmed hat and the horse darted away so swiftly that she and its rider were out of sight in a minute.....

"And yet how nice a d good natured she is" added Benrod bobbing his head up and down. "I think about the vivian girls, that in violet and her sisters she is the prettiest girl I've ever seen for a life time if it is that way." "Beauties are as beauties do." quoted one of the other boys. "but we must admit that though no living creature are as the vivian girls in beauty they also have a character and nature that cover their sweetness. The chief merits of Gertrude Angelina is that she is a great thinker for the cause of the nation and if all the generals follow her advice continually there'll be a big crash for Glandelin soon." "I

"You can't seem to understand that she told you it belongs to Violet and not the Emperor," declared Penrod. "When I first heard of Gertrude I had never had much confidence in her especially when I first came over here for it was said by the glandelinian generals that she was a big humbug Abbess. An Abbessnandan girl scout and spy, but through things I've seen I was soon convinced that Gertrude is really a menace to the foe and unless the enemy can get out of her way there will be a fatal crash for glandelinia. Her effort's at her work and all her successes are immeasurably unaccountable...."

"not just nowage was once but she now assists them.Violet and her sisters has taught Angelinia Aronburg a good many clever stunts of their own so she is no longer better.She is a holy terror.....(" They now walked on for a long time in silence and then Penrod said; "If we cannot find out w o the snithe r is what in the world shall we do?"

"Is Jennie Turner the little one who was wounded in the leg?"

Here Radca Radcliffe uttered a long sigh and then he continued; "she is i' a in a way a very queer girl, this Janie urmer, but I like her nevertheless even love her for she reminds me of my dead sister." " " " "

"Her ways," said the Rattlesnake, "the rebel generals have placed a great price on her head."

"If they would come to any part of America they would find their presence cause a most tremendous sensation."

"I now and perhaps she is----- from my point of view," replied Penrod, but why he smiled as he said this Radcliffe could not imagine. As they drew nearer to the Christian lines the boys were filled with untold admiration for the splendid scenery they beheld. Enormous and handsomely decorated tents stood on both sides of the road way and beyond the outskirts of the tents or camp was a large lawn with myriads of pretty flowers.

He was walking ahead with Radcliffe and behind them came the other boys.

He watched the bushes cautiously to make sure he was not mistaken. In an instant his heart leaped with excitement for this was one of the important things he joined the boy scouts for to find out who would be shadowing him or his comrades. He glanced ahead and saw that none of his companions was looking back so he tried to attract their attention by making a noise like a catgut they were too far to hear. His signal. Neither where there any soldiers about at this point they being out on drill and it was a short distance from the sentry line. Seeing the movement in the bushes again his temptation was too strong to resist crying out; "Who's there he ind those bushes?"

They stood a long time on the hilltop feasting their eyes on the splendor of the encampments.

"Why I thought you liked General Givins best" replied Penrod looking at his friend in amazement. "You are a captain or Marshal over your boy and girl scout regiments a regiment a Radocallife so you are their personal leader and they would not like you to leave them behind so so long."

"I thank you," remarked his friend, "we boy scouts remain and go where our superior tells us. It wouldn't do to have every name boy scout to remain too long in one camp you know for some must now and then make a change, and scout and answer flag signals and all the deeds they are requested to perform, while others chop down trees to form barricades to oppose the advance of the enemy, or fish in rivers, or watch the movements of the enemy, and do acts of kindness and mercy. There is a freedom and independence in a boy scout's life that not even the army life conveys to a superior general. I know that most of the soldiers would like to be boys for the purpose to be boy scouts. The Vivian Girl Princesses could live as freely in Emperor Vivian's Palace instead of being with the Princess if they just wanted to, but they are adventurers and other kind of girls. Too much splendor becomes tiresome in time you know. But if we are to reach the headquarters of the Vivian Girls you know we must hurry for it is a yet a long way off."

The entrancing sight of this enormous city of encampments had already put fresh energy into the boys and they hurried faster than before. There was much to interest them along the pathway for the barracks were now set more closely together like houses in a big city and they met large crowds of soldiers who were coming and going from one part of the camp to another. All these soldiers seemed either excited or sullen faced but many of them nodded gracefully and respectfully to the boys as they passed and exchanged words of greeting. At last as they reached their own part of the camp, just as the sun was nearing the western horizon and adding its brilliancy to the few clouds in the sky, somewhere in the camp a band could be heard playing a long sweet sad march. A soft subdued humming sound as of many children singing at a distance also reached their ears from a other direction. They were almost at the boy scout encampments when there was the sound of galloping horses and an officer on horseback dressed like or in a uniform that looked too splendid for a millionaire to buy with all his fortune, rode up followed by soldiers uniformed like him, and they reigned in before the boys and indeed Penrod thought he had never seen such a handsomely uniformed officer in his life before. At first he thought it was Emperor Ivan as he slightly resembled him. General Harrison pointed for it was he he he were indeed a handsome uniform also a purple and gold edged coat with a fancy tall hat in which there was a large waving plume and his revolver belt looked as if it was thickly encrusted with jewels. But the most peculiar thing about him was his heavy long beard like that worn by a missionary Priest.

"Halt for a moment you boys," said the general, general but not in a stern voice but in a very friendly tone. They had however stopped before he spoke and Penrod stood at salute as he said:

"Good evening, general Halsted. What's the good news since we left general Greatharts' lines? Anything very important?"

"We are going to reinforce general Jeknell with thirteen divisions of troops or even more," replied the general. "They say he is one of the ablest generals and fighters on the side of our cause. Abbieanna ever had Emperor Vivian and his daughter are mighty proud of their generals. I can tell you."

"They have a right to be," agreed the boys. "Let me see. Is was seven million prisoners he had captured yesterday. Is it not general?"

"It was more than that," was the reply. "You should visit the great general some day and congratulate him."

"It will give me great pleasure and so for my followers too do that," said Penrod. "But you will observe I have brought some new recruits to my camp with me. I'm going to take them to see general Hanson, Vivian."

"One moment if you please," said the general, raising his hand. "I am on duty here and I have orders to execute. Is there any boy in your party whose name is Marco Schofield Penrod?"

"What? Why general that is me!" cried Penrod, astonished at how hearing his name on the lips of this important chieftain. The general smiled.

"I thought so," said he. "I know how bashful and awesome you are while being in the presence of the Vivian Girl Princesses. Directly therefore I am just the same delighted to do my duty in announcing that it is my surprising duty to bring you to them. You are to see them on something very important."

"They wish to see me," exclaimed the boy, blushing crimson. "What for?"

"They have not told me as yet," answered the general. "I've got the summons here." Then he drew from a breast pocket a roll of paper and opening it glanced over it.

"Oh you are to appear to them on some important council which you alone they can decide in."

"Confide in me only," said Penrod still blushing. "Nonsense, general. I know you are surely joking now. I be called into their presence a common boy scout."

"No I am not joking," returned the general. "My dear boy, what are you thinking? In me you behold the body guard of our Excellency general Hanson, Vivian. I'm in command of Hanson's whole army and also am the Count in charge of the royal army of Emperor Robert, Vivian, and also the Grand Duke of Angelina Agathia."

"And only one man," of course claimed the boy.

"Yes my lad, only one and plenty enough. In my official position I have plenty to do since the war came on. Sometimes so much that I feared I could not accomplish it at all. An hour ago I was called into the Presence of their Great and Royal Highnesses the Vivian Girl Princesses and told to summon a boy to their presence named Marco Schofield Penrod who was entering general Hanson's lines from Greatharts' camp to ours and who would also arrive in a short time. This command so astonished me that I felt embarrassed for it is the first time any boy of any kind has merited his good luck to be summoned into their presence since I can remember. You are rightly in good luck my dear boy, since you have gained their loving friendship."

"But I am afraid you are wrong," said Penrod. "I'm not important enough to see such girls in their own headquarters. For I am nothing more than a plain boy scout. They usually receive their best girl friends and general officers only."

"On that you are greatly mistaken," replied the general. "Any one accusing himself generally is not what he says he is. You have secretly without your knowledge been given a fair trial by Violet herself, her sisters have somehow confirmed their confidence in you for you have every chance to prove your character and ability, and you are more than they even suspected. You are good at making plans, drawing plans, making sketches and the like of earthworks, fortifications and the like, and of shooting at targets but you have them beat a thousand ways. And don't you realize my boy you caused many disasters to the foe. If you really like them as you say you will be only too glad to obey their summons. If you refuse they will surely know you are afraid of them."

With this the general took from his pockets a badge made of gold and set with rubies and diamonds and this he placed on the boy's breast. Indeed, Penrod was so bewildered by this summons that he made or offered no resistance or refusal at all. He knew he was liked very well he was liked more as a brother by them and it surprised him immensely that they confided in only him. And he wondered exceedingly how they had found out so much about him when he tried to keep everything he did a profound secret. He of course knew that no one just now was more greatly feared by the foe generals than he for by his actions he had proved it. He had upset Mic-Ho's, Illesters' plans at the battle just past and by that caused the general to lose a leg. He handed his old hat to Radcliffe and said in a shaky voice:

"Keep--ake up this crazy--looking outfit--until I--I--re--return. If I--I--do not come--back to tomorrow--for certain reasons--throw it--away."

Radcliffe had been gazing earnestly in the boy scout's face uncertain whether to ask permission to go with him or not but something he read in the expression of Penrod's face made him draw back knowing why they would also call for him in another hour too. Radcliffe was greatly surprised and proud instead of jealous as some other boys would have been and he knew that Violet and her sisters never made mistakes and so Penrod was really wanted for something important. He however did not like it that Penrod was so confoundedly bashful and awesome. Penrod mounted the horse led to him and the general now directed or led him through the company streets and to the army dry goods tent. Here in charge was a jolly sergeant richly dressed in a lavender uniform and having around the rim of his large hat the same kind of tinkling bells. He was the quarter master sergeant and at the moment he entered still on horseback was playing the tune of "Abbieanna forever March."

It was indeed a splendid piece the best music Penrod had ever heard and all listened respectfully while he blew the notes from the magnificent mouth harp. When it was all over the general said:

"I have here a special friend of the seven Abbieannian Princesses."

"Good Gracious a special friend!" cried the sergeant jumping up from his bunk and looking at the boy as if flabbergasted. "Which one? Not that nice-looking boy in rebel uniform."

"Yes sergeant, this nice-looking disguised Abbieannian boy scout."

"Ah but he is foreign but anyway I hoped he would surely gain their friendship and my hope has not been in vain," said the sergeant. "But what can he have done that has gained their confidence in him, and what made him accomplish it?"

"Not allowed to tell their orders," replied the general. "All I can tell you now know. All I know is that once he broke up Marley's army, and not caused a main army to be lost the chief general for good."

"But general even they must be fooling or seriously mistaken. No boy has yet been able to do that."

The general laughed.

"That's all you know," the general exclaimed. "They have looked up his records and the records of his deeds, have gone through his room looking over his drawings and letters and sketches and other plans and out of all things they discovered there's a far greater reward offered by the traitor government for his capture or destruction than there is for the seven of the Vivian girls combined. They discovered that in a rebel post p. bill on a tree which they now have in their possession."

"Then he must surely be famous and soon will be on their right side. I hope he falls in love with one of them general," jokingly.

"I am ordered to escort him to their headquarters," answered the general. "His chief, ide-de-camp for the time being. Get me a brand new uniform for him the best you got in stock. I'll reward you for it some day."

The sergeant went to the high stacks of boy scout uniforms and took from it a specially made uniform which the boy quickly put on. A hat also was furnished, a new pair of shoes and some special leggings. As they then left the tent the general said to Penrod:

"I have been first asked to take you directly to Jennie Turner for she is to prepare a special supper for you. An hour later Radcliffe will come to. Before they see you the Vivian girls must summon the Gemini but they won't keep you waiting long at least not at all but they know you have not had your supper. So while you are eating Jennie Turner will entertain you will well and so you need not worry about the little delay."

"What shall I do when ushered into their presence?" asked the boy.

"That I cannot tell," answered the general. "Since I entered the army no boy before was ever summoned or honored by Emperor Vivian's daughters before until they called for you. You must use your own judgment. You may not be ushered at all but requested to walk in just as if you were at home."

"It seems to me the dear Vivian Girl Princesses are making a big fuss over nothing," remarked Penrod growing more awed as their headquarters came in sight. "I don't know what important things I have done but it could not be anything very great. They must like me as if I were their brother."

The general did not reply to this speech and presently some how or other the boy began to forget his awesome feeling in his admiration of the wonderful city of big striped tents he had entered. They soon separated from the fancily uniformed soldier escort of the generals the boy being led by the general down another company street toward the imposing building now very close. Indeed Penrod though enjoying his very good good fortune felt greatly embarrassed, and greatly excited and yet proud of himself but at the same time he was beginning to grow awesome again because he was treated by the Vivian girls in such an honorable way. He even felt it was really a mistake.

Instead of entering the splendid Abilene camp as a respectable boy scout captain who was entitled to a welcome and hospitality he was being brought in to see the Vivian girls as a great guest of honor and a brotherly friend in a new uniform that told all of his met of his unusual reception. Penrod was by nature gentle, brave, cautious, and affectionate and if he had joined Mc-Hollister Army to be crippled at Nine Pines it was only to restore Hanson's army to its lost positions. What was that? Why nothing. Any general could have done that. He believed his own bravery was more reckless than mere courage, no sacrifice through fear but that did not alter the fact that he committed the deed that caused the disaster to Mc-Hollister's army and the loss of their main commander. At first he had felt joyful and exultant but now the more he thought about his being so unusually honored-----too extremely honored to be true, because he considered it was the more he was surprised at his being summoned admiring and feeling awed but was grateful to the Vivian girls for making friends with him-----only a common boy scout, and then honoring him like their brotherly prince because they loved him, and honored his brave deed. What was brave in that he wondered. What was that, only breaking up the rebel army and causing the loss of the main leader. Would not they have done that before? If they did they would not have thought anything of it. What victory for Hanson's army was in causing general Mc-Hollister's downfall? Penrod began to think that Violet and her sisters must have made a big mistake or that they must be very good and unusually friendly seven little Princesses to be out here witnessing such harrowing scenes of this tremendous war. Many said the Abilene general hated them but surely how could they? The boy scout was so busy thinking these things-----which only brave heroes have thought before him that he scarcely at all noticed the splendor of the company streets through which they passed. When over they at any of the jolly smiling soldiers who spoke about him he looked at them in surprise although none of the soldiers knew who he was.

By and by or rather in a few minutes more they reached the big handsome wooden house that stood just beside the road that peculiar round house they need. For their headquarters (in a retired part of the camp) it being a pretty rounded house indeed near neatly painted and with many large windows. Before it was a small meadow once covered thickly with a sea of blooming flowers.

The officer riding up to the gate dismounted, then Penrod did likewise and the general led the boy up the gravel path to the front door the two sentries admitting them past. The general knocked three times very loudly and to Penrod's surprise a beautiful ten year old girl opened the door and seeing Penrod and in his new uniform exclaimed after she had thrown her arms around his neck and kissed him:

"Goodness me if it is not the good dear boy who helped me the day I was wounded. But what is the reason you bring him here general? He is a prisoner of the Vivian girls for one night!" and she laughed as she said this.

"Yes for one night" answered the general laughing also. You know the Vivian girls want his company for important reasons Jennie dear. I guess you know what it is all about. But the fact that he thinks he is a common boy scout does not matter, and this being their headquarters and you their rescuer as they told me it is my duty to place him under your charge until he has eaten his supper which they wished you to prepare for him."

"True your Excellency. Come in then and I'll give you a receipt for him."

They entered the house and passed through the welllighted hallway to a large oblong room where she regarded Penrod with such kindly interest that he could not help being nervous and yet enraptured at the same time. And the boy also was gazing at her in amazement for this was the first time he had seen her without a disguise and he had never dreamed of her beauty so magnificent. Were all the heroines he knew and heard about such beautiful little girls? The room was neatly furnished the furniture being upholstered in satin brocade and it consisted of easy chairs, divans and stools in great variety. Also there were several large big tables with big mirror tops and some cabinets filled with rare and most curious things. In one place there stood against the wall a good sized book case filled with many different different volumes and elsewhere Penrod saw a large cupboard containing all sorts of games.

"How long am I to remain here before I go to see the Vivian girls?" asked the boy pleadingly.

"Why after your supper" replied Jennie smiling at him sweetly "and in me behold your server. Put down the blinds now" to another scout "and see that there are a enough guards to make it impossible for all strangers to enter this house or to get near enough to put their dirt faces into our windows like one did before." And she laughed as she said this remembering before the face at the window before the map was stolen.

"I'll do that very well Miss Turner" replied the boy scout and at once set about to obey his order. The little girl touched a match to a gas mantle and lighted a big chandelier that hung suspended from the ceiling for it was growing dark on the outside. The she then she seated herself at one of the tables and asked:

"What was my dear boy friend?"

"Marco Schoof told Penrod" answered the general himself.

"Penrod! Ah that accounts for it then." said she. "What purpose of his arrival? You know I have to ask that even though I know."

"To attend a perfectly important conference."

"All right! There's your receipt general and now I'm responsible for the safety of my good and handsome little guest. I'm glad of it for this is the second time I've met the brave lad who sacrificed so much for me" remarked the girl in a tone that showed her gratefulness.

"It's the same with me Jennie" laughed the general "but my duty is now finished and I must go to report to the Vivian girls that I have done my work like a faithful friend as I hope I am."

Saying this he nodded farewell to the girl and boy and went out of the room.

"Now then" said Jennie briskly "I must hurry and get you a good hot supper for I know it's a long time since you had eaten and you must be very hungry. What would you prefer me to cook for you. White fish, Omelet with jelly, pie, or mutton chops with gravy." "!!!!"

For a moment Penrod thought about it and then he said:

"I'll take the white fish if you please."

"Very well. Amuse yourself my dear boy while I'm busy cooking. I won't be long" and then she went out by a side door and left the boy alone. Penrod was much astonished for not only was this unlike any army building he had ever heard of or seen but also he was being treated more as a prince than a boy scout. There were many big windows but they were locked to prevent spies entering. There were three doors to the big room but being on the inside of the building they were not locked.

He cautiously opened one of the doors and found it led into the same hallway. But fearing of being lost in the big house he had no intention just then of straying out of the room. Moreover a hot supper was being prepared for him and his room was very pleasant and very comfortable. So he took a book from the once and sat down in one of the chairs to read at least what he had time to glance over. He found it an amazing story and he continued reading until the little heroine came in with a large tray and spread a white cloth on one of the tables. Then she quickly arranged his supper which proved the most varied and delicious meal Penrod had ever eaten in his life.

He felt awed yet delighted as she sat near him while he slowly ate, reading a book to herself. When finally he was through she cleared the table and then told him of her deeds and experiences since she became a girl scout.

"Is this really the headquarters of the great Heroines?" he asked when she had told him everything.

"Indeed you are right" she replied. "but it is not the only headquarters in the camp."

"And am I really summoned here by them?"

"Yes indeed. They are preparing to receive you."

"But why are they treating me so fine and why are you so kind to me?" he earnestly asked.

Jennie saw of very much surprised at this question but she presently answered:

"Why we consider our country very fortunate fortunate to have a good boy scout like you. The nation is fortunate in two ways--because you have done so much for our cause and aided many child slaves who are deprived of their liberty. Therefore for even aiding me you have won more than our friendship which is your good fortune. The Vivian girls know you are strong and brave therefore their confidence is also strong in you. When you accomplished that deed more like a soldier than a boy scout you are considered more than all here by them and also a good and loyal soldier and all the soldiers are glad and all the officers and generals too that they have a boy scout in their army that is strong and brave enough to rally a division of confused troops like you did at the battle of Delight's Junction. You see it was your bravery that made them have such strong confidence in you and so they wish to trust you with something very important that they would trust no one else with."

Penrod thought this over very carefully.

"I had an idea" said he "that what I did was nothing at all."

"Nothing at all!" cried Jennie, "excitedly springing to her feet." "Are you sure Penrod that you know what you are saying. Are you one of the boys who make nothing out of a brave deed? Don't you wish Penrod with all your heart and soul that you was now a man and had that huge sum of money that the glandelinian government has offered for your capture dead or alive! Don't you realize that millions of trees and fountains and other places have those bill posters offering that reward for you! Don't you realize it now!"

"I'd hate to have the money. I'd have no joy out of its riches. Riches is only a curse unless... I gave it all for the good of the cause," he admitted. "I'd even rather have the coin a company you are now to me than all the money in the whole wide world."

"Yes as I believe I would too," said the girl. "But when you are in their presence you will be obliged to enjoy their company too. I don't know just what they will want you to do for them because this is the first time they have summoned a boy of any kind or rank but you may be sure they will confide in you. Only of boys at least. Here even in the christian lines there are too many disguised spies and yet you who came from some far away country have even outwitted the cleverest of glandelinian generals and spies the Glandelinian government has."

"Yes," said Penrod. "I've lived the life of a soldier despite my young years and I fear none of the glandelinians."

"I thought so," said Jennie Turner. "The rebels know you are a tiger. Neither their swiftest pursuers nor their secret service men and military police who have continually hunted you in vain realize that you are really a tiger. Some believe the foe spies are too careful of your skins to trail the boy tiger to his den. They have felt your sharp claws before. Once you called your boys that is some of them a bunch of chicken hearted fools because they were afraid to go where you went being afraid of the foe would be on their trail or shadow them. You got away with the plans alright. But now we have talked enough so let's get ourselves ready to be admitted into their presence."

Indeed Jennie Turner after her talk with Penrod was getting ready in one of her rooms in the royal headquarters. She was putting on her best Purple frock without any fancy designs or ornaments except a purple hair band for despite her bravery and position in rank she was a simple little girl and had not been in the least spoiled by the magnificence surrounding her or by her own rank and heroism. Once before the great war broke out the brave child had like the vivian girls lived in different parts of the Abbeismian country but she, like them, seemed born for thrilling adventures for she had had quite a number of experiences with the enemy and she too was more greatly dreaded than even Penrod or Gertrude Angelina. Her ways now seemed pretty, graceful and loving but if any one was her enemy look out. She was a tigress that once released from its cage destroys all enemies before it. Her very best girl friends the beautiful vivian girl Princesses of Abbeismia who loved and adored Jennie Turner so well that if duty did not call her or them they kept her with them as much as possible so as to be near her and have her company. As for Angelina Aronburg it would be something unusual to see her separated from Jennie Turner. The little girl's parents and relatives had been wiped out by the early horror of the war and now her sister gone she was alone in the world. Nevertheless though she hated all the glandelinians with a savage hatred she was a calm and did not show her bitter feelings. Jennie Turner knew almost every general in the armies of her foes and it was she who had discovered the two professional spies, her arch enemies at their work within the christian lines, and the one who had shot her in the leg.

Her life was a very busy one now and although she had been made the highest of the girl scout leadership her friends the vivian girls she was a leader also a spy and became so dangerous that the best of the glandelinian generals feared her. A squadron of rebels generally would flee at her approach if she saw them first.

PENROD JOINS THE COUNCIL AND GIVES ADVICE WORTH WHILE. THE RESULT.. ..

JENNIE was just lacing her shoes when one of her girl scouts, her favorite aide-de-camp came in to say that general kindernine had arrived and wanted to see her on something very important immediately...

"All right Minnie," said Jennie. "Tell him to come right in." "But he has some girl scouts with him dressed in queer uniforms---some of the queerest disguises I've ever seen in my life," reported the girl. "Never mind about that, Minnie let them all come in," replied Jennie impatiently. But when the aide-de-camp opened the door to admit not only general kindernine but three good sized boys, Jennie Turner jumped up and looked at the three boy-scouts in overwhelming amazement. The oldest boy had the most curious disguise of a 1 and Jennie was uncertain at first whether the three boys were really alive or only a dream or a night mare.

"You sure are now ones to me, you three boys," Jennie said reflectively addressing the boy scouts. "I can't imagine what part of the camp you came from." "Who me?" asked the oldest boy feeling embarrassed to look at the girl and gazing around the pretty room. "Oh I came from the Glandelinian army I guess. I can't tell you though what the glandelinian soldiers called me though when I escaped them. It's worse than blasphemy. Some Angelinians even say the glandelinians call me a 'Rattlesnake' but my name now is Radcliffe and now I know you know all about me."

"I did not quite know you in that queer disguise," returned Jennie with a queer smile. "But I wish you would tell me how you came to go into the enemy's lines and then escape them so quickly!"

"That's an easy job for me," said the boy. "I longed for some excitement so I went with these three boys. I did not stay as long as I wanted to as I had no time. A very fine refined rebel general named Manley whom I narrowly escaped told me something about myself that didn't fit for any body to hear. I'll kill that traitor general if I get the chance."

"Oh have you met old Manley then?" asked Jennie a little puzzled to understand the brief story related.

"Yes, he is certainly a very jolly fellow, and a champion lacamp hater."

"That general has many dreadful qualities," replied Jennie. "But I'm sorry to hear he called you such names. I'll bet he has made a few savages when he knows you escaped him so easily."

"He only swears for the benefit of his army," exclaimed another boy who was respectful before her.

"Dear me," said Jennie. "were you with Radcliffe?"

"I've swiped some very important letters and plans which are also very important," answered the boy. "also I have Manley's magnificent pistol. You can see it here." And he showed it to her.

"Oh is that Manley's gun? Bring it over here and let me see it please!!!!" For a moment the boy hesitated eyeing the girl bashfully and looking very embarrassed indeed.

"I'm very respectful and it is very undignified for me to approach girls like you in such filthy uncouth uniforms," he said.

"Undignified? Why of what great importance am I?" she demanded. "May that is my way to have even the most common boy scouts approach me and to boys like you I should be, and I am the kindest girl or one of them probably in the whole world so to speak speak to my way of seeing things to you you do as many good deeds most as much as Penrod does."

"Why I was not thinking of that," declared Radcliffe in an awed tone.

"I know you wasn't being brave enough to face beautiful little ladies like me," explained Jennie smiling at the bashful boy. "suppose you were the most common of boy scouts that would not make any difference to us girls, we understand boys a good deal and they would not be afraid of us or embarrassed in our presence if they understood us just as well as they understand themselves. Therefore brace up little boy friend you surely must not be afraid of me or let my beauty awe or embarrass you any more than if you were my loving brother, come near to me please and show me the gun you captured from general John Manley."

Radi lifa at this tried to overcome his shy ness and he handed her the gun while when he looked into her face and he she returned the look he had the sensation as if he gazed into the beautiful face of a celestial being.

"That's the gun" he gazed and in a way that made her smile, however the boy summoned up enough courage that he ventured close to Jennie Turner in order that the little girl might see that he is brave, this was really interesting but when Jennie just suddenly placed her arms around his neck and imprinted a kiss on his forehead the boy blushed and looked at her as if he had been killed by an angel.

"What do you know about general Manley's intentions since you was within his lines this evening?" asked Jennie.

"I was in his headquarters" replied the boy. "So I know all about his plans and I have told it to general Vivian already. Yet he fears it is too late because since discovering the generals of the rebels will change their plans. I've been in his house for an hour and though I did not know much about him I will say that according to his conversation he had planned many times to lay waste to the whole christian camp by fire but many of the vandals have absolutely to do that work unless they received a huge sum and a commission for it. Manley thinks there is no danger in doing this for the confusion caused by the big fire would cover the retreat of his shattered army. He planned the conflagration for to night deciding to have it done if he has to make the fire by his own hand."

"That's awful, why did you not smite him?" asked Jennie.

"I think you had better let me explain that" interrupted the general and then he told Jennie all of Radcliffe's story and how he had entered the enemy lines with forty hundred disguised soldiers beside the three boys, and how when they had been discovered the soldiers had been all shot down in the death struggle that ensued by rebel sharpshooters and the boys and the general narrowly escaping with their lives, then he related how the three boys had while hard pressed by the glandelinians had made their way out of the camp and how they fortunately came upon a large Abyssinian, Kilian Squadron or scouting party who had shot down all of the pursuers and taken him and his three boys along toward the christian lines and brought them in fifty after a long race with the pursuing body of the fierce zimmanian cavaliers..... Jennie listened to all this with much interest beside "horror" and thought so far the boys had acted very well, but when the general told her fully of Manley's plans and already of the arrest of many persons accused of trying to set fire to tents in various parts of the camp and of the doubling of guards the little girl was greatly shocked.

"What do you suppose can be done to prevent it?" she asked.

"I fear nothing at all" answered the general sadly. "I did not see any one make any such attempt yet but I warned the guards that to allow a fire of mysterious origin break out on their beat would be seriously breaking the military law and the penalty will be the facing of firing squads, and so perhaps no fires will show up in my camp. But I don't know about the others."

"I'm sorry about that" said Jennie gravely "for if a big conflagration should break out in this camp there will be no number of soldiers able to stop its progress and everything will go before it woods and all."

"Don't mention such bad luck plans" said one of the other boys. "but I believe we are safe for the soldiers question and search every one who are perfect strangers to them and if they have any thing to start fires in their possession such things as matches and the like they are promptly arrested."

"I see" remarked Jennie with a sigh of regret "the generals, many may have forgotten to have the soldiers keep an eye out for those professional spies. They say the main ones to start such a fire if the others are not able to do so."

"Yes we are still in danger of a big fire if they did" retorted the second boy. "and such a big fire would be a great disaster to us. To think of it makes a person feel nervous, sad and excited all of which sensation interfere with one's happiness. But I don't imagine it will let Manley be bothered any about such fires."

"He's a pretty hard hearted general" said Jennie "and Radcliffe of course-----"

"Why as for me" observed the boy who still stood by her "I have never seen those fire bugs yet as I was too much occupied and yet it will be a sorry thing for them to try to make a fire near my camp. It'll be very unfortunate for them. I remember how when Penrod was located in that attic with the Battlesnakes and he longed for some one to help him and bye and bye the Vivian girls traced him through your aid and information and did help him, go as you helped him I'm willing to help you and them. We may all be stupid boys Jennie, but we can prevent the outbreak of the fires near us anyhow and what ever you'll tell us to do we'll gladly do it."

Jennie took his hand and pressed it warmly.

"You are a good boy. I and the Vivian girl Princesses like you as much as we do Penrod. What else will you do for the cause. Anything special?"

"I can put all my boy scouts on guard so they'll prevent the glandelinians from setting the camp on fire as they planned."

"I don't see as how any amount of guards could prevent the vandals from making a fire if they intend to do it" remarked the girl. "Can't you think of an thing else that would have better results?"

"I thought the guards could sound a general alarm even at the outbreak of a small fire, or at least for to night if necessary have the whole army strip down the tents and sleep without them" said the boy hesitatingly "hesitatingly" but perhaps that would not do an' good either.....

"No I believe not" said the general. "You are quite wrong in suggesting that. Then he turned to Jennie Turner and added "what will become of the vandals if they are captured?"

"I don't know" she said shaking her head thoughtfully. "Acrossin" as they call Aron or Arson in this country in time of war or not is considered the most serious of all crimes worse than murder and is felonly and in time of war or even at all times considering if a fire causing many persons to lose their lives vandals suffer the death penalty for every offense they commit. Those who are caught will be brought to trial of course and then they will be punished. But what the penalty for just the attempt I do not know cause no one say nor vandals had a hardly ever yet been captured alive in our armies since I joined. Y' a bad is it not general?"

While they had been speaking the other boys had been roaming around the room looking at all the pretty pictures on the walls and the beautiful furniture there. Radcliffe had all this time been carrying a large wicker basket in his hands until now and he handed it to her for he wished her to see what was inside of it. She found a loaf of bread, a round block of cheese which smelled of no account papers, she was curious however for she knew the boy had something concealed in them. She took them to a small round table and proceeded to examine them. The girl was quick witted and although she had little time to waste she recognized that her friend Radcliffe had accomplished more than he had cared to admit.

She knew at once without the slightest doubt that because the boy had taken a very important papers from Manley's headquarters he had been hard pressed by the pursuers and she understood that Radcliffe had given her the basket so that if there were disguised rebel spies in the lines shadowing him they would not find them in his possession and thus thwart his own plans. So turning to look at all the windows to see that no one was looking in from the outside she took some notes from inside the bread loaf and something else nice and round from the cake of cheese which she had found was cut in two and at his quick suggestion placed them inside her waist. Then she came forward and said to Radcliffe:

"I would not care to see any one shadowed by spies so I'll help you. Manley has I know ordered his cleverest spies to enter the christian lines to show me and the Vivian girls."

"I now it, it is the same with me" said the boy "and of course I was afraid he knew what I was doing and so I entrusted them to your care. If you can reach general Hanson's headquarters to morrow they will be safer in his possession I believe."

"They will have to get there as soon as possible won't they?" asked Jennie. "I suppose so."

"Well general kindermine can take them immediately" declared the girl and she handed the notes to the general as he was departing. As it was nearly time for Jennie to bring Penrod to interview the Vivian girls she rang for her aide-de-camp and ordered the other three boys taken to a nice room and given such a supper as they liked. Radcliffe was put in a room of his own for she was much interested in the boy and wanted to talk with him again and understand his ways much better than she did now. Penrod knowing it would soon be time to be brought before the Vivian girls had gone to a room prepared for him and to this he went to make himself appear more cleaner. His uniform which he had on was of a deep lavender color made of satin and velvet, he boy washed himself as clean as possible and then combed and brushed his hair carefully. This accomplished and arrayed in his splendid lavender uniform he went to Jennie Turner and found the Battlesnake boy and some very shrewd looking officers already assembled there.

The boy Rad Radcliffe had made a quick change of his uniform and was looking much different then when he first came with the general and the three other boys. A moment later while they all stood patiently waiting the girl girl aide-de-camp suddenly opened a door and Violet and her sisters entered. Already throughout the whole story so far for a whole lot has been said told and written concerning the dazzling beauty of person and also saintly character of these seven sweet and brave Vivian girl princesses of Abissania the most war torn country of which any one ever heard of. Yet to say with all their queenly and other q quillition violet and her sisters were real brave q girls and unusually good in allways though on account of the war they ad not the slightest opportunity to enjoy the things in life that other little girls love to enjoy. he cut out their scouting tours and when they rode their splendid horses and tried to keep all their generals informed of every movement of every one of their chancellors and plotted plans and made conspiracies, and made laws concerning the movements of the christian armies they were as dignified and as demure and as serious as any other queen should and would, but sometimes when they had managed to discard their uniforms and retired to their private apartments in their headquarters or elsewhere the vivian girls joyous and also light hearted and free replaced the sedate Princesses and dignified manners. In their council room to night where gathered only old and out trust worthy of boy and girl friends so here indeed wore t o the vivian girls in themselves more girls. they greeted Jennie Turner and also Angolina Aronburg with a kiss, the pattenmoke with a smile and hearty handshake, also the officers and they pressed Pe rods arm and cried merrily:

"What a lovely new uniform you have on...by its a hundred times better than the one you had before."

"I'm glad you like it" replied the boy well pleased but blushing scarlet. "The general did a neat job when he selected this one for me did he not?" Is it not wonderful what a little care would do when it is properly selected?" "Your uniform is really very wonderful" violet agreed as they all took their seats by a big round table. "Put the horse you rode must have galloped furiously o to have t to have brought you here so quickly. I did not expect you here so early."

"Well" said Penrod feeling more at ease "I met a charming girl friend of mine on the road and so I hurried back to see if she would be here too."

The vivian girls nodded.

"I know" they returned. "It's Gertrude Angeline. she is certainly bewildering in her ways if not at strictly beautiful."

"Have you seen her too then?" the boy asked eagerly.

"Why she told us," she told us all."

"I fear she did not do herself justice then" said Radcliffe meaning to joke.

"It seemed to me that what she wears for disguises could not be more funny or at times gorgeous," declared Joke. "who ever made that patchwork quilt dress of which I even wore for disguise must have selected the gayest and brightest bits of cloth th that were ever woven. It made me the laughing stock of the whole army."

"I'm glad the soldiers like the disguise," said Penrod in a satisfied tone."

"but where did Gertrude Angeline go to now?"

"In my room for a few minutes" replied Jennie Turner. "she has ta on a fancy to something in my room something queer and uncommon."

"She's already got the glandolini n generals half crazy I think," added the pattenmoke boy.

"And yet she is so beautiful," exclaimed Penrod as if that fact disarmed all joking. Every one could not help laughing at this but Penrod was indeed quite serious indeed. Seeing that Radcliffe was quite interested in Gertrude Angeline they forbore to say anything against her. The small bands of friends that violet and her sisters had gathered were o so quietly assorted in their disguises and as they done so much to help violet and her sisters out in times of peril that the greatest care must be taken to avoid hurting their feelings or making any one of them unhappy and discouraged. It was this unusual and most considerable kindness that kept them the closest of friends and enabled them to enjoy one another's society. Another thing they usually avoided when ever possible and that was conversing on the most unpleasant subjects and for that reason the news of the vandal spies and their attempt to not the camp on fire were not mentioned now. The boy Radcliffe however related his adventures with general Manley, and then of the Zimmermannian soldiers who had a pursued him and his followers so vigorously that they would have seized them had it not been for the timely arrival of the Abyssinkilian soldiers and also told how he had robbed Manley of some very important papers. All of the girl heroines were pleased with this daring exploit and thought it served general Manley right. Then they talked of the ferocity of the Zimmermannian soldiery which of course were the most remarkable glandolinian soldiers any of the boys had ever before seen except the still more ferocious glandolinians known as the Scoodlers, the fierce Gargoylians, and the vic-Hollentinians. Violet and her sisters agreed that the vic-Hollentinians were good deal fiercer fighters than the other kind of rebels but they added they did not think they were as savage or as brutal as the others. "Still" said Jennie Turner "the vic-Hollentinians are bad enough, their very generals are terribly conceited and I would not care very much to meet w them."

"Radcliffe looked up and remarked;

"Those papers and plans I stole from Manleys headquarters must really have contained something wonderfully important. But also general vivian will learn of their true value and will take advantage of it in the wisest way."

"We must see ourselves what they can contain" said violet gravely. Then she smiled again and continued in a lighter tone "T It was only yesterday that something happened that enabled me to become in possession of an order written to general Inskell by Manley."

"You don't mean it was written i like a code?" asked Penrod looking at violet questionly.

"Well when I was out scouting alone that morning after the battle I was on the point of surprising a lone re a rebel who was shadowing me" began the vivian girl "I did not know who it was and when I crept upon him unaware I saw him quickly slip an envelope into his coat pocket. I quickly covered him with my pistol and made him hand over to me his weapons and cartridge belt. He refused however to reveal what he had hidden in his pocket. I made a motion as if I was going to shoot him to frighten him. I was bound to get that letter. But he must have known that I would not really shoot him in cold blood and to test his real character I tried by promises and threats, and entreaties to get it from him. It was of no use and he then made a break as if to run away but I covered him and took him into the camp with me making him keep his hands up in the all most of the time. At the end of our short journey when entering the outskirts of the christian lines we came upon a squadron of winkies all mounted on horses of their searched him whol while others held him and brought forth the letter handing it to me. So you see had I not brought the prisoner along with me I might never have succeeded in gaining possession of that envelope nor would I and my sisters prepared to have this council to night..."

The story about the letter interested the boys and all those assembled very much. The conversation now being well nigh concluded they all stood by the big round table getting ready for the council.

Penrod felt proud now that he had been surprised to appear before violet and her sisters. They now all sat over themselves black regalias and white hoods there being holes for the nose and eyes. Penrod felt so proud both of his good luck and the confidence they had in him that he felt it an honor to be covered up in that way so that prying eyes of spies could not see him or know who he was. He followed their directions very willingly, anxious however that the council should start as soon as possible. All the officers who had arrived were polite soldiers and as it was the first time that they had known a boy to be honored by the vivian girls that they cast many curious looks toward Pe rod as they also disguised themselves all being present for the council when Gertrude was admitted into the council room she found thirty officers dressed in their uniforms of the highest rank assembled there.

In the magnificent council room by a large round table sat violet and her sisters in their own disguises. On violet's right were the other heroines and on their center were Penrod and t his friends and also Radcliffe. At another table but much larger and also round sat the officers and on the center of the two tables were piles of large square sheets of yellow, green, pink, and gray papers.

At both doors of the room stood two powerful men heavily armed and they wore on guard. Although these men had wicked looking faces no one present needed to be alarmed by them for these four men were well known and respected by all in the whole christian army were the specially trusted sentries of the vivian girls and they always guarded the council room for them when they held a council in it. Even Penrod and his friends knew these t four guards and often when not on duty camped and played with them for they were very good friends. Seated on other chairs placed all around the room with a large clear space between the two tables were many officers of all rank all in beautiful uniforms and also great officials of the army. Behind all these generals were seated other officers of more or less importance filling the great room to the very doors.

At the same moment that general Hanson vivian arrived with Angolina Aronburg general vivian entered from outside door escorting general "swell" paster "ohnston" and rhine Kindermine and richardson Headwick Holsted. All these came to the vacant space space before the two tables and stood facing the Vivian girls until they were asked to sit down.

"Hello Penrod my boy" said General Jack Evans who had entered with general Hanson. "How are you?"

"All right now" the boy replied, but the scene awed the boy and his voice trembled a little with fear. Nothing could awe the fiery natured Jack Evans and he was delighted with the splendid surroundings and sumptuousness of the council and the magnificent impressiveness of the occasion.

At a sign from Violet the new comers also put on purple robes and white hoods and they then again stood face to face with the vivian girls Princesses who were to direct the council. Violet sat looking at the assembly of generals and the boys a very long time while her sisters distributed the papers to every one and then took their own places once more.

The candles were lighted and placed on the two tables in high candle sticks and all gas lights except the ones nearest the tables and the ones by the two doors were put out at the signal and every one of the window shades locked and the shades drawn and all doors locked. Then being sure there was no strange person hiding in all secret parts of the room like in panels, under the tables, behind draperies or in closets hangings and the like Violet said the very low tone;

"According to this letter our enemy general Manley had written and which I prevented reaching general Cornsack picknell he plans to place his whole army upon our rear, and if failing in this to start fires on our camps that will consume all tents and barracks as well as start big forest fires. One of the laws of the Government of Abhinnin, which is my decree forbids any of our generals to be over cautious in time of such peril and also overconfident and rash. None of however so far who are here at least can be accused of having broken this law. even when we have been warned of this peril and others and also during battles and raids and the like. So we plan to night to crush Manley before he accomplishes his purpose. Just now we believe there are too many guards on duty to allow a fire of any kind to start so that is making us rest easy. But we got to crush Manley before he accomplishes his other purpose. So do so we want the agreement of all you generals on the plan I will make."

All the others were silent for a full five minutes and while they hesitated as to how to reply to this general Jack Evans stepped forward and spoke for them all.

"All this is something very serious" he said feeling them all unabashed. "I was told yesterday that this letter meant nothing at all. They said we can't prove Violet took the letter from a glandolinian soldier and therefore we can't accuse Manley of his planning to fire our camps or drive his whole army upon our rear unexpectedly and crush us. The messenger of Manley's was searched and the soldiers found the letter and gave it to Princess Violet. I've looked at the letter and yet I'm told the truth is not there. That he is not planning the attack upon our flank in overwhelming numbers on an uncertain day and hour and so it is my duty to argue over this matter with all of you present without exception and demand that you all tell me what you think of the true conditions of our situation!"

All those assembled listened to Evans in amazement and wondered at the general who could urge the council like this. However he was appointed as to be the Councils critic. The vivian girls remained silent and motionless and then it was general Darger the "Supreme Person of the Gemini" who arose and answered Evans defiantly.

"So they told you the letter was not captured by the Princess eh?" he said. "Well I cannot argue against you correctly on that matter as I was no witness to the capture but nevertheless I say I and all my members as well as many others can prove the statements of the letter positively true, and also that it was in Manley's absolute and correct handwriting and no one else. What did those letters contain also that Radcliffe said to general Vivian in that basket with the loaf of bread and the round cake or block of cheese? Orders to general picknell and many others to strike our armies in the rear at mid night the night after tomorrow and in the meanwhile to demoralize us to make a big fire that would wipe out all of our tents and make the whole army shelterless. I also think Manley has sent into our lines many secret agents hoping to detect every movement and plan of our own generals to frustrate us so that he can move his armies out of the region of Zoo Callen gun where the battle had ended just not long ago. There may have been strangers here and they don't know that nothing can be hidden from my powerful band nor from the watchful eyes of the Supreme Person or my chief assistant. Here are the letters. Look them over all of you."

With these words he produced a large number of letters which every one glanced over in turn. When it came general Evans turn to look over them he gave them a hasty glance and said;

"Oh so Radcliffe found these in Manley's headquarters? Very well if that be true Manley will surely change his plans. My desire is to strike him a blow at sun rise tomorrow before he leaves the location of Nine Pines where his shattered army is now shattered. General Manley I believe is not so great a general as Mic-Hollester, Johnston whose command he now assumes."

Violet turned to Penrod while voice rose to her feet for a moment and then again resumed her seat.

"Do you think general Evans spoke wisely?" she asked. Penrod rose to his feet and stood up in his straight forward way and looking at her said;

"Yes he is. I know Manley is too confident to change his plans and may even now strike sooner than he intended to by the plans already captured. I know it is very unwise to allow even a short delay and therefore if we wish to save our armies from disaster and ruin so soon after a glorious victory we must act quick. Evans I'm not afraid to admit is wrong about Manley. He is a better able general than Mic-Hollester. Johnston can ever be and therefore he is dangerous. I wanted to suggest that in the first place but yet I was afraid that if I did and asked your consent to it you would have refused me."

"And what caused you to think that?" asked Violet.

"Why at first it seemed to be a very foolish suggestion and probably unjust and unreasonable. But now when I look into the matter clearly I can see no harm in picking the earliest hour to morning morning to make the movements that will frustrate general Manley's plans. And as I had not been in the forest territory for a long time now and had not seen this christian camp then nor you since the last time we met I thought such beautiful little girls like you would not be likely to accept my plans which I would suggest."

The vivian girls for a few minutes regarded him quite amusingly while Violet rested her hand upon her chin but she was not surprised. On the contrary she began to smile as she thought of something and then she grew sober again.

"I suppose a good many suggestions seem very foolish to those who do not understand how to make them," she said. "But you must know, that no plans, no matter what they be a ever is ever, written, drawn or suggested without some purpose, and that purpose is usually to bring on a conflict at a selected spot or to frustrate and outwit the plans of an enemy. As you are a boy scout captain, it is my duty to explain this suggestion of yours which to you seems so very foolish. As I show here I secured yesterday from a prisoner a letter written by general Manley to general Cornsack and Leonia Maldonia picknell. There are many clever generals and officials in the big mic-hollester army of general picknell who are known as picknellians and one of the many things they often do in following out their orders or securing safe keeping of their conspiracies is to go out on scouting expeditions with large forces of swift cavalry known as the "Wheeler's". They come as close as possible even at the risk of certain destruction from our artillery. These scouting forces have caused so much trouble among our armies and brought on so many terrible disasters often using even foul means to gain their desire that I decided long ago to forbid our own generals to go out and scout in small forces which they had been doing before now. I and my sisters also forbade inexperienced generals and other officers to practice scouting or any other expeditions too near the insurgent lines with a strong escort, except general Vivian and his brother both of whom we can trust to do their scouting without a fatal mishap and to make their efforts only to benefit the army and make our camps safer. Since I issued that law the camps and others, and all positions and even firing lines have been far more safer from a surprise attack than usual but I have learned that some of our generals who are now and not experienced still practice scouting on the sly and go out with small bodies of men. Therefore we made another law which was given to all sentries forbidding any officer no matter what rank, even our own selves from leaving the camp to go on a scouting tour or from trying to gather any information about the enemy movements with a powerful and well armed escort or swift reliable steeds. That therefore has almost put an end to tragic disasters to our scouting parties in all armies and so you see any suggestion you may offer will not be a foolish one, but wise, reasonable and perfectly just and in any case it would be wrong and foolish for us to refuse a perfectly good suggestion."

Penrod knew that she was positively right and felt greatly relieved to realize that he himself had spoken and acted so wisely. So he raised his head and looked the beautiful vivian girls in the face saying;

"I am grateful that you have suggested my accepted my suggestion and will have your generals act accordingly, and break Manley's armies all to pieces. I made the suggestion to save the armies of general Manley and his brother from disaster even if Manley did know that his conspiracy was found out. The glandolinian generals may hold me guilty of this act and whatever punishment he may think I deserve and I may as well suffer willingly providing he or his followers succeeds in capturing me alive."

Violet and her sisters smiled brightly at this and nodded graciously.

"You are certainly defiant of general Manley" said Jennie Vivian rising. "But if our following your suggestion brings disaster to Manley's army he won't be able to do anything to you or us. You are much more better than most officers even, and we think you have accomplished much already. Generals we wish to follow his suggestion. Time to remove disguises. Council is over. All to the right as you go out."

"I beg your pardon but are we to go too?" asked Radcliffe hoping in his heart he could stay forever with them.

"No indeed. We will have something more important to talk about between our selves," said an elderly vivian. "Penrod remains too."

All the officers were glad to hear the decree of Violet and her sisters and murmured their approval. As the general council was now over all began to leave the council room and soon there were none remaining except Penrod and his boy friend and the vivian girl Princesses and their girl favorites. Violet herself now asked Penrod to sit down close to her and tell her all about his plans which he did making quite a stirring story of it, beginning first of his plans to get an army arm around Manley's flank instead, and ending with his suggestion of moving the whole christian army upon Manley early in the morning or when the opportunity really presented itself. Violet and her sisters listened very attentively and attentively attentively and they were all thoughtful for some moments after the boy had finished opening. Then Catherine vivian herself said: " " " "

"General Manley was, and is, wrongfully mistaken to make out those plans to move up his whole army upon general Vivian's rear and also upon Hanson's for such a movement. For such a big army he has would take a long time and it either would be frustrated or would be suspected for the enemy retreating as it would be noticed easily by scouting parties. And if Manley had not foolishly and unwisely sent that straggler spy with the message, the conspiracy would not have been known and we would have been defeated. I can understand however that our armies will not be safe in this old position despite our recent victory unless we strike first as you suggest or make a fake retreat and fool Manley entirely and crush his rear before he suspects it. Alas I feel it is wrong to delay a minute and leave the enemy generals accept their movements when we ourselves ought to try and learn their intentions. So I propose we have our generals start the movements we plan right away and that we ourselves while that is being done make a scouting tour of our own to-morrow or to night which if which you like to do best and that we allow you Penrod to assist us to find out the movements of the enemy which we are seeking. What do you think of that plan Miss Turner?"

"That's perhaps the best thing to do," replied the governa girl, "but it is difficult, anyhow we have slept all day and Penrod is burning or at least till two o'clock. But after we have discovered the enemy's movements we must go back to the christian lines safely. It will be wiser and safer."

"We will surely do that," promised Violet.

"Now tell me please what are the movements of the enemy we must discover," continued Jennie Turner addressing Penrod.

"If Manley prepares to advance to night we want to watch the direction his army movements will take," said the boy. "That is the advance proposed by the letter with so many guards I believe our big camp will be safe from fire. I have a hunch he'll march to the north and picknell will go northward. The other divisions I--I--think--"

"Will remain where they are and keep their position to fall us," said Hettie Vivian. "At least that may be done to make our generals believe Manley is not moving his army from its position at all. That of course will make a serious separation or break in Manley's army and if such a movement is made we can get general Vivian to attack picknell while Manley is out enroute upon his flank. At the same time Hanson can make a movement of his own and then cut Manley off from M. picknell. When we'll have them both at our mercy and if we surround them we can force them both to surrender and probably have the happy luck of bringing the war to a speedy end."

"Thank you it is a good plan," said cried Penrod gratefully. Then he continued: "the next thing we must do if he makes no movements at all is to take the chances of entering his lines and find out when he intends to follow out his plans or if he intends to change them or what. I alone should do that."

All of the brave heroines shook their heads gravely. "That," said Daisy, "will be a hard dangerous task but if you wish to accomplish it we'll let you and day but for our sakes as well as for gods you must not try it alone as that is what we forbid any one to do. But it may be that you won't be permitted to enter the enemy lines. Yet if we start early enough we may discover some of Manley's conspiracy or if he changes his intentions."

"I'm willingly to scout unceasingly for days and nights for years if doing so will save our cause from defeat," declared Penrod earnestly.

"Then we had better begin the scouting at once," advised Angelina Aronburg. Radcliffe had been listening with interest to this conversation about the enemy's movements. Now he turned to the vivian girls and asked:

"If you are willing may I go with you to help?"

"Would you like to risk the same dangers we may run into," returned Joice. "Yes. I know the country pretty well but I'm afraid Penrod does not know it as well as I do. You suggested we separate when we return but I would feel uneasy for him and like to stay by him. May I go?"

"If you wish to," replied Violet, "you use your own judgement."

"If Radcliffe goes then it is my duty to take care of him," said Gertrude Angeline or Angelina Aronburg as her right name is (decidedly). "Manley's movements may also be deceiving to trap scouting parties and we may face danger there."

"All right you too may accompany us as any way we have appointed you our guardian and need your advice," said Joice. "And while we are gone I will have a big escort shadowing us and also another one act as our retainers to defend us should we encounter a large rebel scouting party or main army of cavalry and have trouble."

"I'm sure we can take care of ourselves," announced Gertrude Angeline. "I'm a girl Spartan and I'm going with you as a guardian. I promised you to aid you in watching the movements of the enemy and I'll stick to my promise under any conditions."

"Very well then," replied Violet, "but I see no need of refusing the body guard and so we'll have them or not make the expedition. You know I mentioned that at our orders the sentries are not to even allow us out of the lines without an escort of great strength. Don't you understand?"

"Without a body of retainers following us I'd prefer to remain here alone," said Jennie Turner. "I've nearly been captured or shot a dozen times already and if we are going on a dangerous scouting tour without a powerful escort it is best for us to keep away from Manley's lines."

"It would do us no good to go out alone anyhow for big scouting parties of the enemy are always out and would keep an eagle eye on us. So let's play safe and have an escort until we return. General Evans can be in command," suggested Penrod. "We won't need to take less than two hundred thousand men for they ought to make a column big enough to save us from trouble if we spied on general Home itself because we could select the most ferocious of the Winkies and other Abyssinians."

"Better take the whole of Jack Evans' Winkie Army secretly along," said the boy called the Battlesnake. "They can save us from even the slightest excitement."

"I'm sure your suggestion is a little too risky instead of safer," Violet decided. "We want to scout not start a big covert conflict. And if we did that and we were discovered the enemy may think it is a covert attack and would send all his cavalry against us and give us the full fire of his artillery at the same time. No. We will only take two hundred and twenty thousand men. Each of these will advance and follow us separately and far distant from each other."

After a few minutes more of consultation they finally decided that Penrod and all his boy scouts also should accompany them on the scouting tour very early the next morning to watch the movements of the enemy and so they all separated to make immediate preparations for the dangerous journey toward the movements of the insurgents. Violet at the advice of her sisters gave Penrod and his friend a room in their own headquarters to prepare and put on their disguises and then while Penrod was waiting he passed some hours with Jennie Turner getting more acquainted and both boys received advice from her as to where they must go, what to do, and how to do it, and how to fire at the proper time when pursued, and also what their boy scouts must do to warn of anything important they see.

Jennie Turner really a born Abissinian and not a forger as she looked had worked her way through many parts of the war stricken country on grilling scouting tours and so had Angelina Aronburg for that matter and yet neither of them knew what it was not to have exciting adventures.

"If we do such a thing as scouting," said Jennie Turner, "it is usually more dangerous than spying or fighting in the front line trench. If Manley intends to carry out either of his two plans we must take the chances of spotting on him. If there is such a thing as going through a scouting adventure unscathed I'd probably have heard of it months ago. If we can find a safe way to watch Manley's movements we would not need to feel so uneasy about it. Perhaps there is not any such good luck."

"Oh there surely must be," returned Penrod positively. "We may find that out yet."

"That's true," agreed Jennie Turner, "and if we discover a better way we are bound to take advantage of it."

"Well we are bound just now to make the best of it anyhow," said Radcliffe, "as for finding out and discovering the enemy movements we must trust to God's help."

"We all do that first thing," said Jennie Turner in an earnest voice. "We trust to ONLY his help you know."

A few minutes' journey from their headquarters brought the little band of adventurers to the imposing headquarters of general Jack Ambrose Evans which was a very large tent formed like one of those used by a circus to keep animal wagons in. Jack Evans owned it himself and the general was very proud of it. There was only one door in it and several other openings serving for ventilating purposes and through the top in the center was stuck a large stove pipe that led upward from a good sized stove inside the tent. There was also space enough inside on which was arranged some military furniture that was just suitable for the general. There is not the slightest doubt that general Evans might have secured or received a much finer tent had he so desired it for Violet and her sisters loved the man who had been their earliest hero and closest man friend and their constant companion but Evans preferred a humble tent though it did not match his rank at all. The character of this remarkable general was good. He wore a deep purple uniform but the rest he wore was yellow with green and purple stripes. The tent of this interesting officer stood at the square of Camp Headwick where immense a tree stood in profusion and bore needle like leaves of extraordinary size as well as those which were smaller.

Most of the tents used by the private soldiers and other officers of lower class or rank (rank) were almost as large as Jack Evans's and he had told them that he had intended to change the location of his headquarters soon. Violet and her sisters and those with them were cordially welcomed to this quaint military headquarters and invited to pass the night there which however they declined to do declaring they wished to scout near the enemy's lines and that they intended to start about three thirty or four o'clock in the morning. Angelina Aronburg noticed that Penrod was greatly interested in the general for he watched every movement the great war lord made with admiration. The boy noticed her looking at him and thinking to have a little fun said to the general:

"You are quite a handsome looking man but not really as beautiful as general Conventinian Aronburg."

Jack Evans turned suddenly at this to examine the boy very critically and Angelina Aronburg shyly looked one eye at him while Violet and her sisters and Jennie Turner smiled.

"In many ways there is no accounting for tastes on that matter," remarked the general with a sigh. "Manley also tells me that Angelina Aronburg is very fascinating but of course my child that may be as near as beautiful as any of the Vivian girls is not in existence yet. May's my boy I have noticed that the worse of the Glandolinians usually avoid Angelina Aronburg who though only a girl is a menace to them some way. Though I do not believe they fear me. I am not so dangerous to the enemy as you will observe my body guard is not so important."

"You are either bluffing or trying to flatter me," said Gertrude. "I believe there is no Christian general like you."

"Well as for that I can only depend on the ability of my officers and men," declared Jack Evans. "It's not my army of course for for it takes brains to frustrate the enemy's generals. Just now what I think I regret to say that the rebels may win or lose in the long run what is going to happen soon is that I'm going to get my rank changed."

"Oh do you mean you made a higher general?" asked Penrod.

"To be sure." Some of the generals are going to lose their command and the stay of some are permanent and in time will rise in rank. That is why I'm going to be promoted and I am selected to take the place of one of them who is going to be discharged."

"What division are you going to command?" inquired the boy.

"General James G. Scragan's division, besides my own."

Before they had started on the journey Violet and her sisters had packed their knapsacks with the things they might need, and therefore they carried their knapsack bags strapped to their backs. The little girls alone were disguised neither one alike as they knew they were better fitted for travel or for scouting tours that way than if they were alike. Penrod also had brought along his knapsack to which he had added some fruit. Jack Evans was a good and excellent cook and for them even that early night he cooked for them a fine vegetable soup and gave them all some cheese and the things they liked best and which was good for them. He strongly advised them all to lie down and get some sleep and as they did so he arranged the necessary cuts in their proper places which satisfied them very well. The two boys slept in the same tent as they removed no clothing whatever.

The next morning when breakfasting at three o'clock they talked together while they ate. During the conversation the girls explained again explained their quest for Manley's movements and asked the general's advice as to what to do about it. General Evans considered the matter very gravely.

"That's going to be a difficult and dangerous task," said he "for the enemy will have big bodies of troops out everywhere looking for Christian scouting parties. Therefore if I were you dear girls I'd take a mighty powerful escort so as to make it safer if not safe altogether."

"I fear that wouldn't do as to big a column out scouting would draw the enemy fire," replied Violet. "The scouting parties must be naturally small, not too small about a hundred thousand men say the least and the soldiers must be nothing else but Winkie Abyssinkilians for they are the fiercest fighters and if we do not take them along with us the plan might not work at all."

"Now many Winkie Abyssinkilian soldiers do you need, or want?" asked Jack Evans.

"About 10,000 Winkies," suggested Penrod.

"How about 20,000?" asked Radcliffe.

"Why that would be enough of course," answered Penrod who did not like to lose out in the conversation. "But maybe that's too small at that."

"I know," cried Gertrude. "Let's have just 110,000!"

"No that's wrong," interrupted Jennie Turner. "There are three kinds of fighting Abyssinkilians. I think one kind are Winkies, another are Dandobians and the last is 88!"

"Conventinians," said Evans.

"But I do not think we want the Conventinians," said Jennie.

"How about the Dandobians?" asked Evans.

"No the Winkies," persisted Penrod.

"How big a column, a column?"

"Well let's ask Violet to decide."

So they all asked her and she said:

"I do not know really how many men we do need but I'd like to bring exactly twenty thousand men with me. That's more than I suggested before I'm sure but to keep out of an argument I would rather let my sisters decide the number for themselves. But the thing that is bothering us now Jack is how to watch the movements of the foe and yet keep out of range of their longlines of gun batteries."

The general went outside his tent and gazed around the landscape especially in the direction of Manley's lines.

"Manley has very strong positions which he retains still despite his recent defeat, and also he has many scouting parties out, so you won't find any safe channels scouting on the enemy to day," he said. "You would have to go into the very heart of the enemy's territory when you'd face the rebel batteries of all kinds. Better take some good advice from me."

"And what is that?" they asked.

"Better allow me to accompany you also," replied Evans. "Some parts of Manley's army is in a position hard and difficult to find, and dangerous to approach, hardly scouting parties are able to find them. I've known all along that to scout you would literally have to enter the rebel lines."

"So I suspected," said Violet.

"But goodness gracious the enemy's territory is too full of unseen dangers!" declared General Evans. "I've never been in the insurgent lines yet myself but"

"I have," said Radcliffe. "I've faced the dreadful Shoanunians who certainly can shoot and I've faced the fierce and savage Mic-Hollastinkians who bend all their efforts and risk everything even their very lives to capture a fugitive even if it be a child, girl or boy, and often I've had a serious adventure with them."

"It's a very dangerous place of ground," remarked Jennie Turner soberly. "and if we go there to scout we are sure to have serious troubles. But I guess we will have to go if we want to find out general Manley's movements. But we must avoid the Gargoylian Kurds by all means."

So they now with Evans leading a strong scouting escort and having ordered some others to follow at different intervals resumed their travels heading now directly toward general Manley's lines, where every roadway, rocky glen passes and small woods was covered by hidden and destructive batteries and where rebel pickets, scouting parties, and snipers teamed. This advanced territory of the enemy was also so wild and secluded that to surprise Christian scouting parties, a many of the worse Glandolinians hid themselves. If any scouting parties did not come near these dangerous spots well and good, but if they did no one would come back to tell about it. The party that was about to invade Manley's domains was facing the chances of encountering great dangers indeed. It was a two hours journey from the Christian lines to the edge of the foe's territory, for no one dared ride too fast for fear of encountering a rebel spy column unexpectedly and they often stopped by the way side while soldiers went forward to see if the way side was clear.

After a few minutes they crossed over on some broad green fields strewn thickly with buttercups and daisies and when over a suspicious column moved into sight at a great distance which often happened Evans covered the party of brave children with his column so they would not suffer injury in case there was a squabble.

The column of rebels however who were those known as guttenlips disappeared or made no movement toward them and so far they escaped an engagement. Toward the drawn drawing of half an hour they reached a small sandy plain bordered by woods and where riding was difficult but at this moment there was not far off from them a noise like the very country splitting to pieces and a hundred trees rose into splintered fragments into the air and two big ones falling toward the party almost struck Violet and her sisters as they crashed with loud thunder to their ground. At the same time to their consternation some distance before them they saw under a big group of high popular and spruce trees a huge column of queerly and fantastically uniformed horsemen with peculiarly high hats and formed like those women wear armed with guns, pistols and long sabres, with many curious black dots on their long gray coats. Their horses were garbed much like the KK KKK has theirs and one of the men in front carried a large beautifully colored flag.

The Angelinian scouting party however being disguised rode bravely on but chanced changing the direction of their course to reach a more open space so in case of trouble they would have more room to repel the assault of these immense Snoodler and guttenlip squadrons.

looking carefully behind as a loud thundering crash sent the air aloft then followed by three other terrific bangs they looked carefully behind them and now noticed that the second and guttural tip men were also moving forward not swiftly but cautiously and the column appeared to grow larger and more imposing as they advanced and although there was a haze caused by the explosion of shells violet and her sisters thought they were black holes in the form of big Kettles turned upside down that is there was the reinforcing column having big black plumes adding to the queerness of their appearance. Fearing an overwhelming conflict against such a mass of odds the party headed toward a jumble of huge jagged rocks that lay scattered all about rising to a long slope behind them. Violet and her sisters preferred to attempt to scale this slope rather than meeting that suspicious looking column for they realized that if they fought them out in the open plain it would be the last hour for all that day. They were three sons of the fierce Zimmanians and they did not wish to dispute these sons of Glandelinians who are "HERVE" bent on, at least to fight them at a disadvantage for all the world.

The column was coming on at a roaring thundering gallop by this time or by the time they came to the rocks. Dozens of the fierce Zimmanians who were the nearest scattered with the purpose to surround the rocks, and another of the column moved off to intercept their escape to the slope, but a portion of Evans sawy with him at the lead was there first and held a secure position now mowing the assailants down by the score. The party of royal children, and the rest knelt behind the rocks after compelling their horses to go to the rear none of the rocks being as tall as they were.

As they did so there was a cloud of smoke rising in the far distance and then soldiers began appearing around the adventurers pouring a hotter fire upon the wildly charging rebel column. Another and another rolling smoke puffed along the horizon and round black objects came hurtling across the sky very much like baseballs hurled by a bat and just as a hundred soldiers were grouped around the children the air was shaken by a series of our splitting thunder crashes followed by the sound of something falling down at many places. It was abrupt.

By this time violet and her sisters discovered the Zimmanians were moving in two directions and they did not like the action of these Glandelinians a bit. Every one of them strange to say were that late of the fashions of little girls, either bobbed, long, curled, or pig tailed and had great pendant earrings.

Jennie's number began to matter something like "we're being shelled" but the others were too excited to pay any attention to her now. There was now a tremendous roar of rifles and pistols from the one flank whose column for a moment now became smoke wreathed and bullets hailed in a blizzard against the rocks. Penrod kept close to Radcliffe as the christian was a soldier dropped like flies and Radcliffe kept close to Jennie's number but the little girl turned to one of the Abyssinkilian officers and asked:

"What shall we do now? They are endeavoring to close us in like a cork closes a bottle. Full of water!"

All of the officers answered the question together declaring that it was safer to retreat up the slope than stand it out here and fight these fierce rebel soldiers.

"Glad you suggested that," said the girls solemnly. "But you also must be expected to cover our retreat for we have traveled almost all night and we do not wish to fall in our adventure now."

"Ah we never retreat," added the Abyssinkilian officer with a sneer. "It's against the lay law."

These remarks were greeted with loud shouts of laughter from the nears at of the Abyssinkilian soldiers and just then the rebel column were seen coming on at a charge. A shell exploded among the rocks and hurled the fragments high into the air and tossing the pieces over the heads of the adventurers. Another shell exploded closer and hurled debris all about them in a perfect cloud and thinking the shells were working havoc the Glandelinians with shouts and cries of glee and derision continued their wild gallop forward. Just then a monstrous shell, exploded like an eruption on the hill top and sent down an avalanche of rocks trees earth and everything upon the rear of the rocks making a perfect wall of debris.

As they charged on the Glandelinians however found the Abyssinkilian column a little stronger than they suspected but still believed it light enough to be tossed from their position like a soft cushion and they were enjoying the thought of easily beating the Abyssinkilians when Jack Evans angry and very indignant at of this attack upon his dearest friends ordered his column which was still mounted to charge and all the Abyssinkilians at once rushed with irresistible force upon the surprised insurgents and used their sabres with great energy and drove them back so far and with great loss, and held them back with a fierce withering fire until the children with their dismounted escort were well up side of the side of the hill. Perhaps they would not have accomplished this retreat so easily had not the big squadron of Abyssinkilians fought desperately to cover their retreat and dashed again and again at the forefront of the rebels to a fierce attack to prevent them retreating. The main body however the Glandelinians were so much surprised that after a fierce resistance and meeting the attack of the Fedaria which was delivered with much desperate energy that they were glad to flee from their counter attack.

As for the other section of the rebel column the Glandelinians had attempted to work their way around to Evans' rear but finding this impossible they then threw themselves forward to a flint attack to prevent them from reaching the main body under Evans. However the Glandelinians were so much surprised at being so suddenly counter attacked by the Abyssinkilians that they began a hasty retreat and disappeared in a moment in some dark recesses of the woods but their rifles roared with a series of crashes that sounded like many big branches of cannon crackers being exploded at a hundred paces or so.

The child adventurers soon found themselves alone, the Abyssinkilians having covered the force and violet asked in an anxious tone:

"Is any one of us hurt by the shells?"

"Not me," said her sisters. "The explosions have given us a good shaking up and shattered the rocks to mere bits. But we are in splendid condition and really are obliged to the Zimmanians for chasing us out of our shell swept positions."

"I feel much the same way," said Gertrude Angeline, "however their awful 'sh-r-a-a-a-a-a-p' like sound is a bit and almost drove out my courage. I felt like a sausage about to be cut by a knife. But the battle was a little rough and I hope the insurgents have had enough of it when Evans so suddenly interfered."

"Six pieces of the flying rocks hit me about the body," said Penrod "but they were so little they did not hurt me at all. But I did not like it nevertheless."

Just then the foremost column of the Abyssinkilians came into view and seeing that they were coming back, violet and her sisters looked at each other.

"Can it be possible that they are retreating?" asked violet reproachfully;

"Have they not got any pride in them at all?"

"If they have any such quality," replied Penrod they must have showed it already for the way things appear they have knocked all the courage out of the rebels. See, they are so close now and not a rebel in following them."

"So we are," declared the girls "that is if they are not going to return with reinforcements and resume the attack."

"It was just a little rough house fight that's all," said general Evans riding up. "but the question is girls, not if we fight the rebels further, but if we make a hasty retreat to so a more secluded spot. The foe will be reinforced and come back to besiege this hill and we can't shut up here for any length of time because our own provisions are small nor do we care to have them come out and force us into another conflict. My loss is slight however and the enemy having suffered heavily will come back to revenge it. So here's my proposition. Let's retreat to the woods by the big river yonder and leave Manley alone for a while until the excitement cools down."

"But you began the fight," declared Angeline.

"Well I ended it so we won't argue the matter. May we do as I suggested or do you wish to suffer the effects of a siege without water and provisions?"

"I'll tell you what we'll do," said violet "It is true we are short of rations and it may not last until to night. If we can only get back to the lines and you get us all into a proper diapir we'll not be as some of the rebel scouting parties and that will help us a good deal. We then can stay as near to Manley's lines as long as we wish and we can learn all we wish to know. What do you think? We also know what to do to avoid an accidental clash with National Cavalry by mistake."

"That's a bargain," cried the general's seniorly and he gave a queer signal that brought his column of soldiers into formation in a few minutes. When they were thus drawn up, violet climbed a high tree to see where the christian lines were situated but as there was a sort of fog probably the effects of the equable with the enemy she could see nothing in the distance.

But if the christian lines were not very far the royal children thought they could sleep in the branches of the trees all night and have the soldiers hidden and also watch out for the enemy, so violet climbed down and found her sisters waiting for her return.

"There's a sort of fog from the smoke caused by the battle and I can't see nothing at all," said she. "Come on up and see for yourself a yourselves."

At her advice her sisters then slipped climbed up the tree themselves. After them came the two boys who did not wish to sleep but preferred to keep on the watch. The branches were broad and strong enough and they found it quite safe providing no storm breaks out. They did not go up too far for if they happened to be attacked by a storm they may suffer a fatal fall. And the children being weary from being awake all the previous night and from their journey were soon fast asleep.

CHAPTER

THE ENGAGEMENTS WITH THE SCOUTING PARTIES, AND THE ENEMY.
THEY MEET A DISGUISED ANGOLINIAN S'Y, AND ENTER THE Foe LINES..

The boys however kept on the watch and talked in whispers all night long. The Abyssinkilian soldiers formed ambushes so if rebels attacked they would get the worse of it. However no rebels appeared in sight to disturb the travelers as had been feared and then toward morning the Abyssinkilians who were still hidden were aroused by shouts and saw a column of Angolinian troopers approaching with a battalion of bombobians.

They were an Angolinian scouting party and having seen the Abyssinkilians wished to make a junction with them. As they were all preparing to leave violet asked of the Angolinian officer;

"Can you tell us the easiest way to approach Manley's lines?"

"Never heard of such a thing," said the colonel looking at her and the others as if he thought they were insane. "I believe the whole force of you are either nutty or intending to commit suicide. We have roamed about for two weeks even sometimes in the night and tried the same thing but on account of the many rebel scouting parties we have never even seen Manley's lines or even a single tent."

"Is any portion of Manley's lines intrenched in those woods yonder?" asked General Evans.

"Yes sir, a part of the main portion sir. But you'd better not try to scout there sir. We went there once yesterday and four hundred of us were killed by shell fire and canister and grape from a hidden battery, and then attacked by a rebel trooper force," was the reply.

"What glandelinians are they?" asked Violet.

"Can't say. We have been told by our general to keep away hereafter even from the roads and all the other places and so we obey. I'm thinking the Christian lines is good enough for us and we would not be disturbed there. But if you mean to make the dare devil scouting tour we will have to make the junction with you in behalf of the Vivian Girl Princesses."

So off the whole column started taking a par path however that led away from the woods. They soon began to find it had hard riding for the path ways were quite rocky and the rocks were uneven and full of sharp points and edges and at times there was no path at all but fields of high grasses. Sometimes they had to dismount and lead their horses while clambering here and there among the grass hidden boulders but they kept steadily on gradually drawing nearer and nearer to the right of the woods near the river until finally they came to a great rift in the field of high grass where the woods seemed to have split into two fields and left high walls of grass on either side.

"Suppose we retrace our steps and go some other way," suggested Hettie. "It's much easier riding than walking and leading our force over this sea of grass and hidden stones and wreckage."

"How about that column over there?" asked Penrod.

"What column?" she inquired looking in the wrong direction.

The boy pointed to something in the distance which none of the others had noticed. Then Evans said;

"Look out for them for god's sake. They are the 'wheelers'.....:))

The girls eyed the old column in a moment and then one of them turned to Evans asking;

"What distance are they, and will they attack us here?"

Evans slowly shook his head. Then the girls looked at Penrod and the boy said;

"Only thing to do is to avoid them. Their fury would drive our force before it like the tornado does the corn."

This being quite true they started off in another direction. As they proceeded the grass became higher and higher. Presently they heard one of the soldiers cry out loudly;

"Beware the Gargoylian Kurdes. I fear they have seen us for they are moving forward. They look to be one million strong."

"Why as for that," remarked violet, "if they do advance there is no need to fear them as long as we can get to some secluded spot before they come. Whatever they happen to be I'd rather have them come on than remain over there even though they be a thousand million strong. The grass is high and dry and the wind is blowing from us to then you know."

"So I suspected," agreed Evans with a nod of his head. "I've got matches in my pocket."

"Still," said Gertrude reflectively; ";

"The Gargoylian Kurdes are running around the loop;

They think we ought to be a regular goop,

We may beware of them but we do not have the hoop,

And dare go where the devil fears to put his overgrown foot."

"For goodness sake are you not feeling a little strange right now?" violet asked her girl companion.

"Not queer, but this adventure will make it so," said Gertrude. "When I say those things I sure mean it for an insult to the enemy."

"I don't see why we should worry about the wheelers unless we were without matches," observed Radcliffe in a puzzled tone.

"Nor I," said all the girls at once.

"Never mind we'll find time enough to do that when the van guard of the big army of cavarly get near enough," replied Jennie Turner.....

As they continued on they soon came upon a narrow pathway which turned and twisted this way and that through the field of high grass and the path was so narrow that they were able to reach either rift of grass at the same time by strwt stretching out their arms. Jennie Turner had rode on ahead when suddenly violet uttered a sharp cry of surprise and fear for there had been the report of distant rifles and Jennie's horse was seen to sink to the ground throwing his little rider head long into the grass. She and her sisters were up to the spot in a moment and Jennie Turner arising looked at the horse which she saw was dead.

"Ah," said Gertrude who came up just then, "the foremost of the pursuers are firing at us. They are within our range."

Just then as Jennie mounted behind Gertrude the Angolinian column behind stopped so suddenly that almost all the Abyssinkilians behind were demoralized and some were dismounted.

"What's the matter now?" asked violet halting her horse and standing up in the stirrups and looking in the direction of the swiftly approaching enemy. But then she saw what it was that caused the sudden halt of the column and cried "OH" in a tone of great astonishment. Coming over the field at their left was a great column of Zimmermannian cavarly men at racing speed, all carrying long lances with beautiful standards fluttering from them. Violet shouted aloud to her cavarly men to retreat while they would remain behind to fire the grass.

"Very well," said the Angolinian commander with a sigh. "We'll retreat only a short distance though and if you are in trouble we will come back."

"It's too dangerous to make a retreat now," remarked Evans. "We will set fire to the grass at once. That will cover our retreat. If necessary I believe it will be better to run by those rebels as fast as our horses can go. The other column of glandelinians who are the wheelers are still a good distance off just now."

put the Zimmermannians were certainly coming at a furious gallop. Even the foremost column which moved around secretly suddenly appeared at the rear of the Abyssinkilian column and there was instantaneously such a clamor that the ground appeared to tremble and the trees to shiver. The noise was so sudden that the rest of the Angolinians halted in their headlong gallop and the Vivian girls noticed as they looked back that the Abyssinkilians and a portion of the wheeler column were in a dreadful turmoil.

The attack of the Gargoylian Kurdes was almost crushing at the first and the Winkies though fighting most savagely were being worsted though they cut their assailants down by hundreds. One officer among the Abyssinkilians who wore boots of pink leather with tassels on them and his hat decorated with an enormous feather as fully carefully curled was striving with great desperation to maintain his ground.

"Yo, ho," said the Angolinian commander in a deep bass voice. "The Winkies are being overcome."

"I think you are greatly mistaken," replied Evans. "There is no such as thing as they being worsted. They are only staggered by the first blow."

"But why stand here idle when we can do some important thing?" asked the colonel indignantly. "Those wheelers are cutting their way through the Abyssinkilian rear. But this is a good spot, a lonely spot to fight a foe with so I'm two to one of giving those rebels no quarter if we win."

"But do you believe that would do any good?" asked Gertrude.
"Nothing except make the situation worse for us," declared Joice. "I hope you will think different colonel for you appear more sensible than that."
"I'm not going to take any prisoners for my part," said the colonel stubbornly.
"And why not?"

"The rebels better keep out of my way," he answered with an ugly scowl.
"How heartless!" wailed the girls. "think what a disgrace it will bring upon us to permit a massacre of soldiers. See now the Abyssinkilians are pressing on. It looks like the rebels are licked. We may have to order our column into the battle but if we girls catch you permitting a massacre colonel I'm sure we will see to it that you are discharged from your command."

Evans was placing his own Abyssinkilians into formation to meet the other glandelinians whose hats were of black velvet and extended his lines so long that they made a barrier indeed. When he quickly extended the Angelinean column as far as they could be placed and then found the Zimmermannian column had halted to await the outcome of the squabble between the wheelers and the winkies. Evans then begged the children to go to the rear hoping to worse the foe before the main bodies of the wheelers came up.

"We are not afraid of a battle," they answered.

"Not afraid? Well I don't care about that," insisted Evans. "Why not do it any way?"

"Us?" they asked. "We are the Princesses of Abbieundia and its duty to serve our country to give the example to our men and we are staying right here come what may."

"Dear me how stubborn you royal children are," sighed Evans in a disappointed tone. "But if you are killed or hurt that disaster would surely reduce my courage and then there would be a fatal disaster to us all."

Penrod then begged his girl friends to keep a good distance from the rebels. Evans and his officers held a short conference.

"My idea," began the general, "is to make a dash upon the Glandelinian column or past them going on a full gallop."

"They would destroy us," said Joice.

"Well that could not be possible and their whole could not dash upon us at once it is too big. I'll go first with the Abyssinkilians. As soon as the rebels open the attack upon my column the rest of the troops can slip past the attackers with you girls get out of their reach and then we'll retreat and start the grass fire as you planned and we will all escape."

They decided to try this plan and the girls drew their weapons so as to protect themselves if necessary. They placed themselves in the center of the main Abyssinkilian column the two boys following just after the brave little girls with their weapons also ready. Their hearts beat a little faster than usual as they saw the the fiercely yelling squadrons of galloping rebel horsemen approaching the Angelineans under the colonel and moving swiftly forward. The color column protecting the brave children did as ordered. They retreated violet striking and throwing lighted matches everywhere. It turned out about the way just as Evans planned. A series of raging fires broke out, and rolling clouds of smoke swept toward the enemy. The flames sped on at an alarming rate spreading toward the enemy. The wicked glandelinians were quite astonished to see the squadron escorting the children retreating and the river of fire billowing toward them and halting in their mad dash they thrust their long rifles to their shoulders and opened a withering fire.

The crash of so many rifles at once stunned the fugitive children and they were horribly horrified to see a hundred or more of their escorts fall from their saddles and two scores of horses also sink to the ground. The children seized the reins of their own horses in a firm grip and without answering the fire like the Abyssinkilians did urged their horses on at full speed. In the next instant the Zimmermannians realized from the way the children were escaping that they had fired on the escort of the vivian girls but during the instant of further delay caused by the wild progress of the flames the vivian girls with their escort had slipped the main body of the rebels and now hoped they were out of range entirely for the best.

Uttering a tumultuous howl of rage the Zimmermannians let go another tremendous volley with their rifles and then slinging them over their shoulders drew their pistols and fired volley after volley until they were empty. So cleverly were the many shots aimed that the Abyssinkilian soldiers dropped like flies. A bullet struck Penrod's horse on the left side near the abdomen and the horse in plunging to the ground sent the boy tumbling head over heels and his horse tripped. Violets which fell also sent her sprawling upon the ground and turning a summersault summersault at the same time and for several times. All the survivors were so dazed by this disaster that it was a moment or two before they could rally the two children having scrambled to their feet. When they turned to look around the rebels were still firing heavily and they saw a portion had cleared the fire and that now the ferocious Zimmermannians were advancing toward them at a break neck speed and that Evans and his column was racing madly to intercept them. The glandelinian rifles crashed crashed with a most deafening roll and down was went the rest of the escort and the horz horses of all the children throwing them all in a heap. The glandelinians roared their yell so terribly that for a time the children were afraid they were upon them but Evans and his own column won the race and the shock of two trains crashing together could not be worse than this collision. Yet in an instant the glorious Angelinean column was broken to pieces by the pressure of the fierce rebel onset.

7-55

The whole column of Angelineans cavalry trembled and shook, and wavered the enemy shooting as fast as they could fire and reload, or fighting lance and sabre duels with the Angelineans. The center of Evans' column was hardest hit and they wavered as the main column of Zimmermannians rode up. Volley after volley crashed into the fast thinning line---it broke---a loud roar of cheers and cries and also of derision went up from the rebel squadrons and the wave of rebel horsemen rushed madly toward the hole in general Evans' line. He saw at a glance that his men would be trapped and despite the peril and in the midst of the dreadful and destructive fire that was opened upon him rushed to the head of the handful of horsemen and cried:

"The vivian girls are in peril. Don't give up. My Abyssinkilians will be here shortly so don't give up. They are coming like the wind."

A feeble cheer arose as they rallied around him. It was a terrific shock but they still held the gap in the line. Four horses had been shot under general Evans while the Angelinean troops hurried the insurgents back. The foremost of the Glandelinian column began a retreat having suffered terrible loss. Another horse was shot under Evans and he was thrown to the ground but was not injured. What a battle it was. Evans made for another horse, mounted it and dashed into the thickest of the fray again.

Every one of the rebel horsemen was now in retreat but so fierce was their receding fire that Evans was horseshorn again and a hundred men fell all about him and scores of horses as also. The Abyssinkilian column which had not been engaged yet now dashed up and moved the Zimmermannians down in big droves. All this while the children sat near their fallen horses and looked at the battle and then at one another in a rather bewildered way and then began to feel glad to see the rebels being worsted.

"We did it," exclaimed Penrod with satisfaction. "and now we are free to go on our way. The fire is helping to rout the insurgents and our escort will be back with us pretty soon. I hope however the main column of wheelers come up too strong. They are too strong to cope with successfully."

"Those Zimmermannians are very fierce and pugnacious," declared Gertrude Angeline. "their attack at first jarred Evans' column terribly. It is lucky Evans rallied them and just used such fine example for otherwise such a headlong rebel onset might have ripped his main column all to pieces."

"Allow me to apologize for the Zimmermannians," said Penrod raising Violet to her feet. "The Zimmermannians are strange Glandelinians to me but I fear from the rude manner in which they tried to annihilate us they are the worse of the rebels to my way of thinking."

Violet and her sisters laughed at this statement and Gertrude and Jennie smiled as if they understood the joke after which they all felt better, and seeing the bit big Federal column returning preparing to either resume the scouting tour or make a retreat for far in the distance doomed miles long lines of fierce wheeler horsemen looking on the scene of battle in abject astonishment and fury.

"Of course," said Jennie "when the survivors came nearer and the other girls rose to their feet."

"Of course what?" asked Catherine.

"Why it was lucky for us that general Evans intervened for if he had been five minutes later, and the rebels would have reached us when we were dismounted by their fire we---we---"

"Perhaps in that case we would not be living now now to talk about it," said Penrod gravely.

They must have had great courage to work their way through the burning grass field, and to ride past and over all the rocks and over the myriads of slain men and horses under fire from rebel lines in the distance to reach the waiting children for after abandoning the pursuit and after getting out of the path of the conflagration and out of reach of the main wheeler column which was slowly pursuing they encountered more difficult traveling Evans believing he could spare some of his men had sent them back to the Christian lines with the wounded that could have been brought back his loss having been much smaller than the enemy being six thousand in killed and four hundred in wounded while the enemy lost four thousand in killed and ten thousand in wounded. He was however compelled to allow the dead to be consumed by the flames as there was no time to bury them with the rebels in hot pursuit. So hard and difficult was the traveling under rifle and now shell fire that many of the soldiers had to dismount and chose the easiest paths and at the risk of being picked off by the score by the rapidly following enemy who was pressing them harder than ever. They also had to lead their horses forward, and they had to creep climb, and worn their way through the grass fields with utmost care so that after a whole day of such work under heavy fire that picked off scores of men and also being constantly under fire of deadly snipers, and rebel hidden hidden machine gun batteries that many then suffer heavy loss the survivors all found themselves very tired and their horses either wounded or jaded and many soldiers also suffering from wounds which compelled them all to try and make stands occasionally while soldiers had to shoot their wounded horses to put them out of misery. It was awful.

As they gazed in the direction of the woods looming up in the distance and where the grassy plain ended Penrod could not help giving a little groan as he said;

"Those are forbidding looking woods girls and with the enemy following hard behind us and constantly picking off our soldiers were are in grave danger indeed. I wish we could find out what Manley plans to do without so much fighting."

"And so much trouble and slaughter" added Radcliffe.

"Suppose" said Gertrude "all the rest of you, including the soldiers wait here and let me go into the woods and do some short distant spying for it is on account of the vivian girls that we are trying to find out what general Manley intends to do since his plans were discovered. Then if I don't find out anything important I'll come back and join you."

"No indeed" replied violet seriously while her sisters shook their heads with disapproval. "We must take the chances of going into those woods together with some of the escort for in that way we will be able to aid each other in case danger threatens. If you took the chances of going into those woods alone and it would hold a an ambush something might be serious y that would hang on to you Gertrude. You know it yourself that the rebels would give anything to lay their very hands on you."

So while the soldiers kept on the look out for the big bands of wheeler pursuers the rest of the whole column began to move toward the woods but with great caution and found it very difficult to get over so many rocks hidden by the tall grass, creeping over the big crags and so forth and above finding a path that wound in and out among the high sea of grass did not help matters much. Yet some parts of the pathway was quite smooth and easy to ride upon and as it led toward the woods although in almost a round about way they decided to follow it.

This pathway leading into the woods was also narrow.

"This pathway must also bring us to a portion of Manley's positions" said Jennie "murmer."

"How do you know?" asked Gertrude.

"Some of the Gemini Scouts told me about it," she replied.

"I did not hear them," replied Gertrude.

"No you were not with us then," explained Jennie. "But they told me that a portion of Manley's positions were in these woods to which he had been driven by the defeat of Mic-Hollester Johnston's army in the recent battle. That's why we will have to be mighty careful as we approach it."

They said in the midst of these woods "declared Penrod" "put of our so a portion may be placed as a big ambush also."

"Did they not observe what kind of Glandelinians they are?" Inquired the Vivian girls.

"No they only said there were many different sects divided into two sections, like two separate armies and that the Mic-Hollesterians and the dreadful Zimmermannians were the most important to be looked out for."

"Well if we are brave enough to work our way cautiously into their lines we'll find out all about general Manley's next movement," said Hettie "vivan." "But I have never heard the general mention this position so if it is really there it cannot be very important for us."

"Is those woods safe to enter without disguise?" asked Jennie "murmer."

"Of course it is not," answered Hettie. "Not if Manley's position is there. These woods is near Mic-Hollester's pen. When one comes to the southern edge of these woods there is nothing to be seen but plains, fields, meadows, and distant hills all occupied by his positions and encampment. Once Manley had scouting parties all around these woods, and probably still has by the looks of things but if we are careful none of the rebels will be able to see us while we would have the best chances of seeing them."

"If these woods are in possession of Manley's army why not all of us spy at different points at once and then we would know more about the intents intended movements of the Glandelinian generals?" Penrod asked.

"Why Manley's lines must be a fairy land the way you suggest things," said Violet looking at him in amazement.

"Why it's suicide" explained Angeline. "General Manley is said to be the most shrewd of all Glandelinian generals and has every where in his camp officers and men who are said to be the best disguise readers living, and lots of them are hidden in parts of even christian camps as well as their own so tucked away that not even the most expert Gemini never have seen them and yet wonder to this very day how they have so often been discovered. In general Picknells camp it is quite different and not quite so dangerous, but when you try to enter general Federals line you are sure to run into strange fascinating and exciting experiences that will surprise you. I know, and so do my sisters for we have traveled among the enemy's lines a good deal."

"Yes and so have I" admitted Gertrude A geline Angeline. "I've been considerable of a spy all this time and dangerous work as it is I like to explore the enemy lines at all costs. I find I learn more about what the enemy plan to do by spying than by scouting."

During this conversation they had been riding and at times walking along this narrow pathway the general and his soldiers following in single file and now found themselves well up near the gloomy looking woods. They could see no signs of foes around them now for the grass beside their path was higher than their heads in some places. At this point they could not see far in front of them for here the path made one of its sharp turns. But suddenly they stopped because the path ended and there was no place to go except through the high grass again. Ahead about fifty yards loomed the forest of poplar and pines and on the left of them was a gigantic squadron of White Abyssinian Cavalry I mean Glandelinian Cavalry that seemed to block their way completely.

"Those Glandelinians would not be there though if we did not want to go somewhere" said general Evans wrinkling his forehead in deep thought. "It's good we are all dismounted or they would see us and fight us also."

"The woods are somewhere are they not?" asked violet laughing at the bewildered looks of the others. They did not know whether they should dare proceed or not. They felt sure how sure however that the rebel horsemen did not see them.

The rebels are on guard, the fields are blocked,

Yet here we've innocently flocked,

And now we are even trapped, trapped,

For to us it's rather bedded,

Yet for us there surely is no opening that can be blocked."

"Please don't recite that piece Gertrude. With the enemy so near and rebel pursuers all around us it makes me nervous," said Penrod.

"Well" said Angeline "I'm glad we got this far anyhow for this is a dreadfully tiresome adventure."

"As she spoke she peered over the top of the grass and to her surprise she saw just where the pathway renewed itself again."

"Why here's where the path begins again," she exclaimed.

"So I see" answered Evans. "but the question is, do we still dare to go where the path leads?"

"It goes a straight ahead right into the woods" said Penrod peering in that direction. "Perhaps there's an easy way to get there and if there is it is sure to be safe in the end...."

"Why that's true enough" cried Jennie vivian with eagerness. "Let's go into the woods cause if it is as safe as it looks it will be pretty safe for us too."

The rest of the path way was smooth and as they started forward they were so startled by such a horrid noise in the distance that brave as they were they had had the greatest difficulty in overcoming their desire to abandon their plan and make a hasty retreat. But they only had halted for a moment and now started forward again. They went cautiously forward for a few minutes and then again they suddenly stopped.

"What was the peculiar pounding sound?" asked violet.

Violet looked over the grass. The whole swarm of rebel Cavalry was moving forward. This sight indeed was very disagreeable but the children kept on until somewhere in the distance a loud tapping sound startled them. They looked toward the direction of the noise feeling a great deal nervous.

"What were those strange white forms beyond?" asked Angeline.

The strange tapping sound continued. The children were really frightened this time at this combination of sights and sounds. They had hardly believed the rebels could see them but now they felt it was so and that they were being surrounded. Yet summoning up all their courage they had continued forward with their pistols drawn while the soldiers had their rifles at the ready. Having gone this far they felt determined not to back out now if they had to go through the infernal regions to accomplish their purpose. Penrod went forward to scout a little but he did not venture to go very far until he was sure everything was clear ahead. Then they went forward again, the line of soldiers slowly following. They had now come to the end of the grassy plain and Penrod who was far in advance looked toward or at a moving object in grayish white and whistled a signal to those behind but he did not venture out or attempt to expose himself until Redcliffe his aide-de-camp had bravely gone first. Penrod with his pistol drawn followed close on his heels and then the girls cautiously stopped forward, while the following soldiers were strictly on the alert. As soon as all of the brave children were out in the open they called to their horses which came up to them, and now they were no longer far from the woods. And the brightness of the moon day sun enabled them to see around them quite clearly. The pathway that led directly into the woods was wide enough for three of them to ride abreast. They could not see any more signs of scouting rebel parties, there were no enemies of any kind visible and this gave them a pleasant sensation. The pathway ran straight until it reached the woods and then made a bend toward the left and another sharp turn toward the right after which it went straight again. But there seemed to be no other pathway so at first they hesitated about entering the woods for fear of losing their way or entering an ambush. Telling Evans to remain behind with the troopers the children proceeded some distance and Penrod who was still far ahead began to signal frantically. The girls ran forward to see what was the matter and found a man sitting on the ground with his back against a tree and wearing clothing of the rich Mexican style. He had been nursing a badly injured arm before Penrod suddenly appeared and aroused him, for now as the girls arrived he rubbed his eyes and stared at them with all his might. There was something about this strange man that the most timid child would not object to and when he slowly rose to his feet they wondered who he was and what he was doing in the woods. He had a Mexican cartridge belt around his waist and had on his head a broad rimmed handkerchief decorated with a sombrero.

He stood as straight as a stick but as the girls approached he crossed himself several times and looked so frightened that Penrod laughed aloud. Even when they were disguised the girls were unusually beautiful unless changing their aspects by head and face disguises but this time they alone were not disguised at all wearing their usual lavender girl uniforms and they at this time had appeared so more dazzling in their beauty than ever before. Thus their appearance filled the strange man with a kind of superstitious supernatural fear and a overpowering love, and he did not know whether to run away or fall on his knees in adoration. However he was so awed and so fascinated that he did not love and as the children halted before him Violet asked:

"Will you surrender, or are you a friend?"

He asked this first in Mexican and then in English but the stranger to her surprise could not speak either tongue and shrugged his shoulders.

"Can you speak his language?" she asked Penrod and Penrod.

"Who man?" asked the boy.

"Yes you," said the little girl.

"Is he really a Mexican?" he inquired.

"Of course, he is dressed like one....."

"Well I'm not good at speaking Mexican but I'll try him in the Abbeinnian tongue which I believe is the proper thing to do. I like to do everything in a proper way for it saves me a lot of trouble."

"It certainly does," said Violet.

Penrod turned to the stranger and asked in the Abbeinnian tongue:

"Are you a Mexican?"

"Not me," answered the man. "I am I arrested?" he inquired.

"Of course you will be if you cannot prove who you are since you are found here within the enemy's lines," said the boy.

"Well," replied the man. "If I'm captured then I prefer being taken prisoner by your celestial beings than by the rebels. I hate the Glandelinian devils and for me they can go to perdition for all I care and all those who follow their cause. I'd rather go with you than face them unarmed again. The enemy say I cause Manley as much trouble as the famous Vivian girls but I'd be glad if I caused them ten times more trouble than they ever can do."

Violet and her sisters looked at each other and smiled.

"You look like they had it in for you," said Penrod noticing the man's bandaged arm and the condition of his uniform or clothing which was torn as if ribbed by a dozen wild cats. "Please tell us who you are."

"My name is Jettie Wilt. I'm a member of the Gemini and to prove it here's my Gemini Band, and also papers. I've been a fugitive from the enemy for a week and still tried to find out their intentions. A score of Glandelinian scouting parties are scouring the whole region for me. They are also after the Vivian girls whom they blame for my presence. I'm called 'Lightning Bolt.'"

"Lightning bolt?" the boy asked.

"Lightning bolt, the spy champion. I'm very clever and am a professional spy serving the Abbeinnian government and those ferocious rebels who are combing the region for me would give their very lives to effect either my capture or destruction. But it is the first time I ever saw children within the enemy's territory. I ask you for God's sake to get away before the rebels see you."

"Are you an Angolinian, or an Abbeinnian?" asked Violet herself.

"I'm from Abbesinkale. I'm a Conceitinnian and am from Dondobin City. But as I said before for God's sake look out. This is no place for little girls and two good boys like you. Manley's army is not far from here. Or are you girl and boy scouts, or are you fugitive child slaves?"

"I'm not sure of giving information until we are sure we can trust you," said Jennie with some hesitation. "Of course we are not afraid to tell you that we are not lost and neither are we child slaves, and we fear no one. Have you any other proofs as to your identification. We got to be as careful as timid mice you know."

"As I do not know you children I think for my own personal safety I must not as yet give out information either. I've been a fugitive however for more than a week, and had more shots fired at me than could fill a wagon and therefore I cannot take a chance as you wear the green and gray and not the purple. But of course you may threaten to, or say arrest me but I never heard any such thing as children making a man a prisoner except they be child scouts, or the Vivian girls, or even child scouts of the enemy, which you seem to be despite all your dazzling beauty. So you better go back to the shelter of your own lines before the Federal troops see you. If I was in condition I'd myself make you all prisoners and bring you before general Vivian."

"Where does general Jack on Manley live?" Penrod inquired as the girls were still smiling.

The man looked at the boy in great surprise.

"You'll find out if you go further in these woods. But if you are Federal girl and boy scouts really in disguise you can't pass through these woods just now and live because it's swarming with rebel soldiers looking for me and even the Vivian girls. I've heard all about it."

"That's too bad," said Gertrude. "Gertrude Angeline."

"What seems to be the trouble?" asked Hattie Vivian.

"Why should I tell you everything when I do not know you or who your children are?" demanded the man angrily fearing they were rebel child spies in disguise who were shadowing him. "Are you Glandelinian girl scouts deceiving us Angolinians with your beauty. You may deceive us but you cannot deceive God or His Blessed Mother and the Holy Saints in Heaven. Take me prisoner, or shoot me if you will yet I'll tell you nothing. And you also refused to give me information. In fact I've already told you what I am and betrayed it by my very speech when I should have kept my mouth shut."

"If you knew us you would not talk like that to us," said Jennie Turner.

"Does our uniforms show us to be rebel spies?" asked Angeline Vivian.

"And if you say so we'll take it as an insulting remark and not be friendly with you at all," said Jennie. Vivian her eyes flashing fire.

"And you are lacking in proper understanding and refuse to tell us who you are when already our very features and purple uniforms identify us," said Daisy. "We have a right for personal safety to keep a secret as well as you have. And you have been found in the foe's territory in strange foreign garb and it seems to be very suspicious to me."

The others nodded and Violet and Joice pouted.

"No I'm not suspicious, nor am I a rebel spy," declared the man. "I can prove that easily enough as I have proved the others. You may think I'm faking and have stolen those articles from a Gemini spy but I'm not. But if you are not foes then who are you beautiful children? If you tell me I'll tell you the reason I'm here. It's just the right thing for me to play safe too. We I see are both in the same game so why should I back out if you don't?"

"You don't need to find out who we are," argued the girl stubbornly. "You are in as strange a garb as we can think of and it is quite unnecessary for me to ask if you are a Mexican or not for that would spoil the argument with us and you. But how can you prove further that we can trust you? Whether you prove it or not we'll not take you prisoner as you fear but under no conditions will we reveal to you who we are as we are too far into the enemy lines already."

"I have very important papers given to me by the Daughters of His Majesty Emperor Vivian, or at least signed by them and no one else. But how can I prove it even now when they are not present?" exclaimed the man.

exclaimed

"Where is it?" asked Catherine.

"Why the one whose name is Jennie Francis Vivian told me not to let any one get them and so I guard them like I would money. I'll show them to you but to be agreeable to you I'll hold the papers in my hand as you read the contents and won't be the one who tries to take them from me. But probably as you may be rebel spies in disguise as Angolinians you may not believe me and say I stole these also."

"I don't agree with you on that," said Angeline Aronburg. "No one can send papers to you with the original signature but the Vivian girls. But tell me is there any way to get through these woods or through the rebel lines?" she asked as the man was unfolding the slip of papers.

"No Manley's lines occupy the central portions of the woods but all pathways leading in or out are heavily guarded by strong forces of Ickata and no one not even a soldier spy or scout can possibly get through. I tried that, taking a path from another point that leads straight toward Manley's headquarters and I met a disgraceful failure. That pathway is a long way around and so if you want to get home you'd better choose the safer way, and come to the Christian lines with me. Perhaps they'll bring you to Emperor Vivian's daughters and they'll give you the permission to go through the camp or they'll allow you to roam in peace. But I believe they'll be jealous of you because you are pretty, or that you are impersonating them. Terrible is the fate of those who impersonate them to spy on us Christians. I'll tell you," he added.

"Just the same we are going into the woods," said Violet, "I decided. Never mind looking at us that way. Mr. We are not mad. Neither are we intending to commit suicide or or neither are we lost or rebel scouts. Just lead us on to that path. Will you?" "You are on it now," he said, "but why do you wish to go there?"

Manley will think you are spies or mistake you for the Vivian girls. He has a heavy price on their heads."

"We might be spies at that," said Violet, "more decidedly. We trust you since you showed the pass paper. Please lead the way. Here's one of our guns to defend yourself with. We'll trust you with that also."

At first the women were dumfounded and looked at them as if he thought they were really crazy or desiring suicide, but as they looked so terribly determined and as there was something queer about their eyes which thrilled him to the marrow he decided to obey saying to himself, that the children must not be in their right minds or are really rebel scouts in disguise."

He moved so swiftly as he walked that the adventurers had to run to keep up with him so they demanded him to slow down. It was not long before the path suddenly came to an end and here they were now in the woods where trees grew so high that they appeared to reach to the very sky. It was indeed a magnificent forest, illuminated by the strong sunbeams so that thick though the foliage was everything in it could be plainly seen. The trees were of all kinds including great oaks, hundred foot poplars, birches, pines, and the like. (as on a spike) Far beyond was what appeared to be a small camp of large gray tents, about thirty altogether but not artistically shaped, or striped like the Angelinian tents were, and the woods appeared to be teeming with picket men on duty. The woods however had high tangled weeds of all kinds including high grass, and beautiful flowers. Violet climbed to the uppermost part of a high poplar tree and was astonished at what she saw from so high up. What had appeared like a small camp below was from her higher view a vast city of tents, hastily thrown up positions and all the appearance of a glandolinian encampment and battle positions. In the large spaces between the tents were many glandolinian soldiers all heavily armed and all appearing to move to and fro while others stood in large groups talking and smoking cigarettes or cigars and the like. Even officers were grouped about in places some smoking cigar cigarettes and all being in earnest excited conversation. Just as she descended and hid among the high brush with the rest she heard some one cry out loudly: "All hail Headwick. Whom have you pursued, and who is roaming about the woods spying on us. I saw some girl descend from a tree? Did you capture any one?"

"No one," replied some man in a gloomy voice as he crashed through the under brush. "I was going to take a shot at that girl in the tree but she is gone. That fool man scout or spy almost captured me. If he is one of those crazy Mexicans I don't see what he is doing with the Christian dogs. My men will be back in a few minutes and I'll detail more to scout these high woods and brush and grass turn them out of their hiding place if necessary."

"Then," said another, "he will go to the Abhisannian lines and report his discovery to general Vivian!"

"Maybe some of the Angelinians came to his rescue for they were great in numbers and there has been two desperate encounters with Christian scouting parties and our cavalry," said another.

"Well for my part there were no Christian dogs in sight," answered the man who had spoken before. "But we must at least find that gosh darn gutter-snipe of a girl."

"Well never mind the girl," said another one in a haughty tone. "We must look out for that spy. And Manley had a most important message for you to take to general Shoemannia immediately."

"Really?" asked the speaking speaker in joyous tones.

"Yes," said the one who appeared to be an officer. "He needs you to deliver it to Shoemannia."

At hearing this Violet and her sisters looked enraptured. They hoped the messenger would come into their hiding place. A number of gray-uniformed soldiers had joined the speakers by this time.

"If we fail to grab that messenger it will be a terrible thing," remarked Violet to Penrod who was nearest to her. "But we must see to it that he makes no outcry or some of us are sure to get shot. Those glandolinians are scoundrels and they are very ferocious looking...."

"Why do you intend to capture the messenger?" inquired the man in the Mexican garb.

"Because," answered Violet.

"Why attempt anything so seriously dangerous? Why you little girls will scream with fright when he comes."

"What makes you think that?" asked the little girl with a strange twinkle in her eyes.

"Because I know no children, except the Vivian girls would dare capture a desperate rebel messenger. He'd fight like the dinosaurs and shoot you or put a knife into you or something," he replied.

"Are you positively sure about that?" asked Joice.

"Yes," was the reply. "And yet he might not come our way."

"Oh then we'll have to try something more desperate," declared Gertrude Angeline.

"We'll enter general Manley's headquarters."

"No, no, no, no don't do that please. It's too dangerous for little girls and boys," said the man. "You should never suggest going at all into the enemy's lines if you can help it. The danger in this case is so great that it would be folly for the bravest man. I'd fear to enter here on account of the dangerous scoundrels. Only the Vivian girls would dare to enter general Manley's headquarters for such a risky purpose."

"What makes you believe that?" asked Angelina Aronburg looking at him seriously.

"Because they know how to be on their guard and they carry weapons," explained the man whispering not so loud this time as before. "When ever I plan to spy on Manley I choose night time because it is easier to slip past the guards. For in the dark it is much harder to be seen."

"Then we'll follow your advice and do it to night!" said the girls and Jennie Turner added, "Why not try it now?"

"Yes try it now, and it might cause a terrible experience for you, and unless you girls are mad you'll not even think of such a silly and suicidal thing," returned the soldier with a shudder. "I'll bet you are just boasting and if it comes to the point to do it you'll have heart failure. To enter Manley's headquarters makes an experience that is dangerous, and a dangerous experience is not a pleasant one."

"I see very cleverly," remarked Gertrude, "that you think we are just loving to hear ourselves talk. Of course we are not brave never were. But we are going to secure information nevertheless that will help general Vivian conquer or frustrate Manley, and if you will you can help us."

"Yes," whispered the girls in a chorus. "Will you and can you help us? The messenger does not appear and so he went some other way I suppose. So we must enter general Manley's headquarters and ask you to assist us. Please do. We will be greatly obliged and will love you immensely. It would please us very much." And by those exclamations the soldier knew that his speech had met with some favor.

"How far is it to Manley's headquarters?" Violet asked seeing the messenger really was not appearing.

"Why it's just the other side of the camp," he answered, and Penrod added: "Come with me a little way sir, and I'll show you how the camp looks."

So he followed the boy a short distance and as he went to what appeared to be a high picket fence fence near where the poplar tree up which Violet climbed stood. This camp or fence divided this section of the enemy camp from the boy and the man. The boy however was disappointed for the man could not climb any tree on account of his wounded arm. However the boy could see through a large knot hole in one of the wide boards of the fence and here he had a good close look at the rebel camp. Here the tents were of dull gray canvass shaped like large square houses plainly made of peculiar holding beside. But in extent the tent city was very large and imposing and here the company streets were thronged with numerous glandolinian soldiers who were either on drill or buying the selves in various ways. Looking through the knot hole in the fence Penrod watched the glandolinian soldiers who fortunately for him did not know they were being watched or that scouts were in their positions at all and found the rebels were very unusual and imposing in their uniforms. They wore coats long and broad like overcoats with large brass buttons in front three times bigger than silver dollars and their round black hats were worn in the style of women's hats had a black flume on the top that covered most of the hat. Their features did not appear very terrible for many of those scoundrels were very good looking and joyfully faced but they had a very wicked crafty and treacherous look in their eyes, and no wonder the bravest of children or soldiers feared them. As I said before their hats were as large and round as the big ones worn by young girls or women even like a little girl's straw hat and around the under rim were strange golden tassels. They were strong looking men all smoothly shaven but all wore bobbed hair, and big ear rings dangled from their ears. One who appeared to be an officer looked either like some goof or a mis-"

They carried long heavy looking rifles with bayonets of a foot in length attached, and had two brasses of pistols. Most of the Scoodlers were tanned and wore snowy white trousers, and black shoes and leggings. Penrod thought the most striking thing about the Scoodlers was their long coats which as I mentioned before were like long gray overcoats and banded with red yellow and blue around the edges and along the seams were the button holes were. Every one of them were smoking pipes, cigarettes, cigars and other things. None of the Scoodlers were aware of the presence of the boy and the man who watched the Glandelinians for a short time and then went back to where they had left the others. Penrod told them that to him it looked utterly impossible for any one to softly enter the rebel lines just now, and that it could not be done under any conditions anyhow.

"Can't we find no way to go through the camp camp to Manley's headquarters?" asked Catherine.

"Not just now unless we turn ourselves into little sparrows and fly over and into the window," answered the boy. "We will have to wait until it is dark."

"I think," said Gertrude that if I only had some good disguise and could pretend I'm a rebel scout I could talk with some of the Glandelinian officers and not knowing who I am they would probably tell me some thing important and then there would be no need of all of us entering."

"Can you really dare take such chances?" asked the man dressed like a Mexican.

"Not so well to my desire," replied the girl. "Do you suppose I could climb to the top of that fence without the rebels seeing me? It is high and they may not be looking this way."

"You can try it," said Jennie Turner. "But be careful. They are perhaps the worse Glandelinians in the army. But I would not care to undertake such an advent re adventure unless I'm tired of life. But I won't promise you we'll follow you unless you badly need us."

"No matter about that," returned the girl. "Just watch me make the attempt and you'll be satisfied."

So the girl moved toward the fence, balanced herself for a moment and then with all her strength made a spring for the top. Perhaps if Gertrude had been a trifle heavier she would have been able to reach the top easier but as it was, instead of grabbing the pickets she only landed frontward against the fence with a resounding crash as if she intended to break her way through the boards and she fell to the ground backwards. Had she landed face downward the girl would have seriously injured herself by the shock of the fall but she fell backwards instead and not being stunned hastily rose to her feet and hearing confused sounds on the other side of the fence made a quick dash for her hiding place.

"I hope you aren't injured," the girls whispered in a chorus and with an expression of alarm in their faces.

"Course not," said Jennie Turner "but her banging against the fence has aroused the rebels on the other side. They'll be on this side shortly. How can we avoid contact with them? Penrod if they see us from so high."

The boy shook his head.

"I cannot tell," he confessed. "If we can hold them off long enough to effect our escape to our escort it might be a good deal safer to fight it out with the Scoodlers for a few minutes."

"But they are terrible Glandelinian soldiers," said Jennie Turner nervously. "Any one that even tries to oppose them will meet destruction. I suppose it is because the fence is so high that it's so difficult to climb."

"We are lucky to have such a big fence separate us from the enemy," declared Joice Vivian. "But don't worry. Though the enemy soldiers or some of them looked over the top none of them are coming over so maybe they believe it's only a log rolled against the fence because you see there's a big one lying against it just near where Gertrude made so much banging noise."

"I know what to do," answered Penrod. "Here side-de-camp. Just lift me until I can lift the rouch the pickets with my hands. I'm much lighter than Gertrude or probably heavier and when I'm on top of the fence I'll pull off some fake information about the 'Christian dogs' that'll make the Scoodlers believe I am a boy of somekind on their side and they won't try to harm me. Then if anything goes wrong I'll first do some mad shooting at the rebels and then jump down to you."

"All right," said the Rattlesnake and when they both reached the fence he helped up his comrade and held him up until he grasped the pickets firmly with his hands. The boy must have been unusually strong for he made it easier and his sudden appearance on top of the high fence collected a crowd of Glandelinians at once to that part of the fence who at first leveled leveled guns at him and looked faw ferocious and dangerous. But seeing that he was only a stupid silly looking boy they believed he was an idiot and therefore only regarded him with astonishment and some curiosity. One of the Scoodlers who happened to be an officer so spoke to the boy in a very important manner.

"Who in the world are you boy?" he asked.

"I don't know," said the boy pounding on the fence with his heels just to add to his pretended silly manner.

"Don't know who you are? Well where in the world did you come from?"

"Why I climbed over the fence. Don't be so silly as Mr. Thore's no other place from which I could come," Penrod replied.

The officer climbed up himself and looked cautiously around over the other side but seeing no one climbed back down to the other side. Then the officer looked at the boy for fully five minutes in silence while a big crowd of fierce eyed Scoodlers and even Zimmermanians and Mic-pollestinians and Omarians gathered. The boy did not like the way the Omarians regarded him but he did not wince or even show any sign of fear or suspicion. To his idea of knowing the Omarians were the ones to be dreaded the most.

"You are not a National nor an Abie Abbieonian for your features are strikingly foreign. You are not very well educated either by the way you look. And boy I believe you are a mutt. And why don't you stop kicking the fence with your heels? You'll wear a hole in your heels."

"I like to hear the noise," answered the boy "but you must have visited the wise donkey in the Oz country the way you question me," added Penrod laughing in such a silly manner that the scoodlers and the others except the Omarians smiled with him in sympathy. "But that reminds me---general---captain--- On a One paperer -- or Count that I---"

"I'm Colonel Fullie."

"Of course full of flies I might have known it. But the reason I volpined over the fence to be here on top was that I could find those girls called the Vivian Princesses."

"What about the Vivian girls?" asked the officer with a scowl.

"They have had insulted us Glandelinians and I've heard that they are great spies and therefore you had better lookout for them," said Penrod "if you don't they'll probably come over here and conquer the whole Scoodler army."

The officer smiled as he heard this and though a Glandelinian the smile made his face look quite jolly. But the Omarians only regarded the boy sullenly and in his heart he strongly wished they would for god's sake go away and not look at him like an angle looks at his prey before grasping it. He did not trust the Omarians and did not see why he should.

"That's the joke about that," asked Penrod pretending to ignore the glare of the Omaria s Omarians.

"You said they would come over here and conquer us," said the Scoodler officer. "Why did you have such less understanding than we believed because being so stupid you don't know anything about us. Ha. Ha. Ha. You see the point don't you fellows. The seven Vivian girls come over here single handed and conquer us. Why if they were standing on their legs they would think their heads were under them and their feet in their pockets---Ha. Ha. Ha. Come over here and conquer us! My but that is a great joke. Why those stupid gutteral lips could not find their way to our camp. Why they would not have nerve enough to come to these woods for our some bear will catch them. And they could not sound couldn't see to find their way into these woods. You kid, must surely have less understanding than a boob in a nut house. Ha. ha. ha. Ho. Ho. Ho."

The Glandelinian officer wiped the tears of laughter from his eyes with his handkerchief and many of the other Glandelinian soldiers (except the Omarians) wiped their eyes too for they had laughed just as heartily as their officer at the absurd joke.

"We are not afraid of those Vivian girl Princesses---as long as our camp is well guarded," declared another rebel. "and we do not care at all how often they insult us. The joke will only be on them after all, and none else."

"Then," said Penrod. "do you defy them?"

"Exactly. And there is no need for us to fear them," returned the colonel.

"What are they anyway? Only mere girls."

"You may say and think that perhaps, but you'll apologize to them some day. You don't find them inside your lines to find out the intentions of your great generals do you?"

"They'll not get in even if we can help it," admitted the cock colonel sternly. "The question is, who are you boy that you know so much about those famous girl spies. Could you give us any information as to where they may be at at this very minute?"

"For why do you ask me?"

"Why are you here?" asked the colonel.

"For a good reason," answered the boy. "supposing we wait and talk about the Vivian Girl Princesses. Maybe you can tell me who they are. Maybe then I'll be unable to understand the joke about them better."

"All right," said the officer. "I'll do as you say if you are not too long."

"No I'm short, much shorter than you are, at least I'm very small while you are too big," said Penrod.

The other glandelinians roared with laughter when they heard this, and seemed to like the boy's jokes very much indeed. Penrod thought it very odd that the Scoodlers could be so easily amused when he heard how fierce and dangerous and ugly natured they are and therefore felt somewhat confident that there could be little harm in those soldiers who laughed so merrily, but still he did not like the way the Omarians and even some of the Zimmermannians and Mic-Hollistinians stared and glared at him and so searchingly as if they hated him and wanted to arrest him.

Penrod had intended to engage the glandelinians in this kind of a conversation while Violet and her sisters and their girl friends would have time enough to slip in through the rebel positions and get a chance to go into Manley's headquarters and so into Manley's room to find out his intentions.

"One girl," said Violet, "here is our chance to slip into the rebel lines while Penrod engages those glandelinians in conversation. If Radcliffe likes I'll introduce him to general Manley. We came this far to gain some information and we cannot back out now no matter how great the risk."

So as she cautiously led the way the rest accompanied her from tree to tree, but taking their time about the movements as so many glandelinian guards were around and keeping their searching eyes peeled everywhere. When over the time presented itself they would go to toward the high grass on the left their hands and knees and there fore reaching the high grass and wood squirmed through it and soon were into one of the company streets and appeared to be completely deserted. They knew they had to be careful because they had on their own uniforms and were not disguised at all. However the company streets were full of high grass and weeds for there had been no attempts on the parts of the glandelinian soldiers to remove the weeds or beautify the camp or even its surroundings and having noticed this condition the children were astonished when seeing no one about, and therefore they took the chance of peering into one of the tents. The tent was more handsome inside than outside. The very interior was extremely magnificent and the furniture was of very brilliant style. However no one was in inside. At this point Radcliffe saw the sunbeams striking the hair of his beautiful girl friends and noticed their dazzling brilliancy and beauty to and to him their hair seemed or was strangely exquisite, resembling translucent frosted gold, and from the sun beating upon their heads, there radiated a strange mysterious almost eerie soft light which sometimes almost dazzled his eyes.

Radcliffe being overawed and just to try and kill his peculiar peculiar fear as to what they intended to do now since they were so far in the rebel lines and no disguise on either.

CHAPTER.

THEY ENTER THE GLANDELINIAN GENERALS HEADQUARTERS BUT ARE BAFLED.
THEY PERSEVERE AND ESCAPE DOWN THE RIVER.
UNDER FIRE.

"THAT'S A HARD question to answer just now," declared Violet, "we are in and have to spend lots of time by being very careful and we must use great caution to accomplish our purpose and find out Manley's intentions as to his next move. It's a very precarious position we are in now and no one can tell what will happen next. But the enemy are in a precarious position too if they discover me or my sisters. You see all this high grass here!"

"Yes," answered the boy.

"And I have lots of matches with me!"

"Yes," answered the boy again.

"Well then you know what I mean."

"Yes I understand," said he winking. "If we are pursued or discovered up goes the whole camp and the forest too."

"Have you got plenty of nerve in that case since the fire may chase us too?" asked Gertrude of Radcliffe.

"Yes plenty of it," answered the boy. "More than I need. I've been in more forest fires than one and know how to pull through one without mishap."

"Well then, let's move," she answered advised while Jennie Warner looked at him with one of her bewitching smiles.

They now moved on cautiously forward. They noticed that all the tents in the encampment were all of the same color and very big just as large as the National had but of a blue gray color. They chose their way through the high grass in the center of the company streets hiding between a tent or two every time they saw soldiers, and working their way in and out of brushwood to make it as safe for themselves as possible. Many times they were almost upon pickets and guards and swarms of soldiers but they managed to keep low or hide and therefore they were not seen but so slow was their progress that it took them two hours to cover only the space of five hundred feet. Soon however outside of the high grass they saw to their left they saw a large house. Outside of the house was a swarm of soldiers many of them being Scoodlers and some of them Whimsies, Grolweywoogs and Zimmermannians and also the dreaded Omarians and whose uniforms made quite a show indeed. They thought however that the Scoodlers had uniforms had on much more beautiful or imposing than the others but they could not judge any of the Glandelinians by their appearance though they had handsomely decorated hats and looked more like persons going to a great dance than being soldiers. Yet to meet with these fierce looking Omarian soldiers was or would be quite a most uncomfortable experience as they were more wary and trusted no one within their lines whom they did not know. Violet and her sisters were more cautious now and for a long time remained concealed where they were keeping their eyes on these soldiers. Violet had an idea that she and her sisters had lives too precious for their Country to risk passing these Scoodlers and others while wearing purple uniforms especially in the day time, but still they were bound to enter Manley's headquarters and so decided to try and slip past these groups of glandelinians some how.

"Seems to me," said Radcliffe in a whisper, "it would be better to try to get past them in the dark and make a pretty safe adventure of it. I would rather be seen inside than out."

Radcliffe turned around to see if he they approved of his plan. They looked surprised but did not say anything. They then noticed a large group of fierce looking Zimmermannian officers approaching toward them. There were nineteen of them by actual count and uniformed as if they were nineteen worldly kings on their best dress parade. They were so neatly and handsomely uniformed and wore their hats which looked very much like English Shakoos a little cocked to one side. One of the officers to Violet and her sisters had a great resemblance to general Meldonia picknell but they could not make out for sure.

"These," said Radcliffe, "are those sweet Zimmermannians."

"I'm hoping Penrod is safe for he is of foreign nationality and that would increase his danger if the rebels found out his true intentions," declared Jennie Warner.

The nineteen Zimmermannian officers all approached to or quite close to their hiding place and after making a polite courtesy to each other separated one of them with picknell's face heading for the hiding place of the children. It was picknell and no mistake at that.

however the general suddenly turned and moved another way and a few minutes after came along another officer who had a face on him that would greatly put a person in mind of one of our "beautiful boys" we see on a farm.

"Where do you think you're heading Mr Hogface?" whispered Radcliffe to himself, and drawing his gun.

"Why not let's capture him and not shoot?" asked Jennie Turner seeing his gun in the boys hand.

"I will try but it is a dangerous move" replied Radcliffe and Violet and her sisters agreed with him.

"Aw let him go the poor fool, you't you know if we tried to seize him he'd raise a row and cause us to be captured." said Gertrude Angeline.

"No indeed" said Radcliffe stubbornly "He's running into our ambush and therefore it would be very improper to allow him to see us first and then escape to warn his comrades. These glandelinians are being brought up according to the rules of their high generals, laid down by general Manley who has given his wicked cause much study. Utmost caution is his great hobby and he claims if christians over surprise him one cannot expect his generals to do anything better. Here he comes. Got ready."

The glandelinian soldier walked right into the trap and would have yelled, but he did not when he observed who covered him.

"It is very impolite indeed to treat me like this you dirty christian dog" said the officer.

"Well it sometimes is and it sometimes ain't Mr Pus y Pussy Cat" replied the boy after Gertrude and Jennie Turner relieved the rebel of his pistols and cartridge belt. "but it just depends on who it just is. Sometimes you capture the christian dogs as you call us and sometimes we christian dogs capture you dirty skunks. And by capturing you Mr Pole Cat it puts us on the safe side. You understand. Once we get to a more secluded spot we'll let you loose but just now I'm going to use you as a decoy and make you get us an admission into Manleys headquarters. Refuse to do as I order, or betray us in any way and you'll die like a mad dog."

"You dirty christian dogs ought to be skinned alive for this" declared the glandelinian officer fiercely and would have said more on the subject but the faces of the girls looked so wild and threatening all of a sudden that he dared not say anything more.

"What's up with Manleys intentions?" asked violet.

However the prisoner smartingly told them that they either did not understand or must have forgotten that no glandelinian would give any information under any condition and he acted like a madman than like a prisoner. go to avoid any scene the Angeline soldier disguised like a Mexican first gave him a wallop on the jaw knocking him flat on his back, and then joice tried the prisoners hands behind his back as Radcliffe said in his fierce way.

"All right you insulting scoundrel. I'll leave you tied up to a tree where it will be very difficult for your comrades to find you. And you'll need witnesses to explain how you got tied up that way. I don't want to waste time arguing with you traitors for arguments cause me very hard feelings and I'm liable to shoot and explain matters afterwards."

So as the officer still refused to tell anything Radcliffe tied him to a tree and also gagged him. The rebel knew it was useless to make a struggle. They had just a second looked this job when looking in another direction they saw a group of child slaves both boys and girls facing them, and the rebel glaring angrily at them all.

They had witnessed the whole performance. One of the elder boys went up to Radcliffe and after looking the Vivian girls over very carefully as well as being astonished at their beauty he said:

"My good friends I wish to explain that what you did now was beyond what I or my friends here ever expected to see. You boy, and you his girl friends have on Angeline uniforms and are within Manleys or a portion of Manleys lines where he has his headquarters. As we are child slaves who need to be free more than any thing else we have a right to ask of you an important favor. Our masters are harsh to us and we wish to get away and be safe within the christian lines. We have observed what you did, so on account of your uniforms I know you are of the Nationals, probably a boy scout with either girl companions or those who are your nine pretty sisters. So when I said to my friends you would be able to help us they agreed to ask so to speak. I alone am not a slave but a scout but I cannot dare leave Manleys lines alone with these thirteen girls and fourteen boys. If you agree to do this favor for us we'll repay you sometime. go you understand?"

The adventures thought it over carefully. Then seeing that the girls agreed Radcliffe said:

"That is fair enough, but where does the favor come in, and what is your desire for us to do?"

Violet and her sisters laughed, for they could not help it although the two other girls and the boy were solemn enough

"I'll tell you what you can do" said Gertrude and took the strange boy scout away to a distance where the scowling rebel prisoner could not have the chance to overhear them.

"You must know" she explained "we are not ordinary scouts. The boy spoke to only us, and he is their chief. You saw Emperor Vivians daughters, and they are anxious to bring this war to an end, for things, and therefore they are in these rebel lines and what they are after is not a slight thing after all. It is true we are acting as spies and want to learn Manleys intentions. you stay with us help us and we'll send your friends to our escort on the rear seat!"

"True but if they are the Vivian Girl Princesses it seems they have no common sense retorted the boy almost angrily. "Don't you know you girls are courting with certain death, terrible destruction attempting this. Why don't you get the General to do this and not act so silly."

"Do you think so?" asked Gertrude.

"Yes and I know. I was foolish to do this also and if I'm discovered we with those slaves only god alone can save me then. Don't you know it is impossible to enter Manleys headquarters just now. If not you are not as wise as you look to me. I'm astonished almost to laughing myself sick to find such girls as you are in so dangerous a territory."

"Ah yes of course" she answered looking very wise. "but we won't need to do that if you can help us out. So I'll tell you what to do. If you yourself know of Manleys plans, which perhaps you do let us in on it, and you'll return with your child slaves you rescued under a powerful escort and will receive a handsome reward for your daring rescue."

The boy looked questioningly at the girl and blinked his eyes when he noticed how beautiful she was. He tried to think what it all meant but he could not figure it all out. He felt however he could be her best loving friend for life. He'd die before he'd desert her.

"What do you think of this proposition?" asked Gertrude with a smile.

"I think it is exceedingly dangerous to even think of this thing any more than we can help" he replied. "But I've heard much about the Vivian girls and therefore I'll do as you ask at any risk. I can realize the danger you are in and facing in doing this and therefore as you know I'm a scout also I am a not going to refuse you anything as you girls are too good for that. There will not be any need of entering Manleys headquarters. But my charges will have to submit to you as their guardian."

The boy went back to the others those he had rescued and when he told them of Gertrudes request and intention they readily agreed although they did not feel like risking it a bit. Yet they were much surprised in helping the Vivian Girls.

"That's a fine proposition and we are much pleased with it" said the boy speaking for them all. But please tell us what I am to do, and what you'll do for them?"

"Only you need do it" said violet. "I request it because you say you are a scout. That is if you can dare the risk to enter Manleys headquarters, you may accomplish it."

"Good" cried the boy scout with excitement in his voice and eyes plainly to be seen. "I'll disguise as one of these slaves who'll change clothes with me and I'll offer to scrub general Manleys room and by that means either find something or gain some way for you to make your way in."

The girls had a very difficult time or effort to keep from screaming with joy while the brave child slaves were directed toward their rear by Gertrude while the boy changed disguises or clothes and prepared to head toward Manleys headquarters to try his luck for the benefit of his friends while violet and her sisters drew the child slaves to a proper hiding place and then rejoined the three others and the Angeline soldier disguised as a Mexican.

"What about Penrod?" Gertrude asked of violet.

"One of us must go back and find him and have him return to us" said the Princess.

"We can somehow fool the rebels he is talking with somehow or other."

"Perhaps I can find a way" suggested Jennie Turner.

so she stealthily crept back toward the rear, while violet asked of one of the child slaves how when the boy rescued them they managed to elude the watchful eyes of their rebel masters. go some of the others did not know how to explain or were too awed by her presence to talk but one girl recovering her composure said:

"I'll tell you when you bring us out of these woods to your escort"

"Are you sure you will be?" asked violet. "we promised you faithfully but sometimes we would fail to get to our escort ourselves. We can be persuaded you know and be forced to take some other route."

while Jennie Turner was away looking for Penrod and the scout was nearing Manleys headquarters the child slaves overcoming their awed feelings gathered around violet and her sisters, for through them it was evident that they would be slaves no longer.

In a little way Jennie, or came back with Penrod explaining that he was creeping through the grass toward them when she found him and almost by mistake had a fight with him thinking he was a prowling rebel coming through the grass. As soon as he was with them the boy said:

"I feel much better since I had a talk with those Scoundlers. But I'm not stuck on those kind of Glandelinians known as the Ouarisians. They talk too much and question you too much. The Ouarisian officer after the Scoundler got through, wanted to know why I was in their lines, how I came to find my way there, why it was if I'm an idiot I can climb such high fences, and whether I was a Christian dog and such things. The Ouarisian wanted to hold me as a prisoner or for investigation but the Scoundler argued with him and finally the Ouarisians allowed me to proceed on my way. It was a narrow escape though. I believe that Ouarisian officer asked me a million questions."

Some of the child slaves began to laugh thinking this was only a joke Penrod said, but Penrod showing no emotion straightened out his coat and said:

"You may laugh but I'm not telling a joke. I was questioned by the Ouarisians. They are dangerous and also know too much." Then turning he said to Violet: "Do you think there is any chance of entering General Manley's headquarters?"

The whole batch of beautiful girls looked at him seriously.

"There's quite a chance of learning something even without going there if we don't want to," Violet said. "We were waiting for your return. I've got a sensation that our messenger will succeed." and she told him of the promise to the child scouts.

"Do so," he begged earnestly. "But maybe I've got a needle and thread in my knapsack and I can help him sew Manley up again. If the general fools the rebel chieftain then he better go out in his rage."

This caused Violet and her sisters to look at Penrod keenly while K Gertrude laughed and Jennie giggled.

While Penrod was explaining the words of his conversation with the Scoundlers the girls went forward a little to see if the way was still clear.

"Who is the rebel officer tied to the tree?" asked Penrod.

"Oh he just ripped his way out to our hiding place," Gertrude said.

"Oho!" cried the boys, "and he would not tell anything. That's bad for his four generals will give the fool an awful lashing. It was a good joke on the rascal. And it is by odds the best joke on a rebel officer yet. To be captured by children. So he walked right into the trap. So I did not have any idea we could have so fine a joke as all that."

"It was just wonderful how Radcliffe captured the rebel," Echoed the girls.

"How did you do it Radcliffe?" asked Penrod.

"I don't know," said the boy blushing. "It was perhaps because the girls helped in the attack the plan but I rather think it's our splendid intellect."

"If the scout does not succeed in his effort," the boy Penrod told the girls. "There will be a worse failure than any we have ever had yet."

Jennie Vivian had been in deep thought and now she asked Gertrude:

"Do you think there is a chance for the boy finding out the rebel generals' intentions?"

"None that I ever heard of," was the answer.

"Oh yes," said one of the child slaves confidentially who overheard Jennie's question. "There's a great chance."

"But he takes so long," said Angeline.

"Are you sure he'll succeed?" Catherine eagerly asked.

"Can't say. I've never suspected the boy of failing for I've known the boy for years. But we can find out."

So after a short conference they decided to take the chances to go forward to the rebel generals' headquarters and find out if it was possible the boy was succeeding.

"Still still," said one of the child slaves. "I prefer not to take the chances of being captured again, so we would like to stay here until you return."

Violet however sent Radcliffe and the disguised Angelinian soldier to bring the child slaves to the protection of their escort while they hurried away to investigate leaving the prisoner tied to the tree. Over being left this way his heart was raging with fury. Foiled in his attempt to get free and raise a hue and cry he vowed a terrible revenge.

"So they refused to cut me loose oh!" Well this war is not ended yet. I'll teach the seven Vixen Princesses and their followers that they are playing with fire. Little do they know our generals have in power and the power they can wield with the help of all their officers. I have their secret about spying in the generals' headquarters and if I only was loose now I'd learn those fools not to play loose and fast with Glandelinia's cause. A word to the general in chief and they will be captives before they think the sun is rising. I ain't the guy to be trifled with. They are however in no position to thwart our chief general's plans."

While the rebel was talking to himself the boy and girls had followed Radcliffe to the rear of the Glandelinian generals' headquarters far beyond the city of tents where there were a dozen round large fortresses or blockhouses. Radcliffe said:

"Here is the way when or where I entered when I first entered the building. Follow I and please step carefully and I'll lead you to his secret council place."

With his pistol drawn he entered by the back way the guard having been overpowered and after the boy Gertrude followed and then Jennie, and the Vivian Girls behind her entering last of all. A few steps beyond the open doorway in the cellar way it was totally dark.

"There is no danger of us losing the way in this cellar though," said the Rattlesnake. "For there is only one stairway to go up into the general's room or place. I've been in here before and I know every step of the way."

The ceiling of the cellar was just high enough to allow only the children to walk upright and if one of the soldiers had gone along with the party he would have been forced to bend his head to prevent his hitting the top.

The floor of the cellar was difficult to walk upon because there were thousands of articles strewn around on the floor and pretty soon Gertrude who had gone ahead and went half way up the steps slipped on a piece of soap and fell backwards. At once she crashed downward, and so quickly that when she came down to Jennie, she accidentally knocked her off her feet and sent her sprawling against Radcliffe who tripped up. Violet and Catherine at the very instant Catherine fell against a pile of large wooden boxes stacked against the wall which proved to be full of cans so that all went falling down in a regular avalanche upon the girls all hurling every one to the floor in a perfect confusion. They were unable to see what it was that fell because of the intense darkness. Fortunately no one was injured but one of the falling boxes in rebounding struck against a row of large tin dispensers hanging on the opposite wall and these came falling down together to the sweet tune of which could cause the worst deafening din and the longest. Ann A purring the crashing and banging there were startling cries above and a door above the steps flew open and several soldiers appeared in the door way.

"WHO'S THERE?" cried a loud voice.

"Now we are in for it," said Radcliffe, when they had all regained their feet.

"I will show you what to do in case we have to shoot it out with the rebels," said Penrod. "This is a trap for us now but if we keep together we will not be taken."

They all took post behind the fallen boxes and watched the soldier who was now descending the steps with a lighted candle in his hand.

"Be careful," said Radcliffe warningly. "He has got a light. No one else is following that Glandelinian soldier so we will capture the rebel."

"All right," replied Gertrude in a whisper. "Where is the pistol I had lost Radcliffe?" and realizing she had lost it in her hasty fall the boy handed her one of his which she grasped in her right hand. They were kneeling behind the boxes watching the cautious approach of the rebel carefully. He looked around when he saw every down everything down in such a pile and gazing around cautiously he approached slowly toward their hiding place.

"All right," said Radcliffe in a whisper. "Now we got the rascal."

They had the soldier covered in an instant, tied the rebel to a post, put a piece of cloth around his face so he would not be able to cry out and taking the candle out of his hand went up the steps cautiously with their own pistols at the ready. At this instant they had no exciting experience and they reached the general's hall way in safety and then felt very happy when they stood at the very doorway leading into the great general's private place and realized that the plans they were after and which they had traveled so far and risked so great a danger to secure would be in their own safe keeping.

"Now," whispered Violet as they with the help of the new scout found that no one had been there and that again they had failed to obtain any news and were again standing on the edge of the woods having left far behind the rebel positions entirely and were with the escort again without having been pursued at all. "I think we will have to find the shortest route or cut to the rear so we'll have the chance to watch the actions of the rebel forces which is said to be just beginning. The rebel forces I heard are not going to attack. They are beginning a general retreat."

"Do you think we have the chances?" asked General Evans.

"I don't know," she replied. "I suppose we can go back the way we had arrived to go up to the top of the highest rise of ground and then head for the great woods but that is like running around a big haystack is it not?"

"Yes indeed," said Gertrude Angeline. "What is the next thing to do to reach that hill?"

"Go by a short cut," answered Jennie Vivian.

"That however gives us the feeling that we are facing great peril all right; for the whole country is scourged by rebel scouting parties," Penrod said. "I think Jack does," said Catherine. "We ought to go by the right for it's safer and we will reach a hill in that direction that will enable us to see what we desire."

"Of course," replied Gertrude brightening at the suggestion. "Evans dear will do anything we ask him pertaining for and will grant greater favors for us even than the dearest friends. I also believe we can take a cross cut into or around the rebel territory and so get back into the Christian lines a day sooner than if we travel back the other way."

"I think so too," said Catherine. "But we will also have to keep to the right to avoid the rebel scouting parties."

They were obliged to go through a thick section of the woods before they could find any roadway that led the girls in the direction they wished to go but finally they observed a faint trail which they decided to follow.

Two or three hours of good and swift riding along this trail brought the brave little girl heroines and their big escorts out of the woods, and a clear level country confronted the whole party where there were a few far houses but they knew from the looks of things that they were still in the territory of the glandelinians because not so far away they could see large rebel positions and long lines of cannon and other works. Not that there were scouting parties close by here but that the rebel positions appeared about half a league away. This part of the rebel territory was less dangerous than that of the other sections if rather quieter and yet very lonely and yet the road was very distinct and easier for the whole escort and their brave beautiful leaders to follow.

But just as they were congratulating themselves upon the excellent progress they had effected there was a terrible thundering roar behind and glancing toward the rear they saw approaching as swiftly as the wind in a cyclone what appeared to be a whole division of glandelinian cavalry. The whole party with the force raced away as if the ardevils were racing forward and after a long run with the rebel cavalry about three hundred yards behind, they saw before their feet heavy what they felt sure was the great big Aronburgs river which at this point swept along between very high banks and here it appeared probable that their retreat was cut off, there being no escape whatever and there was no bridge of any sort to allow a crossing over the big river.

"This is dreadful," cried the girls looking at the river in disgust and violet added, "when we are hard pressed by these darn glandelinian traitors and think we will get away we are always stopped by a river whose current is too strong to cross by wading."

"It's just our luck," said Gertrude gazing earnestly into their faces. "The best thing we can do," declared Evans with his comical funny laugh is to hold the glandelinian cavalry at bay until we can find a way to get across for no one knows any better than I do what those Scoodlers and Gargoylians will do."

Said Gertrude (Angeline);

Every t hour I see this great big river, and the approach of the rebel gilder,
It gives all us girls an awful cold shiver,
The speed of the rebel squares,
I can never forget,
All this great big river, is very very wet;
so if the rebel soldiers get a good big soak it will to us girls and boys be a great big joke, but to wade the river the rebels or even us will never never try,
For the water is never very very dry."

"Try to control all of your poetry," said Penrod already laughing. "I believe your stirring adventures if affecting your brain. Not even us including the glandelinian soldiers intend to wade this river. It also has quick sand and we do not know at what place."

"No indeed," decided violet. "The best rebel or fellow in the water could not wade it at this point if they tried to save their lives. It's too wide a river and the current is so strong that it would pull us under."

The glandelinian cavalry has halted seeing I got ready to face and fight it," said Evans. "If there was only a pontoon bridge we could escape but I don't see any."

"Couldn't we start the appearance of a large raft while you and your cavalry hole the insurgents back?" suggested Radcliffe.

"There is nothing to create one of," answered joice.

"What in the world is that?" said Penrod again and they saw he was pointing along the bank of the river.

"Why there's hundreds of boats over there," cried Angeline. "I wonder why we didn't notice the boats before ourselves. Let's go and get the craft in readiness while Evans holds the rebel cavalry at bay. No we have a chance to cross the river while he covers our retreat."

About five hundred yards distant along the banks was a row of bir rowboats about one hundred and fifty six of the craft and as they were on their side of the river and they rode hurriedly toward the spot the rebels began to open fire which the two boys and girls returned shooting down as great a number of rebels as they ever did before to the consternation of the glandelinians who did not expect this for a party of beautiful girls. However the full force of the rebels fortunately still hesitated to attack the Christian cavalry for they feared the fury of the vindictive Abyssinkilians.

Two soldiers only beside the boy scout and the rescued child slaves followed the brave loyal children and their friends and one of the soldiers was a tall Conscientious man dressed in a well richly designed red uniform. This soldier's eyes were big and staring as he looked at the two beautiful girl friends of the vivian Princess Princesses but the other soldier was shy and peeked with awe at the vivian girls as he rode along with the party. The other one a joking soldier thought to have a little fun and being also a soldier who is very often too serious in his jokes rode up close to Penrod and said;

"Are you a born Angeli Angolinian little boy?"

"I cannot and cannot be allowed to tell what I should be in nationality," replied the boy. "It would cause the rebels to know and then I'd be in for it."

"I think you are foreign," said the soldier but I cannot be positive. If you will kindly tell us as to your intentions of being here I'll be very grateful. It's the duty of us Abyssinkilians to find out about it."

"Well you are doing the wrong thing then," said the boy, "and it is not the duty of boys or scouts to tell any person who he is without full request from the general! 88 general!"

"But I know you are a foreigner," protested the soldier, "and it is our duty to know why you are with us."

"Very great to know that," declared Penrod, "but is that any of your affair?"

"I have got a right to seek proper news have I not?" asked the soldier seriously. "I feel that there is no safety in you being with us because I cannot tell whether you are the right boy to be with us or not."

"You have no right to have any suspicions of any boy," Penrod retorted quietly. "Never you be so inquisitive about all that sir," said violet to the soldier curtly. "You go back to the rear where you belong and leave your crazy jokes to the other party."

They had then reached the boats after their adventure with the rebels who fired at the girls but none of the boats had oars.

"How can we cross the river in these boats without oars?" asked Daisy.

"I don't know," replied Hettie.

"Do you think we can create a pontoon of these boats?" asked Hettie of Radcliffe after a short time of silence.

"Never. The rebels would prevent us creating the raft or pontoon."

"Couldn't a hundred soldiers start a pontoon bridge in a hurry, while Evans holds off the rebel cavalry?"

"Probably but the rebels would not give us a chance to cross it," declared Radcliffe.

"They would bring up their artillery and blow the bridge up with us to boot. We could not succeed that way."

"Don't you think so?"

"Not to you the know ledge of this lad," said the boy shrugging his shoulders. They were all terribly surprised to hear this and the boy added;

"This is a very large river, one of the largest rivers in the world, and the current is terribly strong. I know how to create or construct a large pontoon bridge for I've seen it done since the war began but I don't believe it can be done here because I believe also the current would hinder us. And I feel afraid that we'll never be able to cross over. It would take us too far off the route to the Christian lines any how."

"That is queer," said Gertrude Angeline Angeline. "I see the rebel soldiers are falling back. Don't you suppose we can retrace our steps?"

"The boy only shook his head."

"Nor go back the way we entered the rebel lines?"

"No indeed Gertrude."

"Where shall we go to then?" asked all the girls.

"Yes that is the question," said Penrod. "You know the foe will bring up his artillery and shell us if he has the chance."

"But we have to do it or leave ourselves in the ditch," said all the girls again.

"We have to continue on our way," answered the boy pointing with one hand. "we are anyway still in the rebel's territory which I believe is under general Faddoral who they say is a dangerous general because there is a whole lot said about that rascal and he is said to be a Glandelinian general who cannot be licked." and that way pointing with the other hand "if we go that way we will enter the region where the worst of Glandelinians dwell."

The 4 girls looked at the water before their view. "The current of this river flows toward and past general Faddoral's positions," said Penrod but if we took the chance to cross the raft or a pontoon bridge the whole force of us could get across in not less than an hour than it takes the whole Division and we got to get across quickly and yet by the raft we can go across easier than we could row across."

"That is perfectly true," agreed the girls and then they all looked thoughtful and wondered what could be done.

"Why I can't be at general Evans to direct the construction of the raft," asked Radcliffe.

"Will you go and call his troop over here?" inquiredaisy of Penrod. The boy shook his head.

"I feel terribly afraid to leave you little girls alone," he said. "All the boy scouts say Federal soldiers are terribly dangerous worse of all the wicked Glandelinians and those boys are always truthful. I hate to leave you girls here to face much danger alone, and to leave you here like that would be fully deserting you."

"I can give you the best favor," said Violet. "We then are responsible. And when you return we will each give you a good kiss."

"No," said Penrod stubbornly. "I don't care to leave you here and then be away when a bad accident happens and not share the danger with you. If you girls follow after together which I like you to do best of all I will do what you ask of me."

"Why we are able to care care to take care of ourselves," declared Jennie very interested and surprised of his fear of abandoning her and her sisters. "We will be here safe when you return then we'll give you those kisses we told you about. It's such a dear good boy you are."

"Nothing doing," persisted the boy.

"We will give you better things also if you'll do that for us," begged Nettie eagerly. "They are a good deal of good things which you would be very fond of. I and also the others have never fear being alone you know even though rebel scouting parties are scouring the region everywhere. What do you say to our offer Penrod dear?"

"I'll do it if all of you will follow," decided Penrod. "I'll go and call the general, but I want you to follow after like good girls."

Seeing that his faithfulness was stronger than they thought the girls decided to obey his will and so off they all started. Evans set all the soldiers at work at once chopping fallen trees into great logs of equal length. The soldiers had plenty of rope to be bind these logs together so that they were soon a large bundle of rafts of good size and others found strips of wood or strong and long branches and nailed all these along the tops of the logs to render the rafts strong and solid. Even the two boys and all the girls helped roll the logs together and carry the strips of wood but it took so long to construct the rafts that evening was fast approaching when as they were finished and with evening the rebel snipers began to pop-pop-pop-pop their rifles at all of the children as well as trying to pick off the soldiers. These snipers proved to be very dangerous, perhaps because the Vivian girls were still within the rebel lines.

When they found the Abyssinkilians had created the rafts and seized all of the boats, and the long logs they wanted for their fires in the positions and that their fusillades of shots were not taking any effects whatever while the Abyssinkilians picked the rebel snipers off by scores they were furious.

The Abyssinkilians wanted to charge and attack the rebels to drive these Glandelinians out of the woods and clear the region of the rebels but the Vivian girls talked to the officers warning the soldiers also of traps. These warnings appeased the Nationals and soon they were very cautious and opened a heavy fire upon the rebel snipers. This contest lasted for several hours and one Abyssinkilian soldier who was wounded groaned a good deal, saying that a bullet had entered his shoulder, but Violet gave him injury careful tending which relieved the poor fellow.

Violet and her sisters were indeed surprised at the loyalty of Penrod and they told the boyscout that when they returned back to the Christian lines they would repay the boy in all their power. This thrilled the boy and he was therefore a little better in his loving ways to the girls than ever before.

When he had first laid his eyes on Violet and her sisters he had been quite shy of the beautiful girls altogether, and still was when he first observed the girls he had thought they were colonial being and had not known hardly what to say for fear that they would disappear like spirits. Their beautiful beauty dazzled the boy and it was hard for the lad to refrain in his desires to take the beauties in his bosom to his breast when he first knew the girls but he had been so shy that afraid of offending the Vivian Girls Princesses he had decided to win Violet and her sisters to his heart gradually.

Despite all the efforts of the hidden rebel snipers to prevent all their efforts on constructing the rafts they all finished and succeeded to push the series of big rafts into the water close to the shore, and loaded their horses upon the rafts first. The boats that were still not used were attached to the rafts being tied by ropes. While they got onto the rafts three or four of the soldiers had to hold the log rafts fast while the rest took their places and the flow of the strong river current was so swift and powerful that it nearly tore the rafts loose and out of the hands of the soldiers grasping by the ropes. As soon as all the soldiers were on the rafts the purple coats who held the rafts let go and were soon on also and away they floated. And the adventures had begun their voyage toward Picknell's lines. The pursuing and wildly firing rebels were out of sight in a few seconds even before the Abyssinkilians had a chance to fire a volley of shots at the rebels for a parting salute and Gertrude Angeline said in a pleased tone:

"It won't take us long to reach our destination at this rate. All we need to do is steer with our poles."

They had floated for three leagues down the big river and were enjoying the ride when in the direction of the shore there was a flash like sheet lightning, a loud report and whatever struck hit one of the rafts and a instantly wrecked it killing three of the horses and plunging all the rest into the swift waters of the river. The other rafts at this slowly slowed up, stopped stopped short, and the rear one began to return the way it had first headed for out as the soldiers who had the poles began to biddle and a push the raft in the wrong direction in their fierce consternation.

"Why what's wrong now? Where that that where did that shot hit?" asked Violet in her excited terror but they were all just as astounded and astonished and frightened as she was and at first no one could answer the question. In another second however they realized the truth, that the rafts had floated down within range of a hidden or concealed rebel big gun battery on shore. Thirty of the soldiers were for reversing the direction of the rafts but there were now countless lights glimmering on the opposite shore also and there were great searchlights flashing their broad shafts of light over the water.

They all began to recognize the situation they were in, and as they bravely continued on their way they approached within sight of a gigantic rebel position glaring with thousands of little fires and by their glare the adventures could see and drove of rebel soldiers standing on the river banks and firing blindly with their rifles.

"How do you do you Christian dogs. Glad to see you again," cried one of the rebels whose rifle flashed six shots in quick succession. "We forgot to tell you that hundreds of boats are pursuing you and will have you surrounded in half an hour. How do you like to hear that?"

"No one and answered the Glandelinian for those with the poles were causing the rafts to sweep past the fires and they were also floating out of their rifle range anyhow.

First the adventures thought it safer to direct the rafts toward the land on the opposite shore but the shore was lined up with rebels to and to effect a landing there could be as good as suicide just now. The rebel soldiers had no boats just now only long poles to guide the rafts with, and for safety sake they kept the rafts in the center of the river and fortunately they were held fast in that position by the strong current. So they all sat still and waited, and even while they wondered what should be done to outwit the Glandelinians when another of the rafts was struck squarely in the center by a shell whose explosion shattered it to pieces and killed or drowned all the soldiers and horses on it, cutting the whole platoon up horribly.

CHAPTER.

THE STRANGE DISAPPEARANCE OF EVANS'S CAVALRY.....

AGAIN all the other rafts slowed down, and then stooped and sped, and then the poles or soldiers who had the poles began pushing the other way in panic and confusion and directed the rafts in the direction they should not go. The water suddenly arose in perfect eruptions about the rafts and the roar of the cannons on shore was stunning. After a few seconds there roared another horrid bombardment while the rebels on shore shouted:

"Good shots boys. You've struck another raft and tore it asunder. And to see you do it again. I expect you to annihilate all of the Christian dogs and we will capture those to try to make ashore."

The third raft indeed had been torn asunder and all but one soldier on it had been killed.

"This is pretty hard luck indeed," said Penrod in a discouraged voice. "The rebel gunners are good shots it appears and here we're under shell fire without even the slightest chance to fire back. We will have to try another way to get ashore or perish out here in the river. If we have to when we land we'll fight our way to freedom free ourselves."

"We are running into greater danger than we want to said the girl heroines.

"And I guess the best thing to do," added Joyce is to start a hasty retreat before those batteries destroy all of us."

"Can you make Penrod?" asked Violet.

"Yes I believe I can say that a boylike I should be is like a fish in the water but I do not think I can make in such a current as this river has."

"I can, and so can all of us girls if so forced to. Gertrude and Jennie too are good for anything in water but that won't help us with that large force of rebel troops of insurgents on both shores."

"I don't know whether we could wade across with this current going against us or not," said Gertrude "but if we had to wade for it, we could follow the current down the river. You know it is not so awfully deep. It's only the current we do not like."

"It would be dangerous to try it, for the current would surely pull us under the water, or if we succeeded, we would be shot and killed while wading," said the other girl.

Indeed there was no way, a just now out of their awful difficulties and being helped helpless and dreading their threatening fate they just sat still. Penrod who was sitting on the front of the raft the yorel children were on, looked over into the water and thought he saw large fishes or other water creatures swimming through and about the water at an awful rate. It was now growing darker and he noticed one of the boats and using the loose end of the rope to which the boat had been fastened and taking a fish hook out of his pocket he tied it to the end of the line.

Having baited the hook with a piece of bread which he broke off his loaf he dropped the line into the water and instantly it was seized by one of the great fishes. They knew it was a perch but it was a great fish nevertheless because it suddenly pulled so hard on the line that it dragged the raft with the speed of a race boat even a hundred or even a thousand feet faster than the current of the river had carried it. At first the great fish was frightened but nevertheless it proved to be a strong creature and as the other end of the rope was bound around the logs he could not get away even though he tried desperately to do so, and as he gradually swallowed the hook at the first bite he could not get ride of that either.

The rebels on shore opened a fierce and general fire with their rifles when they observed the speedy raft, and even the cannons roared and thundered in perfect salvoes and shells crashed in the sky with ear-splitting thunders and water sprouted all about but soon they had gone down the river beyond their range the fish still pulling the raft full speed in its wild efforts to escape. However the fish was soon slowing down. Yet it did not stop, the fish continuing to pull the raft in the direction it had been going.

Gently, inch, by inch, they floated on the big fish tugging, and tugging, and keeping the raft going. At the point they reached now the current had slowed down the river here being broadened and only a little over two feet deep. The fish however did not give up but held the raft bravely on its course till at last it was even evident they were far beyond the rebel guns. But now the captive fish, having been injured by the one rebel rifle shot found its strength failing.

"I hope he won't give up too soon," said Penrod anxiously. "If the fish can hold out until we get past the rebel lines we'll be all right."

But the fish did not even think of giving up. Seeking a refuge the fish began to drag the raft toward the shore where dark groups were observed to be appearing. As they did not wish to land on the shore for fear of encountering the rebels in hidden places the boy finally cut the rope with his pocket knife and sent the fish free just in the right season to prevent the big raft running aground.

A little later a large force of plantations again appeared on the shore and the children lay flat on the raft and by this effort succeeded in holding the rebels at bay by well directed shots, while Penrod after difficulty seized the pole and this enabled the raft to hold fast and prevent it advancing forward to be carried toward the yelling firing plantations who were now shooting like fury on shore their hundreds of rifle shots looking like fast lightning flashes.

While this shooting was going on without any lull Penrod saw a dark object in the water swiftly creeping toward the raft with swift strokes, so fearing it was one of the rebels a approaching he seized the pole to use it as a club.

Who ever was wading toward the raft however to the boy's surprise was a very dark uniform or coat. Yet as glances plantations would usually wear purple he had his pole ready in case it was a foe. He waited until the wader was close by when just to see what he would do he forced the raft to continue its journey. In spite of those pauses the children were now on good progress and having found a way to outwit those tempestuous plantations their spirits arose considerably though they wondered exceedingly what had gone on with the others on the rafts they had left far behind and where Evans was now. They could see little of the country through which they were passing because of the intense darkness of the night yet they could see lights of great fires, could see great throngs of rebel soldiers on the tops of the high banks trying to shoot at every one on the raft and yet they could see no bolts or other pursuing craft upon the surface of the water. Once again Penrod saw the soldier wading toward the raft but now even the others saw the object also and were all on guard and Penrod directly directed his pole desperately to push the raft toward a big rock which was visible above the water. He believed the big rock pile would prevent the raft being seen by the soldier wading toward the raft in the water but it did not.

They saw the soldier reverse his direction and again wade toward the raft and again they allowed the raft to drift on. If the soldier did not wear what appeared to be a purple coat Penrod would have smitten the soldier with the pole already. They were surprised because he was so persistent in his efforts to reach the raft and they wondered exceedingly who he was. And they were uncertain whether he was a friend or a foe. They allowed the raft now to float down without using the pole and already and instantly they saw a high bank of water rise high into the air about twenty hundred yards ahead of their raft and extend clear across the river like a big volcanic eruption. It was followed by a queer ghostly lurid flash and then there was a noise like heavy bounding underneath the water and the eruption in breaking like a thundering water-spout water-spout drenched the raft and all on it even at that great distance all being drenched with torrents of water and the raft plunged deep into the trough of the powerful wave following the terrible eruption and they were nearly swept off by the rolling surges that succeeded the others.

Again however the raft righted itself and drifted on though the two boys laughed at the ducking they had so suddenly received. Yet the others were terribly dis-frightened and confused for they knew it was a high explosive that had burst in the water. At first they were totally afraid to allow the raft to continue on for fear of striking one but the powerful current of the river continued to sweep the raft steadily onward. At this point the banks of the river appeared lower, for all owing the girls to see all of the glowing fires and presently they saw a group of strange long objects approaching toward the raft in the water while to their rear they saw the water was only a few feet away to the rear of the raft of which evidence they knew know he was really going to get on. Penrod confused and desperate directed a terrific swing with the pole, but he struck too far and did not hit and the soldier grasped it and in the few seconds desperate struggle pulled the boy into the water the pole flying out of his hand and accidentally struck three of the Vivian girls right in the face but not hard enough to injure the girls though they felt the blow nevertheless.

Aroused by this the girls rushed to the end of the raft and threatened to shoot the soldier who let go of Penrod and retreated to a safe distance and the boy securing the pole waded after the soldier a few paces endeavoring to wallop the creature but failing waded again to the raft and then a few seconds later back to the object he went to the water and for a whole half hour they saw the boy or the soldier in the water doing nothing and then seeing the boy approach again and were surprised to hear him say:-

"It's all right Evans. We'll let you on the raft. I thought you was a Rebel trying to get at us. It's all right girls. It is our friend Evans and not a plantation soldier as I thought."

They were both shocked and surprised when they heard this but cooling the dark object now approaching unresisted they hurried helped the general to get on and then without asking any questions just now why he was alone and what had happened to his cavalry force Violet asked Penrod:

"Do you think we ought to effect a landing on the opposite shore. I don't like these long approaching objects."

"We will have to pretty soon," he replied. "It looks to me as if it looks by the scenery that we are passing general goodheads positions and I believe those black objects are long river boats loaded with glandelinian soldiers trying to cut us off before we escape. We are in the southern part of glandelinian territory and so the end of his positions cannot be any too great distance away."

Fearing that the pursuing rebels would intercept the raft before they reached the opposite shore Penrod told the girls to lie down and try to sink the nearest boats, and they decided to try it. The two boys at the risk of being shot stood up to get a good view of the approaching black objects and then seeing an action as if those on the boats were going to shoot fell flat to avoid the bullet blizzard that was sure to follow. The girls returned the fire on the nearest object, for a long space of seconds nothing happened but finally the boy cried excitedly:

"There she goes. There she goes."

"Which one is sinking?" asked the girls.

"The fore boat. I can see its occupants are in confusion and a lot of the rebels are in the water. The also the others are also quite near but the way the survivors are acting we had better direct our raft to the opposite land as quickly as we can."

Just as he spoke there were cries of "TREASON!" from a rising out of the other boats followed by a series of blinding crashes and then there was a rolling crash of rifles that filled the air with a sound without question a roar of echoes. Bullets about and above the raft whined and screamed but fortunately no one of the children were hurt. Penrod began to urge the raft toward the opposite shore using the pole while lying down but now the score of boats approached with a aston astonishing speed, there was a chug-chug-chug-chug--sound as of engines running and a again their occupants opened fire. Penrod however urged the raft to shore with all the speed it could go while the girls fired incessantly and frantically trying to sink all of the boats. Six soldiers toppled over into the water but none of the boats sank. At this point the current was quite sluggish and the river doubly wider but not at all deep. Yet after a short but desperate race and just as the first boat caught up with the raft they finally reached the lowest portion of the opposite banks and landed safely after shouting it out with those in the boat with the loss only to the rebels. The glaring clusters of the countless distant fires caused quite a fantastic if not beautiful scene and on account of a stronger light from caused by a big fire they could see afar across the field a ruddy ruddy sheen of a bigger fire yet. Escaping their pursuers by high grass and the like and with lighter hearts they hurried on, not one of the party of girls questioning Evans why it happened that he was alone and what had happened to his cavalry of Abyssinians. They feared however they had been destroyed on the raft in the face of the terrible gun fire of which the girls alone had escaped by the effort of the great fish. They also wondered if he had been separated or not, thinking they could reach the distant fire before the approach of day and hoping to soon find the christian lines they hurried toward the south now feeling awfully tired and sleepy though they had been fully rested by their long ride on the river. By and by toward eight o'clock they began to cross over a large corn field and so high were the stalks already that the girls stopped to look at the stalks and enjoy the perfection of the great crops.

"How splendid the corn is for so early in the year," cried Violet.

"Yes," said Gertrude reflectively. "But we have got to be carefully in going through here. Rebel scouts are hidden everywhere and even artillery is said to be laid at every piece of this ground on the near by hills and we could be shelled here with horrible effect."

"Why how could it be possible?" asked Penrod.

All the rebel generals have scouting parties everywhere even far outside their lines and also here too," was the reply. "He has long range guns and could let shot and shell scour the whole landscape in effort to destroy us if we are seen by the gunners. Luckily they haven't got their flash lights striking with their glowing shafts upon this part of the ground just now. And even if we are not shelled I'd hate to have to have a fight with a party of hidden rebel pickets in the dark and in all this high corn."

"Is there such danger in every direction we go?" asked Radcliffe in a sudden.

"Yes of course," while outside the christian lines. And if the glandelinian scouting and picket forces consisting of the wickedest of rebels see us we also could be in danger. In order not to have a fatal adventure here we cannot take the chances of having a fight with the rebels or be seen by the rebel gunners on the hills a mile above. It's a good thing it is night and it is so dark or we could not dare under any conditions pass over this field. If we did and the gunners saw us we would be already playing the harp with the angels and our friends would not find our reboddes either. We would be blown to nothing. nothing.

"Once," said Violet, "I was out alone and suddenly found that I was face to face with a force of rebels we call Scouters and in the pursuit that ensued it was a perfect race for life for this girl. I'll tell you right now. The glandelinians tried everything possible to kill and I feared I would not receive no quarter whatever. Their fury caused a great scare into everything soon I also being very scared for the first hour since I was in being and after I succeeded in escaping after being pursued for a hundred leagues day and night, and with hardly food or water to eat or drink and running and through fields and over bridges and through woods, and hiding in all places and being haunted as if I was pursued by ghosts and evil spirits I fearing no hope whatever set on a log and cried for hours. I was younger then and had not been used to such exciting experiences then so I was scared of encountering the glandelinians and alone for nearly a year."

"What did you do after you stopped crying, and recovered your courage?" asked Radcliffe.

"I went back to the christian lines and did not go out for days until I had recovered again."

"Oh," cried the boy as a very great thing suddenly flashed across his brains. But just now he did not think it proper to tell anybody what he thought of and therefore kept the idea in his own head. It was a long slow walk through the great corn field but nevertheless a pleasant if not a safe one and as no rebels appeared, and as it was evident the gunners on the hills beyond did not see the party and there was no pursuers behind they did not worry about the traveling a bit, though of course all of the girls and even Evans and the boys spoke of being good and sleepy. Yet they constantly dreaded that batteries from would open upon the field any second. About half an hour without anything occurring they drew out of the corn field and approached near to a big hay stack that was burning and a thick cloud of smoke rose from the top. This was the first haystack they had ever seen afire and they were again filled with consternation. How did it get afire, and why? Fields of great crops abounded in this part of the country and who ever owned the property here before the arrival of the foe surely had the greatest and best skilled helpers and owners and ranchers in probably all the world. The whole rebel troops was in possession of this beautiful country which was all of country property.

Not thirty yards away stood a large fashionable looking country house which was of wood and it showed a plan in the glare of the hay stack fire it being painted white.

Around the ground of the building ran a high picket fence with excellent gates but the gates were closed and appeared to be locked. When they with concealing their approach with shrubbery to avoid the fire of rebel batteries approached the spacious grounds, our adventurers found a other beautiful beauty to observe. Brass fountains sent sprays of clear water far into the air and there were large beds of beautiful flowers of different kinds and colors. There were thousands of great trees too and here and there shady bowers with benches and chairs to sit upon. Also on the sides of the pathway leading up to the front entrance of the building were rows of statuary very clean cleverly oriented all standing upon neat pedestals. However there were soldiers wearing the gray near here and also big groups in the grounds and the adventurers suspected at once that it was Inner Myllete's headquarters.

Not far off was another great big position. Six of the soldiers here had however seen the children with the officer appear out of the edge of the cornfield and seeing the children creeping forward on hands and knees at once ran forward shouting so loudly that those occupying the building heard the exciting cries and rushed out in person to see what was up. The child ran gazed upon the approaching soldiers in wonder and surprise and then after bringing six of the rebels down with heavy but goodly directed shots beat a hasty retreat for they had heard a lot of these glandelinians. And this glandelinian general was considered one of the great and also consorted officials of a general. He was very high in rank being a Count and also a general in chief. He owed obedience and allegiance to all his superior generals and lieutenants, and also to the king and he was a great friend and loved one another also. He was also a very dandy duc dude and though not so high in rank as the chief generals wore a coat that the richest king in the world could not afford to put on. He kept his shoes brilliantly polished on all occasions and his decorations were of the expensive gold and silver pieces. He was very good looking, powerful and tall and no cowboy in the world could get near his ability in expert horseback riding.

He was very courteous in all his ways to all his officers whether above or under his rank but nevertheless he was severe in discipline and when things went wrong he was a roaring lion. He was greatly feared by all of the best of christian generals for no one of the christian generals were able to beat this rebel chieftain in any battle yet. Evans therefore therefor warned every one of his friends to keep out of reach of Isner's rebel soldiers and led every one safely through the cornfields on a swift retreat. Evans of course wanted to know first of all how it could be that this rebel general and his glandelinian forces happened to be in this neighborhood how he had found the chance to construct a junction with the chief of all the glandelinian generals, what his plans were and why he occupied that hill building for his headquarters. So while retreating they spoke in whispers of this great fighting general how strong he was in his divisions and troops and cannons as well as what kind of glandelinians he had with his own forces and how big in strength his officers what professional abilities they had and so on.

Then violet told of how Isner always had the biggest of all rebel divisions, consisting of Gundlings and every sect of glandelinians there was known besides the fierce tempestuous Holsteinians and so on. While the little girls were explaining about the nature of the glandelinians known as the Growley Woods and the gargoylans and the dangers of facing those terrible rebels Evans listened with intense interest while the rest kept constantly on the watch for pursuing foes. Penrod however had kept his eyes fixed on a peculiar thing advancing toward his rear and he noticed that the furthest cornstalks were swaying suspiciously in three or four places and at this hour there was not the slightest breeze blowing at all.

He watched the strong swaying of the stalks with a fast beating heart and feeling for his hostler drew out his revolver and looked over it carefully to see if it was loaded.

Presently the corn stalks stopped their swaying and at once to the astonishing surprise of all Penrod dropped to his knees and leveling or pointing his pistol fired three quick shots. There was no response however and the boy with a red face and excited expression rose to confront the others.

"Why in the world were you firing the shots for?" asked Evans. "Don't you know you'd rose the foe by the noise?"

"I saw the corn swaying in the rear suspiciously," confessed the boy. "We are being shadowed by foes."

"The corn swaying," ex cried Evans noticing there was no breeze. "Dear Goodness how can it be possible that these glandelinians could be able to shadow or follow us through all this forest of high corn stalks in the dark. It looks as if we will soon have to start another desperate fight if we wish to escape. I cannot tolerate being followed wherever I go."

"Never fear about that dear Evans," said Gertrude Angeline. "Penrod is glad to have the chance to watch out for the foe for great reasons. As long as it is dark, and the rebel batteries of on the heights above and beyond don't open fire upon our hiding places we are safe."

"Yes indeed," declared Penrod. "I should be glad for one of the things I have to do is to guide all friends through all kinds of perils at any risk. I had no idea at first that it could be possible for the rebels to follow after us through the cornfield in the darkness, but now I fear it is true and we will have to be very watchful."

"You are a very watchful boy indeed and you deserve our very best friendship for life," said the other Jennie not the Vivian girl.

"Are you positively sure rebels are following or shadowing us?" asked Jennie Vivian.

"Not quite so sure," answered Penrod. "But there are strange objects I saw advancing through the cornstalks and that convinces us all that we surely are being shadowed. I thought I saw four objects and they were a strange white like the K.K.K. I hear of in the United States. If I see any other such objects I will have to shoot again."

Penrod indeed said this with great pride and pleasure.

"Good," cried Evans. "I congratulate you fully. But what do you think we should do next in order to go finish our great work?" he added to Jennie Vivian.

"Why not try to enter general Isner's lines and find our out the rebel generals intended plans for out of the scout scoundrel," said the girl. "In this part of the country the chief rebel general has the chance to do a whole lot of things that would ruin the biggest christian forces to crush the christian troops and divisions into scattered bits. With your kind assistance we ought to easily find out whether he intends to construct a junction with that chief or not. And to find that out would be very easy."

General Evans stared at her in the greatest surprise.

"Surely Jennie dear you are joking!" he said.

"No indeed indeed," replied Jennie very greatly surprised herself at Evans' question. "I surely will tell you that I should be terribly earnest."

"But do you think for a single second that I would be allowed to let you or your sisters or any other children, whether they be girl or boy scouts to enter the positions of such dangerous rebels?" asked the general.

"Why not sir?"

"Why not? You ask why not. It would be cruel, wicked of this general and I could be accused of one of the heartless deeds of Satan to allow you to do so. And it is astonishing to hear you ask of all of us to allow yourselves to risk facing that fir fierce tiger," asserted the general. "Every one knows that you are the greatest children in the righteousness ever known and also the prettiest of all ever created and that all you do is for the cause of your country and God. And yet what do the rebels care about you. In their eyes you are worse than the lowest of insects. To allow you to enter general Isner's lines would be like letting you go into certain destruction. You of course are Abbie's Princesses but in this case you will have to obey and stay out of Isner's positions. I would not allow you to enter his glandelinian positions under any conditions even at the risk of losing your friendship and position in rank at the right second now. And to allow you to enter his lines would be wicked indeed."

Penrod and the rest were astonished at hearing this. Radcliffe and Gertrude looked grave and disconcerted but the rest knew in their hearts that general Evans was perfectly right. Even the other girl nodded her head in approval of the general's speech so it was evident that she agreed with Evans' decision. Radcliffe looked to eve at every one in perplexity.

"Who's afraid of Isner or his glandelinians?" he asked scornfully.

"Ain't you?" inquired Jennie Turner.

He gave one of his terrible snarls which showed his teeth.

"I surely fear every rebel general as if I had no heart," said the boy. "And his rebel soldiers the Scoundlers slew all the boy scouts under general Castellio at Delight's junction and where is Jennie who is supposed to be a sister to I. But I want to help violet and her sisters who are the best of friends I have and I'd even kill a dozen wicked glandelinian generals like that scoundrel to handle the Vivian girl Princesses to help their Father destroy the wickedest rebellion ever waged."

"You have brave fiery instincts," said Evans and if you was a full grown soldier you could be a fine dashing christian general. I cannot go against your desire to revenge the loss of your sister as I can understand the feelings of those who suffer such a loss, especially of dear ones. I have been given the order to be chief guardian of the Vivian girl Princesses however, which is indeed a very dignified position, and so in one way I have authority over the Vivian girls and so I shall never, never, allow the girls to enter the positions of the worse rebel divisions, even if ordered to do so by any general far over higher sort authority than I have got."

"But Isner's divisions," said Jennie sadly "is here for no good reason and surely will join the chief of all rebel generals."

"There is no proof of that," said Evans. "But as I got the position to be your guardian I shall have to protect you under all conditions and not allow you to do any thing that is rash. You are driving for suicide I believe."

"Unless we find out--just find out--," said Jennie sadly. "I will not be able to save general Vivian's forces and they will suffer disaster."

"I'll cope with Isner if he wishes to fight," declared Evans decidedly.

Jennie wiped her eyes for she could not hold back the tears.

"I'll tell you what to do," said Radcliffe. "I Penrod and the general will go into Isner's lines and find out his reason for being here."

"No you won't, not one of you," said Jennie emphatically. "I won't have three of any of our best of all friends or even the lowest of friends not even strange girls and boy scouts face such danger that way. Here we won't go or cannot be allowed to go we won't allow no one else to go either, even under penalty of punishing the booby if they do disobey."

"Then what in the world shall we do?" asked Gertrude.

They were all silent and thoughtful. No one spoke for an hour. Then suddenly the general aroused his posture and said:

"The best thing we can do is to a all ride back to general Vivian's lines and ask his advice on the situation. He is a wise christian general Vivian and he will find a way to save his biggest divisions."

So having left the vast cornfield they started on the return journey toward the christian lines which toward the break of day they reached without any further adventures. It was a very sad journey for violet and her sisters for without obtaining what they wished to know and what they had risked all to find about they saw no way to save either general Penrod or his brother and his forces which were facing a serious and disastrous defeat unless the generals withdrew from out of their present positions and retreated without a conflict.

violet and her sisters were utterly discouraged and despondent and as they rode along and as they did so Jennie sighed heavily.

"Is there anything troubling or hurting you?" inquired the general in a kindly tone for the general was still with the party.

"We have been so unluckily these few days," replied violet. "I should have known that we would have failure in anything we tried to do this these days. The glandelinian generals are getting foxier every day."

"And why do you think you are unlucky?" asked the general.

"Because we failed in this adventure. We know just as we did before we started." "But that was not unluckily," declared the general. "It is just good luck that is all. Suppose not one of us were returning."

"Do you suppose all of the world would hear of it?" asked Gertrude.

"Ah that would indeed be the truth," replied the general. "But nothing would be done about it if it were the girls' fault alone for being too rash. Yet all of Abbie's good luck is happening because of the brave vivian girls. I suppose hundreds of thousands of people never saw the girls yet and yet if the least bit of bad luck falls upon violet and her sisters the rebels are in danger of destruction or failing to relieve quarter if surrounded. It not so the rebel soldiers it is not their fault all the hours they do such things it is the rebel generals."

"I've never had good luck yet," said Jennie snarling.

"And neither have I," said Gertrude Angeline. "I have been wounded several places."

"But," continued Penrod, "bad luck always gets one before good luck."

"All of the generals have the opinion of that too," asserted Evans. "but to be overconfident is very disastrous. The cautious and daring are usually always successful. So you can see that it is true."

"And I have never failed in all what I did yet," declared Radcliffe.

"How lucky indeed you are," cried Jennie. "If you were a general now you would be having lots to do and then you would consider yourself very unlucky. But it is still greater luck that you are only a captain of boyscouts."

"For lots of reasons," said the boy bitterly. "The Glandelinians call I and all who follow follow in the boy scouts reg forces Rattlesnakes. So you call in that being lucky?"

"Then we will have to quickly turn over a new leaf and call you hence forth the luckiest boy in the whole nation," declared the general. "Every reason for being called a Rattlesnake is not unusual to us. Even they called general Evans that is I one. But I have noticed that those Glandelinians who had encounters with you dread your appearance and flee for fear all luck will overtake all Glandelinia if they fight with you. Let the rebels call you one and be one for that reason too and it will soon do great credit to our plesed Country."

"How can I stand for such an insult when I know the character of such a serpent?" asked the boy.

"Never worry about that at all," advised violet. "No one not even us know what they are going to be called next. We on our part have been called things that would shock shock God and all the angels and saints in Heaven to boot. We girls also have written down a long list of all the insects and other creatures, besides the very serpents and wild cats that the Glandelinians have always called us. I'll show you it when we return to the lines and you'll laugh. Yet they are very undignified undignified words too."

Radcliffe did not reply but he was so dejected that even their arrival at the christian lines and the cheers he and the girls and the general's relief failed to interest his spirits and satisfy his desires for revenge. In his heart his hate was deadly poison to the Glandelinians. He desired strongly to jab every Glandelinian general in the back with his dagger.

All of the soldiers joyfully cheered the reappearance of the vivian girls and the others who were all favorites and on entering the general's headquarters word arrived to all that the great chieftain would at once grant all an audience. Violet and her sisters told the general how unsuccessful they had been in their quest and of Evans positively refused to allow her and her sisters to sacrifice any efforts on their part to enter the fierce rebel lines under the rebel general Isner. General Vivian frowned when he heard this and then looked sober.

"He is quite right," said he who did or was not the slightest bit surprised. Had violet and her sisters told about it before that they had intended to enter Isner's line I would have informed all that before they even got started out of our own lines that if they do not believe in suicide or self destruction they would not even plan such foolish and devil dare things. At his headquarters no person could successfully gain or secure any news or plans out of his place or of his generals either. They could never have secured plans or anything either. To spy on that Glandelinian general and his staff is like running headlong into the very heart of the hottest forest fire. Then they would have been saved the trouble and annoyance of the dangers they would face."

"We are not afraid of facing aerial at all for the cause of the country. It would be great fun," said Joice.

"An it turned out," declared Penrod. "We fear no one, but just the very thing I believe no one could enter Isner's lines without facing death for certain. And we could never get any results if we did succeed in getting away with plans or news about his intentions for he would change everything instantly. So unless our forces retreat we could save our divisions and we will face a disastrous battle and defeat."

General Vivian and the nine girls laughed.

The Glandelinian generals before us will not be having the chance to strike any of our divisions a fatal blow can assure you," said the general. "I have sent for general Hendre Darger and he will be here shortly he having sent thirty of his Glandelinian soldiers here and they have brought lots of news and lots of things here which they wish to have have burned up after I get through reading their contents and the like. I have also sent for general Kindermine, and Greathart who are waiting for their arrival."

They were all greatly astonished at this announcement of the general.

"Let us see general Greathart. Let's see his generalship at once!"

cried the Rattlesnakes eagerly.

"Wait a second," replied the general for "For I have greater things to say. Nothing that goes on, in the rebel lines escapes the noticed of general Darger's boys and his scouting parties or their officers and generals and spies. Even general Darger knows what the Glandelinian generals intend to do and how strong their divisions are and the strength of their positions and how extensive their batteries of cannons are and how large the cavalry squadrons are and the size also. He knows how Isner is and why he is here and why he has brought up his own troops and and threw it into position and whether he will join the great rebel chieftain against all of us or not. General Darger also knew that you with the girls and your boy friend would fail to obtain what you were looking for and so he sent for his Wizard Troopers to scout around also for you as you advised and instructed his Excellency to do and he faithfully obeyed and succeeded for you though you failed. A terrible thing is going to happen to general Johnstone's force presently, especially if he should attack, an incident that I believe will please you if it does happen if the battle rages," and now continued the general rising to his feet and standing erect. "We are going to finish the council you advised if you will follow into the place."

When Penrod entered the place with the rest he first saluted and then he ran quickly to general Greathart and kissed the general on the face.

"I and all the girls did our best," he said with a sob, "but it was of no use. The foe is so watchful."

Then he drew back and looked around the plat place and the sight of the force of generals quite astonished the lad. Aside of general Kindermine and Greathart, general Vivian was there, looking through a package of papers, and also general Glandelinia was there sitting opposite to general Hanson and looking on the scene with great interest and there was general Roswell Gustaf Johnson in his great fancy purple coat and lavender pants and vest and by the table sat Richardson Hendrick Halsted looked as great as if he were His great Lordship King Vivian also and there was an expression in his face that showed he knew a lot about the foe's intended plans that he cared to tell just now. Last of all general Fredrickson Rickson Parson was there and this dignified chieftain sat straight up in his chair looking very dignified that day indeed and keeping his eagle eyes fixed upon all the other officers whose position he had as his staff. General Robertson Vivian took a chair which his orderly gave or brought forward for the general and back of the general stood Hanson, Richardson Halsted and Parson as well as Roswell Buxton Johnson, and Glandelinia. Darger who had arrived and was also seated now arose and after looking around carefully for a full ten seconds bowed to general Vivian and all the rest of the high generals and also the best of bows to the rest.

"To the whole division of generals here," he said "I beg to announce that his Excellency general Robertson Vivian has asked of all who even followed after to obey the wishes of the vivian girls whose great assistant and adviser I should be. We have discovered that the chief of all the Glandelinian generals has been indulging in a series of great conspiracies and therefore by the Royal Edict of King Robert Angelic Vivian, I hereby advise it is best to withdraw our divisions and all our batteries and artillery and other things to a better and securer position and advance Roswell Gustaf Johnson's force to the right of Isner's line with the purpose to frustrate every intention of his of joining the chief of all general Glandelinia and Evans will back the attack with his troops and all the cannons he has. The greatest of all Glandelinian chieftains just now has no longer any intention to work a force upon our rear as he planned before but intends to surround us entirely and then keep crushing us until we are so forced to surrender. What think you of the advice I give general Halsted?"

As he asked this question Halsted straightened up in his chair, saluted, looked around like a sunning culture saluted, stood up straight as a stick, and said in a loud clear voice that all heard:

2278 •

PART TWO.....
 THE BATTLE ALONG THE JOURNAL, THE, AND THE CHRISTIAN ? STASING
 CHRISTIAN DEPRAT. JULY 30TH.....

WHEN THE CHRISTIANS CAPTURE THE FIRST SCORCE OF STOCKADES! WHY SEE LOOSE THEIR DAMNATION!!! MINEB.....

THE FEARFUL RESULTS.....THE GANDERIAN DEPRAT'S NAME IS ON JIM DANIEL...SSB SS

General Vivian decided to attack himself several of the fortifications of Evangeline Grant which had been under a series of sieges since the war began, and at a time too, and if successful in carrying them, then all of the Christian line was to make a general attack, on the main glandolinian front. He even held a council and all of the officers agreed that it would be the best plan, though it would be they feared cause another fierce and dreadful bloodshed, than the other way by attacking the fortifications in general and all at once.

So the next morning the divisions under Maurice Gostellie Gostellie made the first attempt on the fortifications that brave violent and her sisters had apted upon. Maurice Gostellie got his divisions ready and soon these forces ten million strong advanced toward these fortifications but cautiously.....

Maurice Gostellie knew the easiest approach and the weakest point to assault and so kept a watch that his advance would not be discovered, and cause the weakest point to be strengthened. The whole division moving in a long, extended line and very slowly, making very little noise, and spreading out as he surrounded the fortifications.

Yet however the quick backed eyed sentries saw the Christians coming, and sounded the alarm. At once there was excitement in the fortification and loopholes began to dart their tongues of flame. Yet the swarms of purple coats came on more swiftly now, while the glandolinian gunners worked hard to get their big guns ready. Indeed the excitement was intense. The big gates were closed and nearly every loop hole seemed to dart smoke and flame yet the Angolinians pressed on with a loud whoop and they reached the long line of fortifications. In the swift rush the sentries were overpowered, and made prisoners, while on each the bigger swarms of purple coats determined to capture the fortifications at all costs. Every glandolinian armed with a rifle took his stand at the loop holes and opened fire with frightful effect, hurrying away, and now as other lines of fortifications were being attacked the firing became so more terrible, as Maurice Gostellie could discern from the sound of heavy firing in the distance to his left.

This inspired him to be the first to try and be the first prize winner. The Angolinians seemed to be advancing into the jaws of death and he stated but their general cried:

"On brave men, front forces are attacking the other fortifications on our left and we must be the first to take one of the fortifications in our immediate front. Forward. Show those glandolinians that they are trifling with God when they trifle with the Christians."

The Angolinians continued to advance and for several minutes now the scene was appalling, the noise of battle being tremendous, the uproar of the firing deafening, and the dead and wounded rapidly lay in ranks, yet on toward the fortifications pressed the survivors, combated puffs of smoke hiding away the palisades for a few minutes. Part of the fortifications looked more like salient points.....

Then all the big guns added to the din but by this time the assailants were out of range of the big guns which could not be depressed to reach them, and the Christian troops reached the palisades, walls many armed with battering rams, and ladders.....

The army behind the palisades poured in a general fire upon the Christians but though the tempest of bullets and their down heavy thousands those with the battering rams succeeded in smashing down the gates. Then in poured the mobs of Christians returning the fire with a fierce effect, the defenders fighting like demons in their frantic efforts to drive out the assailants who were breaking their way in at all points. But it was of no use. The Angolinians came in by monstrous masses and carrying all before them like a reaping whirlwind, charged for the fortifications, making a most furious and bloody attack upon the glandolinians, and carrying the fortifications and routing all its defenders.....

As soon as the glandolinians were out, the whistling of shot and even fortifications seemed to rise hoily into the air a perfect storm of wreckage and sheets of flame, the whole region seemed to become sudden and violent volcanic eruptions, there was a terrific avalanche of overwhelming explosions, and the soldiers who as yet did not get inside the stockades, and fortifications and who were about a thousand yards from them were thrown flat on their faces by the concussion and were almost by a hurricane storm of blazing bombs, shattered human beings, demolished bodies, and broken fragments of cannons and wreckage of every description. Thick rolling clouds of smoke extended to the height of thousands of feet reaching perfectly solid for nearly twenty minutes before it weakened and floated away.

This tranquility of the army had indeed caused a terrible disaster to the Christians. The Angolinians under Maurice Gostellie had been the first on ones to carry these fortifications but half of Maurice Gostellie's force had been annihilated, and he and the surviving Angolinians stood appalled at this horrible scene. The glandolinians he realized had then set a deadly trap instead of being taken upon themselves, and now Maurice Gostellie saw the reason why he had succeeded in carrying the fortifications so easily.

Fearing that the same would be repeated and the fortifications the enemy also dreading that now they be carried by sheer force of numbers, had set mines under them all and with the intention of annihilating all of the troops who should take possession. The work had been done so perfectly that no one who had got inside escaped and all the five million men were blown to atoms by the action of blasts. It was learned later that over 7,700,000 pounds of T.N.T. and giant powder had been scientifically placed in deep holes inside the lower sections of the fortifications, and as soon as the Angolinians being victorious had taken possession the miners who operated the electric batteries had exploded every contents of these dangerous holes. The one shot was strong enough to have mined of a part of a mountain 800 feet long, 100 feet thick, and two hundred and ninety feet high, at least one shot had sent that much dirt and other earth material high into the air.

The powder and T.N.T. was placed in thirty three stockades and forty eight of the fortifications to a depth of one hundred and forty feet. More than 1,500,000 tons of rocks which would make over two million of barrels of cement were were demolished by the action of explosions and in some cases thrown a distance of five hundred yards, and three hundred yards into the air. In some of the fortifications five thousand feet of T.N.T. were used and the entire charge set off simultaneously. Strange to say there was no damage done to towns of cities near the place though windows in galvanized and Vivian way was broken by the concussion and showered into the streets like rain injuring a swarm of people and persons who happened to be in the streets at the time. This was the most disastrous explosion in any battle so far in the war and was heard at the distance of two thousand miles. All the soldiers who had witnessed the explosion were rendered deaf for life, and many who were even ten thousand yards from the scene had been killed by the concussion of the blast, rendered no doubt to the effects what a soldier in Europe would call "Shell shock."

Maurice Gostellie had to avoid further disaster and he withdrew his surviving forces to a safer spot, and started bombarding the enemy with his cannons. He was enraged over the affair entirely and since then refused under any conditions to take any more prisoners, and those who were already prisoners in his hands were all shot down.

In the meantime General Cannon led six million six hundred thousand men to attack the twenty other fortifications. At the first assault Cannon's line met frightful destruction and was forced to recoil with his line of six million six hundred thousand reduced to only nine hundred thousand as his division had also been the victims of tremendous mines which had been exploded in front of the fortifications. This had caused a simultaneous storm of destruction also and crushed Cannon's line of assault to pieces. However three of the fortifications were not defended by palisades but by great broad walls armed with cannons which resembled the walls around a giant American Prison like at Sing-sing or Joliet and these were very high but slanting like a railroad bank toward the ground, and every portion of these walls seemed with cannons like a gigantic battleship of white gray color. This was called the Eva Grant Salient, the strongest portions of the enemy's defense at this point of the McWhirther fortifications.

This assault on these well defended fortifications had started at the time when Maurice Costello had heard the distant and hoarse firing, and this on slaughter had started fully an hour before the other lines had been to pieces. Yet Hanson reported his bloody fallers to general position was rapidly reinforced by other divisions, and the survivors recovering from the frightful effects soon returned to the assaults with furious desperation and merciless violence. For over six hours continuous and bloody fighting raged but all this time the Angolians could not make any impression, though making fairly desperate onslaughts and until a regiment of Angolian engineers succeeded in battering down the gates.

Then in rushed the Angolians and for a time a wholesale slaughter seemed to be going on, and then after the fortifications were abandoned by the enemy, and the main tragedy occurred here. The mines set under these fortifications were blown up with a roar like a hundred billion cannon and the Angolians seemed to take place here, and the earth seemed to wither and fly away in the fury of the explosion, and the din sounded as if a million planets were dashed to pieces. Three quarters of General Hanson's force of eleven million men were annihilated and these two infernal blasted regions were only once pined by the Angolians who followed temporarily, for the enemy came back at a furious counter charge and the rest of Hanson's lines were driven back after a fierce slaughter, and the survivors were forced back all the way to their own main line with still more frightful loss. In these two great assaults along this section the Christian losses were considered upward to 17,500,000 in slain while 988,776 were rendered blind by the concussion and over 1,877,666 were wounded and rendered totally deaf and blind, and crippled for life from the shock of the concussion. About 666,666 were wounded mortally. Simultaneously to this general violence General Hanson to send heavier forces to take the other fortifications not knowing the awful results of the other two lines of fortifications, and that of the other terrible fortifications being mined also and of the terrible results that were to take place. The assaults were made in useless succession but the Garrison of the fortifications held them with great stubbornness and opened fire with all the big guns they could bring to bear, one furious assault followed another and quickly the ground was covered with the dead lying and wounded. Every attack of the Christians was repulsed severely, and General Vivian sent seventeen million more to assist in the onslaught.

As the assaults went to the attack again, a merciless shower of bullets and canister was sent sweeping through their columns. Yet inspired by the heavy reinforcements the advancing Christians formed firm and compact lines and went on, and now other Christian divisions were sent on to support the charging columns and these moved forward in thick lengthy lines of battle with long lines of skirmishers well thrown out in front, and slowly followed by reserves in mass. The big guns of the fortifications roared intensely above the thunder of the light artillery and storm of exploding shells and shrapnell, and so fierce was the discharge of musketry that the fortifications appeared to be on fire. All of the palisades of the inner fortifications situated on higher ground appeared on fire also from the withering discharge of musketry and cannon, and now the number of cannon in action was increased.

Those who were exposed to such a terrific cannon fire fell back, but the other Angolian columns refused to recoil and made a desperate and most sanguinary push and soon succeeded in scaling the high walls, capturing the cannons there, and after driving back the gunners still pressed on and succeeded in reaching the palisades, and smashing down the gates by mere weights of numbers, and break also through the other portions and opening a tremendous fire with their musketry and captured cannons point blank. The brave Glandelinians kept on fighting like fierce demons for hours, both sides exchanging at times a fearful tempest of bullets, and fighting hand to hand like two armies of madmen. Despite the frightful carnage however the Angolians being in greater numbers surged upon the defenders, used all of their bayonets with cruel effect, and cutting the masses of Glandelinians down like grass. The Angolians by pressing on continuously despite the fierce resistance they met soon began to have full sway, and breaking through the gaps in the palisades they had made, assisted the other swarms of assailants inside and so the Glandelinians here after almost meeting with annihilation here abandoned the fortifications here but no explosions occurred as the Christian scouting parties had watched out for mines and captured them before they knew they were there, the Angolians being quite successful along this point, until the Glandelinians being reinforced by those at Fort Cedernine promptly counter attacked and raging a storm of battle for four hours forced the Angolians to withdraw.

Simultaneous to this the assault on the main line had been made through a severe inferno of bedlams. The Glandelinian pickets had been driven in but the main line had opened fire with terrific effect hurrying away with their cannon, and all the fortifications at that section had been roaring their thunders like mighty volcanic eruptions. Along the right wing the struggle had been appalling. As the assailants had come on with tremendous fury the enemy first opened a most terrific fire, and then counter charged, and as the enemy were repulsed and again stormed the roar of musketry increased to frightfully that the firing seemed extremely heavy, and a hundred thousand cannon had been opened upon the advancing Christians, but the range was too short and the storm of shells exploded too far to the rear doing no damage. The Christians swept on in their second assault, and as the smaller guns broke into play the Christian lines were ploughed and torn through and through by a perfect stream of shot and shell, and canister was added to the shell fire with mighty good effect, and the Angolians were soon driven into great confusion. General Vivian seeing this result and realizing how many of the enemy's cannons were in action brought his own main batteries to bear upon the remaining fortifications and these opened fire with a fury that was beyond describing and while the battle was so furious that it seemed as if the world was afire thirty million one hundred and sixty thousand Angolians resumed the furious and exceedingly bloody assault on the enemy's left, while another thirty million assaulted the left of the Glandelinians heavily and kept up the assault with furious desperation and murderous ferocity, while the Christian batteries under General Vivian was waiting to go into action also with the intention of blowing the fortifications into ruins.

The fighting was indeed most severe and continuous the Angolians keeping up the assault with bloody fury and great determination. Yet they could not make any impression on the enemy's lines or drive them back for General Desmond's Glandelinians retained their positions, with the greatest stubbornness and repelled every section of the assault. Then as the Christian columns resumed the assaults with redoubled violence after a short lull Desmond ordered two large battalions from the right of his main position and these divisions arrived and poured upon the Christians like a human torrent. Yet though their lines were galled the Angolians did not desert but again formed firm and compact lines and after reforming again made an impetuous advance.

This attack was more determined today, and the Carlin and militant but commonplace islanders were not the incoordinated army when fifty hundred thousand of the purple coats were no longer rushing forward to annihilate Australians they were not disheartened.

They trained their fire and gaze upon the advancing Christians a rattlesnake sloughing great and large galls in their vomitlines.... On the left wing all the ananya line was ablaze and the Christians were confused by the withering fire, but nonchalant general Andronina was bound to carry the ananya positions; he could not allow the Angellians to fall back or give up the attack and halting them and soon having the receding column to cut through a portion of the ananya line by a bold and desperate rush and they scored a tremendous fire upon the receding grunts.

Along the center the enemy poured a fearful storm of shot and shell upon the advancing elements; the courage being dreadful but despite the terrific fire that was raking their lines through and through the Australians continued to advance until Durham determined to check the furious advance hurried immense bodies to the support of the other defense positions and these came in double quick time and helped to the work.....

The front line of the army opened a tremendous fire with seven million cartridges and six hundred cannon of heavy calibre while thousands of others were positioned and lay down upon the positions while their officers rode back and forth, using their utmost to encourage the Chancellorsburg and compel them to stand for fire by their works and hurl back the assaults.

The Angolians were now so near that the mine sufficiently depressed tore reached that of the nearest people could do in columns. The critical moment was now arrived. At many different points the works were within reach and almost simultaneously the Angolians columns rushed clear in front up to the very muzzles of the guns and though they were met by a terrific withering fire that mowed them down in scores of columns the surviving columns advanced over drifts back to the crater's and turning to pass under the fire it frenzied clatter of bullets, coming fire with all their might and unity to keep the column from taking a respite.

Along the right the Chetniks under General Manton opened the Chetniks attacking there with terrific muskadee violence and here the struggle was more fearful and bloody the dead and wounded in gray lay thickly everywhere but thicker yet were the dead and wounded in purple.

to the assault making a most fierce and bloody attack but after a terrifically attempts were made to drive back in confusion and with heavy losses. German a Division and his forces now pushed forward to drive the Canadians from their position lost. These fresh forces were three from the enemy lines and drove them only to meet a gallant attack withering fire which caused the loss of many men.

The fighting was terrific and bloody but the Christian lines were re-established and moved on. The works were packed with the full odds of the day and wounded at the severe and bloody action continued, the attacks of the Christians being most steady and determined but Hanson's reinforcements clung to their works against every effort to dislodge them. The flash of musketry and cannon was frightful and for three hours the silent contest raged until the works were then Hanson came with his reinforcements these swept forward with irresistible fury to dislodge the enemy if possible.....

This attack fell with the greatest force not far from the right wing of the standstillers who made a fierce and stubborn defense and continued the stubborn fighting till the overtaking columns overran it and rif right flank, then they gave way and their whole fighting line rolled up and driven in in disorder and under a storm of shot and shell and musketry burst the city.

Advantage under a most pulling fire, the Angelinians returned a volley in respect of bullets which dealt awful havoc among the slowly retreating gray columns.

still more and they began to retreat in disorder towards the Journal Run, and the Angell Indians in possession of theannon still allowed the column of the retreating force, while hundreds of thousands more went in pursuit of the enemy follow followed by millions of, and indeed as it seemed the Christians although this point seemed to be victorious as the enemy was retreating from Journal Run and their officers could not stop the confusion.

Journal Run and their officers could not get the conviction that according to the above attack upon the line still remaining was given up and thousands were attended to. The first night the enemy evacuated Journal Run under cover of the darkness and retreated toward their second line of main defense at the Vivian mucky mound. The last part of this action for the possession of Rio Gallegos had been very severe, over three million having fallen that terrible day along the battle line altogether. The assaults upon the fortifications had been very severe and the losses equally severe on account of the mines. Even the remnants of Kennedy's under violent and her sisters had captured on a thousand prisoners and two thousand more during the action along other parts of the line.

[illegible]

THE ADVANCE OF PICKNELL TO HAYSONS SUPPORT . THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF ALAMARIA

After the terrible carnage at Journal Run, had so upset itself all the region of July until it was aroused by the threatening success of the Christians. The clandelina general himself was excited at all their heat to raise lower armies to drive away the invading Christian armies under Hanson, and General Alvinia who knew he had pro bably assigned the clandelina beyond Andura; and endurance had thrown up a steep and unusable hill position on the Journal Run and concentrated toward Anna Maria, extra pi kata being sent outant powerful batteries out into place.

General Givinnia still had a force of sixty three million million men and sent a messenger during the day of the battle alert to a Journal for reinforcements. During the early evening hunt on the battle was elsewhere learned by the off distant telegraph that General Pickrellian had not remained united with General Warler after the great elimination defeat at Arounner Run but had collected a force of seven million men and was marching with all haste to attack his route.

Victor and her sister were surprised over this new news and felt kind sorry that it was Pickwell, for they respected Pickwell on account of his kindness to them when in trouble. Once he told general opinion of Pickwell's kindness to them and he said kind of stupid.

"Yes I realize that General Leonia Meltonia Wicknell is a far better a man than some of the other Chinitian chiefs for he has some respect for the Amegillians though terrible against them as he is. But war is war and not only that but it is not him that is coming but general Wicknellian for do you think General Wicknell would come to all those lutechers hold Julia Callio so they may continue their murders of helpless innocent Christian children? No indeed.

It was true. General Pike McNeill was better than another of the Abolitionist generals in this region and a respectable gentleman though fight ing again a Abolitionist. It had always been thus under when violent and her sisters were suspected in spring on his men for he would allow them to go free on the only if caught. He did not agree with the slaughter of children and whether necessary or not necessary of under any conditions would he allow his men to do it and was a man of great sternness and command.

His men had to obey his commands whether they liked it or not so Bicknell's army seldom humiliated children except on the sly. He had been ordered by Manley to go to the support of the chandeliers at Julo Gallo but he answered;

"You may sent me to fight the christians armies elsewhere but Julio willio. I'm glad to see Pearson lick that blood thirsty dog general Atencio Purgatorio. I'll never never go to the aid of child butchers and I you order me to do again I'll resign my command."

The 30th September 1944 when he had not allowed the plantations to handle the victim girls roughly when a prisoner in his hands had recognized his own and not that he was against the child butchery but also because he was in a sympathy of the Angolan cause, and had openly declared that if the victim girls had not appeared by their clever trick of firing the tents he would have set them free anyway.

The prospects of a title with his terrible general Bicknellian was far off yet but nevertheless the Christian grades were continually active with the other Mandellian armies but just the same general Viviana realized that these and general Bicknell's armies were too much overextended. If Bicknell's armies were too soon before Cannon could be warned and even decided to form a ambush if Bicknell's did come. However Bicknell's army was within sight that very night and though combined against general Viviana the generals of the new armies saw that the Christian army armies were twice their size and he hesitated about making an immediate attack.

They tried to use all kinds of tricks to get the Christian armies out of their strong positions but could not succeed. But a very next day general Peniculus divisions came into a fierce clash with these Mandellian armies in which thousands fell on both sides in a very few minutes the struggle raged on the Pa Parks of the Amphimaria. Being outnumbered and almost crushed Peniculus division were now defeated and pursued clear within sight of the main lines. General Call was aroused by the sound of heavy firing and saw the pursuers running on the pursuers and went out with fifty hundred thousand men to check them.

A bloodier engagement resulted which brought fresh divisions of the enemy to the rescue of their comrades. Amid the tremendous cannon and small arms fire divisions came up in time to help in the fight against the fierce and continuous fire upon the enemy and managed to check them throwing back a column after column that rushed furiously to the attack and out to pieces with multitudes of their dead and wounded lying on the blood soaked field of battle.

The attack on Bicknell was fierce and interned and was kept up for fully two hours with unabated fury and seeing that Bicknell was being worsted with terrible losses and frightful slaughter general Walter Jennings brought his forces into action and held his ground against twenty fierce attacks all made within an hour until Cannon came to his aid with one thousand pieces of artillery.

The terrific artillery fire checked the advance of the attacking assailants but the other forces were coming to their aid and the new attack became so fierce that general Germaine and his brother had to go to Cannon for aid. The battle had gradually extended to Cannon's main line but it finally recoiled toward the north the enemy having lost two million, one hundred thousand five hundred in killed and wounded while the Christian loss was only nine hundred and sixty five thousand in killed and wounded.

The main body of the enemy remained within sight however their officers deciding to wait until Bicknell's army came and so place the Christians between their fires. But to the next coming evening general Viviana and Cannon received heavy reinforcements which enabled his armies to fall the more and all this while a severe bombardment had been kept upon Julia Callio by the Christian batteries. The next day during general Cannon's action then going on with Parenthesis right wing scouting parties detected Bicknell's army and advance guard and reported the matter to general Cannon.

General Cannon was prepared however and later on his main army was discovered general Cannon extended his lines to head back this new force from Viviana's rear. Cannon was sent out with a strong division to take a look at Bicknell's situation and find out their situation.

He took about forty thousand men and went forward cautiously but did not go to near for fear of drawing the full fire of the batteries which were occasionally shelling Cannon's batteries and which were firing with accuracy on which side of ground from the line of artillery smoke to the left and also to the right.

How many more Bicknell's army had Cannon could not ascertain but he judged it to be seven or eight thousand men. Their line itself was on good ground which seemed to make their position a quite unusable. Cannon went back and reported to Viviana what he saw. Viviana realized that the enemy lines were unassailable but nevertheless he decided to concentrate them from the position as soon as he could get his guns in position to do so. To attack an unassailable force with his infantry if men was foolish and rash as he well knew and would bring ruin or an ill-acted upon but he knew that his own artillery if trained properly, and placed in right positions would do more work than any onslaught could.

He doubted about sending armies for if he did they would be caught and never return. He would not ask Violet or her sisters to go for they always refused to do any thing back without their fathers consent and if he said it was "NO" it was "NO". Signal stations were erected but this only drew the fire of the enemy and so they had to be abandoned. These hundred men lost their lives in this attack and at least Reynolds also had their dangers. For when ever they were planning within the enemy right they would cause a simultaneous cannonade once during the fire of the battle of Amphimaria a large scouting party under Julia Viviana was sent with two thousand men to take a look at the batteries and they had an experience that the survivors never forget. A lone man they found. Though they did not go even as near as Cannon the enemy and on a still closer watch and they were discovered being created by a storm of shot and shell. One quarter of their number was killed and one third of the rest remained for life eternally condemned. Julia Viviana was among the wounded armies. The survivors of the Christian army were left in a state of confusion out of the danger zone and then not a man, any of the wounded as they could.

General Viviana was of the incident sent many hundreds of troops to the front of the battle and scattered the Mandellian armies. He was severely wounded and he attempted to go to the front and fight again. He saw the details of the incident including the fact that it was impossible to go even a few feet into the open. Violet's first report to her father was to tell him the story. He believed that first but he killed in this incident and that two hundred were wounded. General Viviana did not want to go to the front and cut the line and bloody day and night many thousands were kept busy at safe distances.

Some of the Mandellian themselves were fearful for Mandellian sharpshooters constantly kept a sharp fire upon them. The Mandellians were crafty and general Viviana could never be without the pickets to a safe distance and sent several divisions to keep a look out for the sharpshooters.

That was what Violet had herself led several divisions very urgently to a point far to be a center of the eye. General Viviana promised her with though much was said for and against it. Violet herself to the teeth revolver in her small rifle and the looking.

When Violet went to the center post several of the officers felt that her presence was not prudent. When the light was all alone she investigated the fire throughout and accurately. She saw a small trace of stunted growth at a very slight distance from her side where there leaned with her back against its trunk so that her face was turned toward the direction of the enemy's lines. She conceived herself in this manner to be in a measure secured against attacks from the rear. She resolved to pass her two hours of watch in this position. She held her rifle with both her hands ready to shoot at the slightest sign of danger. Darkness set in and the time passed and fast it became as dark as pitch.

Violet's eyes were not in the impregnable darkness in front of her but in the rear she still heard some noise that came from the soldiers down in the camp and she looked in that direction she saw the numerous fires at which the soldiers were cooking their supper. But there was a gradual light away one after another and at last even in the dark and silent.

She still sat with her back leaning against the tree though she could see nothing and looked out toward the enemy's lines. At the same time she strained her ears in order to catch even the slightest sound. A light came from the sky nothing. This it was for a time. All of a sudden that her strained attention in this dark like all-around darkness became dulled. She looked but her with all her might against the ever increasing and pinning or lamp. But in this she succumbed only poorly.

"Oh Thou my Beloved God," she exclaimed "If I fall here I am lost. God help me!"

She lit her lips, stretched her arms but despite her efforts she became even more and more sleepy. Then she fought long against drowsiness which like a deadly poison sought to invade all her veins. Here indeed sleep was the time of death. From before the enemy she heard now and then the slop collapse of the towers. It was the brilliant stars of the night every full hour with an iron hammer and the sound of the stars of the night in lines.... It faded and very long ago that she had heard the hour of night strike.

She left the tree and for a while stood to go and find in order to keep awake. She walked faster and faster in the dark the night was so dark and looking toward all sides without however discerning anything suspicious or any way.

All at once she heard the strokes of a clock, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. Then all was silent again. After an interval she went to the tree again and leaned against it as before still holding her small rifle with both hands in order to be able to use it more quickly in case of danger. Presently she was startled. She distinctly heard a peculiar sound far in front of her. It was like a thin falling falling from a tree to the ground and at one strike. Her slipshod and languid was gone. It seemed as if an electric current had run through her.

She stood and stared out in the darkness in the direction from whence the sound had come. In the meantime every thing was again silent and quietly probably for some minutes. Then suddenly she heard the same sound again and this time it appeared to her to be somewhat nearer to her than before.

She left her tree and stepped out into the darkness. She soon discovered from whence the sound came for she saw a very weak column of light. The matter was now fully cleared up now. There were a score or more of Mandellian sharpshooters with dark lanterns, the small lights were in to be absolutely half steady by invisible hands. It was evident that the lights were about a hundred yards distant from her and now she had something definite to which she could fasten her attention. Now she knew where the danger was and of what it consisted. Here it Hanson was so enraged at this answer from the insolent Glandelinians that he fixed their sentence without even a trial. The sentence was "Deth...". "Death." The men desolately demanded a trial but a trial was denied them and they were shunted off to execution. And they answered him in a civil manner there was probably a good chance of their receiving a trial despite the known evidence against them. It never pays to answer an of the christa christian generals in an insolent manner. The spies were shot at sunrise.... And buried in the deepest pool of mud that was found.

M. In three raids upon the christians, the Glandelinians collected property, provisions and a valuable worth in millions of dollars from general Glandelinians' branches in the dead of night, and drove a part of the christian army in confusion while the whole army was preparing for their advance on Calaverita. General Vahara division was the portion of the christian army killed and assaulted. The christian were at the time hearing strange and suspicious noises like a number of cats and dogs making a concert but it did not sound naturally like those animals but like human beings discussing their cries. However they had kept on the alert but nevertheless the sudden surprise had been made by the Glandelinians a completely that the christian soldiers being overcome had to give in and were taken prisoners, the Glandelinians throwing them to the ground and while several Glandelinians held revolvers to the christian soldiers heads the others tied them up with ropes, took their rifles and other weapons from them and then the path being clear the main force went on and had penetrated very far into the christian lines before they were finally halted and compelled to retreat after some very much booty....

General W. J. Norton's division of infantry was stopped by two large squadrons of Glandelinians cavalry who attacked his force furiously as he had been advancing to reinforce the christian general picknell near Calaverita, and not only routed his forces but relieved the christian troops of two provision trains, a chain of cannons and many muskets besides taking scores of thousands of prisoners. Simultaneously two other Glandelinians cavalry held up general Joseph J. Kopp's divisions at Fortonia Creek and after severe conflicts took thirty two brass field pieces, and 13,000 prisoners. At another time when general Gurbis forces of Abbie andians were moving forward to make a junction with picknell the division was also stopped by three divisions of Glandelinian infantry and one of cavalry and completely annihilated in the dreadful slaughter. At the same time general picknell's Angelinians moving down the Francis turnpike when it was suddenly attacked by a force of young young Gargolians on horseback whom the Angelinians could have easily taken for guides from the hideous appearance of their dress. The conflict was severe but the Angelinians were also worsted with the loss of two guns and a thousand prisoners.

Many incidents indeed occurred during the concentration of christian armies upon the main Glandelinian army at Calaverita. Influenced doubtless by the reduction of profits in the great war Glandelinians Gargolians contented themselves with rather great pickings in one single night their early operations netting them over 277,000 prisoners gathered from three unwilling Angelinian General contributors. The first victim of the enemy was general Grooms' hopes Edwards divisions who was taken in flank by the enemy unexpectedly and driven back for the distance of two miles in the wildest confusion, this division being relieved of 22,000 prisoners in one single hour. Simultaneously a division of Angelinian Concentinians was taken in the rear also by two immense forces of No-Hollistinians who assaulted so desperately that after raging a sanguinary conflict the Angelinians were forced to run before reinforcements could reach them and 30,000 prisoners was the toll besides thirty cannons, three provision trains, and a great quantity of ammunition. General Garuthian proved to the enemy one of the most profitable victims. 222 558 prisoners were captured by the foe who assaulted his division and he was wounded.

During a raid made on another section of the concentrating christian army a special high general officer was shot and probably mortally wounded in a revolver battle with the chief leader of the raiders, another special general was fatally shot by another Glandelinian officer, and a third general was seriously wounded by a stray shell that exploded near his headquarters early during the night. Simultaneously general Erickerson Franklin a christian general who was sixty eight years old and most beloved by those he led, was shot in the left side of the chest by Glandelinian raiders who captured his headquarters, and he was so severely wounded that he died a few hours later.

General Walkerston William a high general of rank on the Abyanabillian side shot during a raid made in the Glandelinians upon his lines and suffering from two bullet wounds in the chest was shot a third time by a Glandelinian sharpshooter as he was trying to flee and was soon reported in a dying condition in the hospital tent of the Angelinians.

General Vahara's division was struck by a stray shell and badly mangled the shell having struck him in the chest and almost crushing every rib in his body. He died a few minutes later. That night indeed for many Angelinians was a time of excitement and even terror. One Angelinian general was shot in the chest while he was visiting his rounds of his camp he discovered the rear window of his headquarters assaulted, and a swarm of grayskins approaching in the glow of campfires and heard a wild confusion of musket and bayonet and wild yells simultaneously.

On closer investigation he saw a tiny host of light and drawing his revolver he called out for the strange person within to come forth.

"Come out you damned Glandelinian devil or I'll fire on you," he shouted..... As he looked inside a revolver was fired four times but no one was hit yet. There being no other sound following the revolver shots the christian general cautiously approached the window. As he looked inside there was a report of the revolver once more, and the aged general staggered backward, and fell with a bullet in the chest. As he fell he fired his own revolver at crouching figures near the window. The Angelinians who were reinforcements heard the firing of the assailants at other portions and rushed upon the Glandelinians driving them back. One of the Angelinians came upon the aged general and he was removed to the hospital tent. The Glandelinian who had mortally wounded him had escaped.....

Toward the approach of morning the Angelinians were still more harassed by another scare. The enemy were certainly busy. The scare was from a report which ran as follows:!!!

Marquette (Calaverita). July 1th. Forest fires believed to be of serious nature and spreading rapidly to many larger woods and jungles have been started here by the enemy, and are gaining swift headway despite the soldiers and citizens and prisoners who are out fighting it. A high wind on moving northward is fanning the sea of flames which is spreading to the farming regions between here and Calaverita. Farmers and citizens of small villages and towns have removed their property which they could carry by team or on their shoulders to a place of safety. Hundreds of thousands are even fleeing before the advance of the Glandelinians.

Mildred Greenburg. Calaverita. July 1th. A dangerous forest fire of over four hundred miles in extent near the city about twenty miles southeast of this city is said to be raging with the fury of a hurricane of fire and gaining such tremendous headway in spite of the efforts of the fire fighters that there is no hope of checking it and when first seen it had been burning a strip of woods about three miles in length and forty yards wide. Forest fires started by the enemy are also reported raging near Jennie Angelina hill a large elevation near the city of Calaverita fifty miles southeast of this great Calaverita city. It is said that this forest fire has been raging for over twenty days and nights making the sky glow so dazzlingly that the light is seen for two hundred miles, and this fire is gaining such headway that only a rainstorm would check it now. It is being fanned by a growing hurricane which is moving northward, and fires of great extent are also reported in a large tract of stump land at Belbellina about thirty miles west of here. Marshfield also reports a forest fire of great fury and also of another fire raging in a marsh near there. Passenger train crews it is said have forced or have been forced to light the lamps in their coaches because of the dense smoke making night darkness when they pass through the fire swept regions.

Sau Claire Calaverita. July 1th. Reports received here early to day from the cities of Angeline Fairchild, and Francis Atlanta Augusta where a deep separate forest fire fanned by a high hurricane like wind threatened to destroy a considerable amount of farm property were that the fire was practically under control. Efforts to reach the town of Logana by telephone or telegraph were unavailing.....all wires leading to that town having been destroyed by the Glandelinians.

Large fire fighting crews, prisoners forced to take part in the work, and christian soldiers and engineers in that neighborhood declared that it was not believed that any of the towns previously mentioned had been wiped out and communication was expected to be established as soon as possible, when the enemy at least could be compelled to recede. Thousands of farmers who telephoned to Angelina Fairchild last night for help signaled to day that they succeeded in protecting their property by backfiring. However it is reported that they are still surrounded by a ring of burning grass, brush, and forests of trees. In morning it was reported that the forest fires were working east of Angelina Fairchild into an uninhabited uninhabited region and with practically no wind it was expected that the flames would be under control in a short time if no more were started by the enemy.

Early in the morning while general picknell was receiving reports of the forest fires from many scouts, and signal stations and other points of vantage three columns of glandelinians who wore mostly Zimmermanian armed with many cannons and the usual black slouch hats with the long black feathers set forth at dawn to make their furrows. They entered general Cannon's christian lines at the right & upon a crossroads taking just about two minutes to drive the christians by a desperate charge from their whole position and relieve the christian general of his headquarters, and the forces of many provision wagons, much booty and many cannons and then retreat before the main line came up. However in this raid the glandelinians did not take any prisoners and one whom they had captured they had set free saying:

"Go home you dirty christian dog, and wash your face. It needs cleaning."

Ten minutes later the glandelinians the same forces halted in front of general Cannon's christian position prepared for an attack while a portion of the glandelinian force moved around to the rear. Their efficiency increased by practice they captured the general himself, set fire to his headquarters, captured thirty thousand prisoners shot down ten thousand Angelinians in the imaginary conflict that ensued and defeated the christians in less than half the time than the first affair took. Twenty five cannons and two wagon trains and a provision train with ammunition very plentiful came into their possession which they took with them as they retreated after finally releasing general Cannon taking some pity on him as he was an old man and those being human glandelinians and not assassins and murderers as other kinds were.

There was a gap of an hour. Then the jolly trio of Glandelinian forces appeared at general picknell's headquarters itself it self near Woodlawn Run. They drove in a good part of the christian line captured seventy two cannons and spiked them as they had been too heavy and ponderous to carry away. Several of them were as bold as to go right up to general picknell and politely requested matches of him with to light their cigars. They were forth with made prisoners and also given what they wished for at the time they reached the guardhouse.

The same bands fifteen minutes later were routed after severe fighting from the northwest section of the christian line and the lively skirmishes were frequent before the glandelinians finally beat it. One of the Glandelinian officers in the encounter was believed to have been wounded. The other bands of Glandelinians engaged with the successful Angelinians abandoned some very good cannons which they had captured at the first outset upon picknell's headquarters position and in neither attempt did the Glandelinians profit at this section of the line.

Violet and her sisters one day when it was reported that the enemy knowing picknell's overwhelming numbers refused to engage him at Cabanurubu and was retreating southward decided to go out scouting and see if it was true. They went down a side road and encountered no one within their view and did not see any signs of an enemy. It was evidently true that the enemy had retreated because picknell's army overwhelmed the enemy ten to one but nevertheless there was enemies lurking around when violet and her sisters did not see and one of whom have would have got them had it not been for a friend. A lone glandelinian was hiding in ambush and he saw the little girls approaching. He was not armed with any pistols but he had a long crooked knife with him which was as sharp as a razor and about two feet and six inches long. He decided to rush upon the little girls before they were aware of his presence and run them through as quick as lightning before they could do anything to save themselves. However god frustrated him. A tall Angelinian soldier happened to see him in the ambush and immediately brought his rifle to his shoulder and just as the man prepared to spring, from the ambush the soldier shot him through the head. Of course Violet and her sisters were startled by the crash of the rifle, and were more astonished and surprised to see a man leap up into the air and fall right across their path, writhing on the ground for a moment and then lay still the reason lying in his death grasp the long ugly knife still in his hand.

Violet and her sisters were shocked over their narrow escape and did not know who their rescuer was because he did not make any appearance. Of course he immediately kept himself hidden after he had shot the racially glandelinian as he did not wish to allow the little girls to see who had saved them as he was completely awed of their presence and half afraid of them also and so felt too bashful to receive any praise from these little dears.

Nevertheless violet and her sisters felt sure that some Angelinian soldier had saved them and after returning to the christian lines and reporting what they discovered they related their experience to picknell and Evans who felt sure that it was indeed some mysterious Angelinian soldier who had saved them from being massacred.

Nevertheless Violet and her sisters never learned who their rescuer was as he never did reveal himself. He saw them frequently it is true and they saw him but never told them. They knew that it was he who had saved them, and he never told them so. For his good deed he never fell in the war. All those who had shown the utmost fondness and bravery for the behalf of the vivian girls and who had befriended them on all occasions never had had luck in their lives and never fell in the war going through every battle without receiving a single scratch.....

Any times it had been reported that their best friends had fallen in the war but the rumors were only false. It had been reported many times during the war itself before it ended even that their brothers and best known friends had been killed, and especially at big girl school many of their friends had been reported dead, when later they were seen by the Vivian girls with not even a single wound.....

Jack Evans a general best beloved by Violet and her sisters never had a misfortune in his life since he knew and learned to love poor Violet and her sisters. Some declared that Evans had met some bad luck but it was not so. Of course for their defense he had been wounded many times but that was not exactly any bad luck. He never met with misfortune such as loss, sickness, and neither did he have any disasters such as meeting the annihilation of his comrades who he led in person and in battles his whole division had come through some of the worst battles without a single single loss while others came out with only remnants left. Evans never even lost a single battle.

The greatest luck he had of all however was the fortune to be their guardian and have them as his best friends. He was like a subtly loving brother to them and they were lit like sisters to him from the celestial regions. One day general Evans was sent by general vivian with an important message to Gertrude Angelina, Angelina's best of spies. It was believed by many even by poor violet and her sisters that meeting with the dangers that were sweeping all over the region he would never return.

Evans had started out alone without any escort through the territory fully occupied by the enemy. He had disguised himself so that he would not be recognized by the Glandelinians in case he was questioned. And to the Glandelinians he felt full well knew that it would be the most important thing of all to capture a christian general who turned out to be a spy. However he was mistaken by the Glandelinians for one of their superiors and so through the whole region he was not questioned..... He even succeeded in passing through the whole of the enemy's main line without molestation and clean out and then seeing himself beyond the region he had hastened his onward progress until after traveling for three days he had succeeded in reaching general Williamsburger Zimmerman's lines at which Gertrude Angelina was with his generals. Of course he felt kind of peculiar as he had not seen her often enough as yet to be so fully nervous to present himself before this little girl who was now about twelve years and a half old. However after being received kindly by general Zimmerman he told the great christian general of the reason of his coming.

The great christian general summoned the little spy himself and when she appeared he said:

"Gertrude I have a visitor for you. He just came this morning. He says he had a most important message for you."

Gertrude Angelina looked surprised and then said:

"It's strange. General Vivian usually sends a message to me himself by telegraph. Something must be the matter with the telegraphing. Who can the visitor be I wonder!!!"

"He is a good general a great service man of generals Hanson and Robert Vivian." Said general Whillinschurger Zimmermann. "You probably know that he is one of the best guardians of the Vivian girls." At first Gertrude Angeline did not know who the man may be. She tried to guess guess who their many guardians may be and finally after bringing to name every one she had personally known she suddenly remembered her best friend general Jack Evans.

"Oh! it's general Jack Ambrose Evans." She cried. There is he. I'm glad he has come in because I myself have something important to tell him."

"He's here right in my headquarters." Said the great distrust inn general who was now concentrating his biggest forces with the intention of striking the besieged at Virginia Gordon run. "He came to see you on important business."

The little girl was glad before Evans who greeted her cheerfully and then when they were alone Evans seating himself at a table with her on the opposite side handed her the envelope which general Vivian had given him to dispatch to her. She glanced over it carefully, and then nodded.

"I see what he wishes." She said with a twinkle of her eye which looked really mischievous in her always smiling face. "Well Evans I am way ahead of your general. He did not tell you what this was did he?"

"No and I even did not have time to look at it though he had told me I should do so if I needed to in case of great danger." Answered general Evans. "I passed through the enemy's lines without discovery and adventure. He wishes you to do what is written on that letter."

"I have gotten ahead of your general." Said Gertrude Angeline with her continual smile which Evans believed never left her face since he first saw her. "I have a couple of packages that I'm sure he would like very much to get possession of. If you successfully convey these packages in general Vivian's lines, the enemy will never be able to either break the siege of Anna Maria, Francis Atlanta, and Vivian Wickey, which Zimmermann and his high generals are making simultaneously. These are the very things he had wished me to obtain in this letter states, and I have done so before he even thought it best to ask me to do this. Do you think you can successfully reach general Vivian's lines. I wish if possible that you do your best to avoid any enemy army on your return."

"I do not think I can do so." Answered Evans. Brigano is occupied by large Glandelinian forces, Francis Atlanta is also occupied by the Manley Indians, and other near points such as Gordon, and Francis Anna are in the possession of the enemy. My only hope is to pass through their lines successfully as I have done before."

Gertrude Angeline did not like this news because she felt that some thing might go wrong. She however had the brains of a goddess. She pondered upon the situation and then procuring a map looked over it carefully Evans wondering what she was planning.

"I have it." She said. "General Vivian is moving his army forward with the intention of reinforcing Picknell if possible so that Manley would not attack him too soon at Calmarvinda. I believe that you could get through successfully if you follow my plans. From Zimmermann's lines to Calmarvinda there is a long tunnel through which Violet and her sisters succeeded in escaping at the time the city burned when the enemy were disastrously beaten there along the Angeline run which is called the battle of Calmarvinda battle really known as the battle of Lucille Hanley. This is a long railway tunnel and the Angolians are still in possession of it though the enemy have made thousands of fierce attempts to obtain possession or destroy it. You can reach general Picknell's lines through this and then from there race for general Vivian's lines. You can secure a handcar easily. To make sure I'll take you to the tunnel."

Gertrude Angeline hastily withdrew put on her things, and then she and general Evans started off. It was an hours ride until they came to a long railway track, and here twenty Glandelinians suddenly appeared, or what appeared to be Glandelinians but after speaking a few words with them the men halted, and saluting presented the leader who said:

"Yes Gertrude a hand car can easily be procured. General Evans can easily get through that tunnel to Calmarvinda inside of two hours." Evans was led to the tunnel by the brave girl spy and while he examined it, a large automatic handcar was brought up along the track.

"If you choose though." Began the graycoat. "A train is coming within fifteen minutes. If you choose to ride the train you'll get there quicker."

E Gertrude Angeline thought it best to have Evans board the train and as soon as an it came and Evans was on he called to her through the window and said:

"Be sure Gertrude don't come and see the little Vivian girls. They would be glad to see you."

"I'm coming on the train too in a minute." She said. "I just want to get something." And she was sure as her word and soon off they started and were soon going through the train. ... They reached the last car the view car which was crowded the train being full of Angolians soldiers who were no doubt going to Calmarvinda to reinforce general Bicknell. After an hours riding they soon came to the tunnel and it was the darkest tunnel that Evans had ever ridden through in his life, but never theless it took only twenty minutes for the train which was now running at a high rate of speed to run through, and soon the conductor called out the words:

"Calmarvinda. All off as soon as we stop. Enemy as it is rumored is attacking picknell."

As soon as the train passed through the outskirts of Calmarvinda the little girl with Evans got off and started for picknell's lines the sound of heavy firing smothering their ears. It took quite two hours before picknell's lines was reached and Evans learned that the firing was only caused by one of the usual Glandelinian raids that had been made but that the raiders were being driven back. Bicknell was first interviewed and then Evans started off toward general Vivian's lines while Gertrude Angeline remained behind to interview Violet and her sisters. Evans brought his packages right straight to general Vivian who felt proud that Gertrude Angeline had secured these most important packages and he said:

"Gertrude Angeline is certainly a clever one indeed. I can praise her indeed and I feel sure that I'm doing wrong to her for not adopting her as one of my daughters. Did she not come with you?"

"Yes she did your excellency." Answered general Evans but she remained behind in Picknell's lines to visit Violet and her sisters whom she had not seen for a long time. She told me she would come to see you in person tomorrow morning at eight o'clock eight o'clock if possible."

"Good." Said general Vivian. "I wonder what these packages contain. I will look through them and see."

General Vivian proceeded to look through his packages and the look of surprise that Evans saw in his face bewildered him.

This is great." Exclaimed general Vivian. "Old Johnston Jacken Manley plans here that if he can gather a bronze army he will spring it upon Francis Atlanta, and by moving northward, he will thence go eastward through the state of Angolinda Beldon in Calvervinda and capture the important hills and woodlands at Pizaza Run. The woods belong to a person a rich Calvervinda woman known as Marie Francis Osborne and so are called the Marie Osborne woods. If he is successful as it declares he will be here if his plans will be carried out he will drive on glorina capture Angolinda from the rear and drive all the Christian out. I must stop this plan before it is too late."

He handed the sheet to Evans and Evans saw that it was true. The other sheets contained the same thing but in different form and one was an important map which Gertrude Angeline had secured. The letter captured ran as follows:

I

I general Johnston Jacken Manley will seize Marie Osborne woods raise the siege of Francis Atlanta, capture glorina and move down upon the rear of Angolinda Agathia. If I can work quick enough all will be lost and Angolinda will be certainly glad to surrender and show that all in heaven is powerless to help them."

Johnston Jacken Manley."

Gertrude Angeline the next day she appears within my lines will be shot as a spy as she is too often spying on us Glandelinians."

Gertrude Angeline certainly saved us from this threatening disaster." "I wonder is Zimmermann knows this." Asked Evans.

"Yes." Answered general Vivian. "Zimmermann as she told me received the information and with you sending him armies he can do easily all that is needed to thwart Manley's plans. He will be able to crush any attempts of the enemy by forcing the positions at Logan Zoo Re Run, Virginia Run, and the other cities he is besieging. He declared to her that through her capturing the important papers he can prevent the enemy ever coming near to glorina until it is too late and that when they came their great campaign will end in great disaster. He also declared that he will oppose Johnston Jackson Manley should he move on to attack the besiegers at Anna Marie or Francis Atlanta, and that if general Hanson would move immediately to storm the enemy's position at John Run he could soon bring about the speedy downfall of Julio Callio and Anna which have already been besieged by the Angolians for nearly three years."

General Vivian was very glad that she had accomplished this great spying exploit and captured Manley's most important plans. He was sorry that she had not come immediately with Evans but the fact that she longed to see his daughters was evident to his liking and so he decided to wait until the morning and find out how she accomplished all this. Evans returned to general pickells lines, and he related to Gertrude the great success she had accomplished in capturing Manley's most important papers and that general Vivian would like to see her as soon as she could come in the morning....

When he had returned and let Gertrude Angeline again he found her with Violet and her sisters and they together had been talking over some thing that they did not want anybody else to hear. She was glad to see that Evans had successfully carried the plans to general Vivian and she told him how she had accomplished the work.

While in Zimmermann's lines I decided to see what the intentions of the enemy was under general Germania Vivian who was concentrating his command before a portion of Phillippshurger Zimmermann's lines and so I had started defiantly out at broad daylight. I succeeded in entering the enemy's lines without detection as I was cleverly disguised as a mischievous peasant boy whom Glandelinians hardly ever took notice of and pretending that I was looking for work I was admitted into Germania's headquarters as a port porter. It was the first time in my life that I ever came face to face with the traitor and never believed that such a handsome looking Glandelinian general could be the brother of Violet and her sisters who had become their enemy, enemy of God his parents and was fighting against his own nation.

Of course fortunately I was not discovered or recognized by this Glandelinian villain but nevertheless he pried me with I would say as it seemed a hundred thousand questions in a short hour, and finally gave me the job that I pretended to be looking for. He then asked me if I knew anything about the various Christian armies commanded by Zimmermann who was besieging Virgin Corbin and Virginia Corbin Run, and the other places, and I declared truthfully that I only knew that they were making the siege but did not know any of the intentions of Zimmermann's Lords, Counts, and other Christian generals. He then asked me if I could think myself able to spy on the Christians and I said to him pretending to be afraid;

"No sir I do not want to spy on them. They shoot, crucify, and hang spies, and even burn them at the stake."

"Are you afraid of those Christian dogs?" He demanded.

"Yes if they are mad-dogs," I answered. "How many dogs have the Christians got?" And at this silly question he laughed believing that I was stupid and he said;

"All right you clown. You can get the job you require but if I feel sure I do not need you you had better go to the Christians for a better job. Maybe they will force you to spy on us." And with this he laughed and walked out of the room. I had cleverly tricked him into believing that I was only a foolish idiot who did not know much. As soon as he left I immediately looked over the papers on his table found what I wanted and copied them. He never saw my work done so cleverly but when I did succeed in leaving his lines without detection I unfortunately happened to run into a party of furious Glandelinians wearing long black regalia and gray hoods on their heads. Realizing them to be the fierce Gargolians the only kind of Glandelinians whom I have never yet succeeded in putting terror into I decided to make a dash for liberty which I did and I tell you Evan's dear I was followed hard, and hard pressed for thirty miles before I after shooting down thirty six of them finally managed to escape them and reach Zimmermann's lines. And it was the first time in my life too during my spying exploits that I had ever encountered those fierce Gargolians. I have seen floods in pictures but with their masks on I believe these Gargolians looked more ugly."

How many Gargolians pursued you?" Asked Violet.
I do not know. Answered Gertrude. "But I assure you I had a worse time of it than any of you yet. I had to change horses ten times they became so tired out and jaded, and raced across thirteen bridges, got dumped twice into quicksand and had a difficult time of forcing my way out of the bogs got a bath in the cold waters of the Angeline Run when a bridge gave way under the hooves of my horses, and had three horses shot under me within a few miles dash."

It took me three days to escape them. Three times I was besieged in barns at which I took refuge when almost overtaken and cornered, and many times they even secured bloodhounds and signed them on about I shot them all down before they could do any harm. I was in a hunt in a woods for one whole night these fierce Gargolians never taking a single hour's rest in their efforts to capture me and once out on Kauffmann's road three of them managed to overtake me, but I shot two of them down, seized the sabre of the third and ran him through the eye with it. I succeeded however in escaping them after I reached the Mc-Holleston Run river. I raced across a long narrow pontoon bridge which stretched seventeen miles across the stream and as soon as I was across, and seeing that the Glandelinians were far behind I managed to destroy the bridge by taking the remaining powder I had and blowing up the end part of the bridge which caused the swift current of the river to tear away the rest of it and so the Glandelinians could not get across the river. To swim across with even their horses would have been suicide for the current is so swift that no one could swim before or against it and would be carried to sea without an hope of rescue.

The Glandelinians I could see by their antics were terribly enraged over my escaping them, and with cursing, vile words against me and blasphemies even they fired volleys at me almost incessantly in hope of shooting me down outright, but I was beyond their range fortunately and I was now safe on the Christian side of the stream. After all this trouble I reached Zimmermann's lines after being out once in a severe winter and then a thunderstorm. But I always do hope hereafter that I'll never encounter those Gargolians again. The Zimmermann's and Mc-Hollestonians are dreadful enough but those Gargolians to my idea are far worse. Their garb and heads shocked me. I thought at first I ran into a band of hooded mad bandits until I saw the Gargolian flag. They were worse looking than the boogymen we have read in fairy tales. I think I would sooner have an encounter with fiends than those horrid masked Zimmermannians. I wonder if they are all horsemen I intend to find out some day."

"There are hardly any infantry among them," said Evans. "They do at certain occasions go forward like infantry with the purpose of saving their horses from destruction. They are no force that the Christian generals do not think it safe to send any other Christian cavalry against them except their equal the fiercer Concentinians who are the possessors of fierce Abbiaamia. Only those kind of Christian cavalry have been known to be able to cope with the Gargolians without meeting excruciating losses like other cavalry divisions do. Germania Vivians cavalry force not at all Concentinians once engaged general pursues Mc-Hollestonian Gargolians who wear gray regalia but black hoods, and this Christian cavalry were all annihilated. The Gargolians are all good at dueling, with the lance, sabre and pistol but they have hardly ever used pistols in fights but only lances and sabres. The sabres of the Gargolians shape almost like those used by Hindus and other kinds of savage tribes in India but are longer than any common sabre known and are sometimes so long that the Gargolians have to carry them on their shoulders as they could be tripped while marching on foot when ever they do so."

They are fierce and cruel and are the Kurds of Glandelinda but they are very kind to their horses, and treat them with greater respect than any of us Christians do our own horses though we are good to them as it is.

If a man was seen using a whip on the horse of a Gargolian the Gargolian would shoot him down like a dog. If a child teased one of his horses he would tear her or him to pieces. They are a peculiar set of Glandelinians and hardly unmask themselves unless when together among their own companies, and no other Glandelinians know who they are and what their faces assemble in looks. They have the swiftest horses and can charge across a plain ten miles wide in a minutes time. Sometimes they covered that distance quicker than half a minute. Their yell is horrid and peculiar and the chants of their words seem like the fierce college yell but the words are shouted and chanted in a language that none of us Angelinians can understand. I have heard their yell only once and hope to never again. They yell like lost souls and make the din so loud that it rents the in deafening echoes and their yell can be heard for two miles. For my part I think as Hanson said these Gargolians are Glandelinians that believe in certain kinds of secret religions and acclimates and so hood themselves for disguises even so that they are not known by other sects of Glandelinians."

In the meantime when Gr Gertrude Angeline had had first even violet and her sisters had been overjoyed to see their friend who they have never seen for a very long time, and before Evans had returned to picknell's lines they had several games among themselves and then planned to do something for general Bicknell all as soon as an opportunity presented itself.

Later as the great gloriola campaign was going on now in earnest violet and her sisters desired with Evans to go to general vivian and so once more they returned and then questioned all how the battle along Journal Run had went on. No one could give any good answers but the fact that the enemy was retreating, and that the plans of Manley was being visibly overturned showed that Vivian did not lose much in his accomplishment.

So many other christian victories had occurred at many points that the little girls did not know what had happened and wondered why the enemy continued the war so long. Gertrude Angeline after her interview with general Whilliams larger Zimmerman and general vivian went somewhere else and reports soon came in by the score stating that Gertrude Angeline as many called her had fully overturned the enemy by causing them so much trouble, seizing plans, capturing even generals and causing much damage to their tents and Manley had offered a greater reward for her destruction than he had offered for violet and her sisters dead or alive.

General vivian decided that the best thing of all to upset one of Manley's best plans which general vivian through Gertrude Angeline had captured was to threaten julio Callio himself and if possible to check any attempts of picknellian to overthrow him before he got there and if compelled to do so to crush picknellian at Wickey Lanesia.

So he rel reliving reinforcements from the north and south moved on with his armies and violet and her sisters watched the scenery as they flew past riding in the autos or baggage wagons just to which they were used.

Violet and her sisters several times saw during the march the near approach of forest fires, and day by day he heard at times heavy firing which proved that glandelinian sallies were made with the intention of harassing general vivian's advances as much as possible.

Of course when generals make certain plans there are sometimes even among Angolinian soldiers some knockers and the like who would not even approve of a good plan. One evidence comes through this way:

During the time a halt was made for several hours for the main forces to catch up general Jack Evans, had went once more to see his little friends violet and her sisters, and having found them sat down in a hotel taken possession of by an Angolinian general. As he was sitting down talking to violet and her sisters about the course of the event, and telling them that he thought them to be the best of spies ever known by any one of the Angolinians who was sitting in a chair opposite suddenly got up and said excitedly:

"Talk about spies and the like you are talking through your hat. Another fool you are. This spy nonsense gets my goat. It's true those little girls before you, do a lot but there are men, even officers and generals who do a lot more than they have ever been known to you. And I don't believe they know themselves what they are spying for anyway. But I know that if--"

"SHUT DOWN" answered Evans giving a swift swing with his right with such force as to sent the man flying head first over the chair. "YOU'VE TOLD ALL YOU KNOW."

This caused immediately a sudden commotion, Violet and her sisters almost jumped up in surprise, and all the soldiers and officers in the room jumped from their seats in excitement. Half stunned, and mortified, the man quickly left the room and went outside nursing his jaw having had three teeth knocked out by the blow Evans gave him.

This gives a good proof that no one can knock the christians or the vivian girls in his presence and get away with it.

Seeing the rubbish fully ablaze and burning fast she quickly untied the knots

CHAPTER TWO

BLOODY MANEUVERS AT WICKEY L. LANESIA.

After the recent days fierce fighting on August 11th 1913 general vivian who was advancing with his armies with the purpose to aid Mansion in the siege of vivian is key discovered that the glandelinians under general picknellian were making movements in an endeavor to get ahead of him, get to julio Callio, cut through Mansions besieging lines and reinforce general Purgatorians army there. Just now however he did not have any orders to advance upon picknellian vivian did not make any attempts to stop picknellian's purpose for he knew that with the aid of general Hanson vivian's main armies who was watching general picknellian he would soon be able to frustrate picknellian and all purposes were being made for the capture of vivian Wickey and all her sections and shorten the horrible war itself. There was however a glandelinian army concentrating at a little town called Wickey Lanesia about fifty five miles southeast of vivian is key and vivian was ordered by the Angolinian authorities to move against that town break the enemy's lines in impossible and then open a direct path for a drive against julio Callio and her other sections of vivian Wickey.

The key Lanesia however was defended by one of the main wings of general Purgatorians army and this he speedily learned, though how large Purgatorians army was he could not ascertain as yet. Yet he nevertheless determined to advance against the town and if the circumstances were favorable enough to force the enemy's lines at Wickey Lanesia and capture the town at all risks or lay siege to it and blow the enemy from it. Preparations were made on the very night after the fighting with general picknellian. During the night general Hanson vivian's columns moved forward toward that direction direct for Wickey Lanesia.

Violet and her sisters were glad to see the progress the christians were making and could hardly wait for daylight to come. They had prepared their regiments of boy and girl scouts as best as they could, and helped some of the artillery men repair spiked guns which had been captured from the enemy. The little girls were loved and respected by every boy scout and girl scout in their regiments and by all the men and the nation, because they were Angolinian Princesses and when the order for the advance of the other armies were sounded by bugles and drums and salutes of cannons, and by many bands playing they were the first to be ready. They followed Hanson's columns and toward nine o'clock in the morning the whole advanced portion of the army was in motion and it certainly looked as if a whole army or nation was in motion to move against the enemy. In their beautiful purple clothes and red hats violet and her sisters looked like fairies among a great purple army and appeared to the eyes of all the soldiers seemingly as leaders of a great fairyland army. But violet and her sisters did not pay any attention to any praise offered to them. The sights of all the flags and banners were wonderful having the appearance of brilliantly colored flags among flowers among a moving field of purple columns. The divisions of brave boy and girl scouts far in advance of the moving force of christians discovered a large force of glandelinians on their right rushing forward in two directions and in a moment the whole troop headed for Hanson's moving armies, and violet and her sisters later stated what they observed.

"We had reached the little town of Marshall between Santa Claus and Santa Monica when a big force of glandelinians who appeared to be vivian picknellian's were moving against unless moving an army. General Hanson vivian was compelled to signal orders to his generals to form the army into line of battle, and then the enemy for some reason halted and stopped advancing."

It was no doubt however that to the little girls a battle at Santa Claus was brewing and as general Hanson was forming his army into line of battle as quickly as possible the vivian girls went on a scouting tour and discovered that the enemy were general Beppo Evans army and though a portion of the rebel line was falling back it appeared to suddenly shroud itself in smoke and a roar of musket uniform say. "They can discover everything because every one of the generals have immense immensescouting parties out."

B Violet and her sisters did not like to be alone for they feared it was some sort of a trick of the enemy. They knew who general Beppo Evans was, what kind of a glandelinian army he had and believing he had thrown his way into Hansons with the purpose to set on his intended advance on Wickey Laminia rode back to the Christian lines and told general Hanson what they saw, and of their suspicions.

It was evident that something surely was up, and being that a portion of his army had been struck by the glandelinians while in motion, and thinking that if something was not done quick enough a disaster would occur, general Hanson himself with a number of other generals went out on a scouting tour themselves. General Hanson himself however could not discover anything and rode back to his lines and reported to Violet and her sisters that he believed it was a sham. Violet and her sisters insisted that their suspicion suspicious was not a sham and general Hanson said:

"Well then they are preparing to make a general action against my force no doubt. I'll take a number of troops and make a general reconnaissance and..." "But it is dangerous, no dear." Said Violet, while her sisters looked on. "I had also discovered that through some reason that the whole glandelinian front for their whole length, as far as my eyes could reach in a terrible mass blaze of smoke, and there was the sound of cannon also, and explosions, and you may run yourself and your division of scouting troops into a trap and if not captured or injured bring me some sort of battle we do not wish to see or fight here. Now about one of us going. I do not need any soldiers, and I could do the work without needing to drag any Angelinian cavalry force into a storm of battle unnecessarily and I could escape. These glandelinians are probably belonging to an army we did not know of, who threw itself in our way before we knew it. I could tell by one of their banners that it is general Beppo Evans Scoodler army. But maybe they are not like the glandelinians under the Manleys and cannot read disguises or discover whether I'm a boy or a girl."

"Seeing that he was in earnest she was in earnest general Hanson decided to let her go but ordered her to take her sisters alone for safety but she said:

"Be careful in dears for all glandelinians are crafty no matter who they are. And I'm sure not one section of my army is engaged. They may have been assaulted by general Vivianias command, or his may have been assaulted by the enemy, and that may be the reason of their terrible firing so you say you see and heard. And you know if you are caught you are gone, for these probably are the worst kind of glandelinians in the whole region."

Violet promised to be careful and then went to her sisters and told them what she intended to do.

"It is a pretty ticklish job, but I guess we can get away with it all right at that," said Joice.

"We got to do something to save Uncle's army from being attacked at an unexpected quarter, or offering a disaster, like general Hanson did at Aronburg and Gandadon." Said Jennie Vivian as they were putting on the disguises. "For the glandelinian forces must be strong in numbers and if they are under Beppo Evans look out. He is a fighter beyond doubt."

Angelina Vivian admitted that too for she knew that the enemy now a days would do anything treacherous to win a victory and drive back the besiegers out of the vicinity of Vivian's key, or to prevent other armies moving to reinforce the general Hanson. When they were all ready and armed to the teeth they set off toward the place where they last saw the enemy's blazing lines. And they wished they had Gertrude Angelina, Jennie Turner and Angelina riches with them on this occasion but there was no sign of them around they were dressed as glandelinian or disloyal Galverinian peasants and hoped in this way they could escape detection. Violet and Joice were the dirtiest. Their clothes were covered with half wet mud, while their hands and faces were as if they had not been washed for weeks. The other Vivian girls were also very dirty but not as bad as Violet or Joice, and many non-combatants of a little town who had seen them pass made the slury remark.

"Those dirty little Galverinian ruffians ought to be dumped into a tub full filled with water and soap and scrubbed for a whole day. Now get out of my sight you dirty children. Why don't you go home and get a clean clothing of on and wash your selves?"

However Violet and her sisters talked right out to them and this caused the people to recognize them and then there were other words such as these:

"Be careful the enemy is here are under general Beppo Evans, and they are clever at disguise reading and you may run into trouble you would be able to get out of. Be careful."

After walking a considerable distance Violet and her sisters secured some horses from a farmer and then riding a considerable distance on horseback they came upon the point where they had last seen the enemy but not a trace of a glandelinian army was to be seen, but here and there far in the distance amid a great curtain of smoke they saw large columns of purple smoke pouring across a body strewn field, while a strange sound was heard from that direction. As the little girl heroines took the bravery to go a little further they suddenly saw a boy scout in gray uniform riding furiously toward them, and as he halted Violet and her sisters drew their pistols and shot down his horse, the boy being thrown and his hat flying from his head.

He had got up and would have fired at Violet who was nearest her him when from the boy came an exclamation of surprise, and instantly revealed before them was Angelina Aronburg. Angelina Aronburg herself or Gertrude Angelina as she called herself and she could recognize Violet and her sisters by the way they disguised themselves.

"You certainly did away with my horse!" she said almost seriously; "Go its one of yours I'm taking. As you mistook me for a rebel boy scout, pray tell me what are you doing out here so far from the lines?"

Violet and her sisters told what their mission was and Gertrude said: "I'll forgive you for the loss of my horse. I'm on the same mission. I believe general Viviania had been moving from another direction and had come into a clash with general Beppo Evans who had been advancing to frustrate Hansons intention of moving against Wickey Laminia for these men are under that dreaded Zimmermanian general. The battle had been fearful a few minutes ago, and had been raging all morning before your Uncle's army arrived here, and my ears are still ringing from the vibration of cannons that thundered all along that line of woods and hilly ground for all morning."

"Maybe the glandelinians were driven back further than supposed." Said Jennie "For we cannot see anything but the Angelinian soldiers advancing across those plains."

"We might as well investigate before we take the chances of going any further." Said Joice. "We must be cautious for if we are caught we will get the rope around our beautiful necks, or something worse." They made a thorough investigation but nothing was seen to arouse any suspicions and so gaining more courage they advanced still further, and as cautious as Indians being careful that not even a twig snapped. They all had their pistols drawn in case of necessity, they had progressed in like manner for half a mile when they came upon a certain high rise of ground. They ascended this and reaching the top were about to descend when Joice ordered them back. Her sisters obeyed but Gertrude Angelina stepped behind a tree. Then Violet and her sisters hid behind a long, log which was branchless, which was lying on the ground and discovered only fifty feet below them standing on the side of the hill a large number of glandelinian officers came from behind a bush and in their midst was a purple coated soldier. Violet and her sisters at first thought he was captured and was about to think of a plan to save him when one of the glandelinians remarked:

"Those Federals must have discovered our trick. As otherwise general Viviania would not have made that crushing attack upon Beppo Evans army and smashed one quarter of it down like grain before the thrashing machine. I wonder how far general Hanson is!"

"Oh they are regular chicken hawks." They heard the one dressed in a purple uniform say. "They can discover everything because every one of the generals have him innumerable scouting parties out."

"Yes that general Hannon! Hannon, yivian is the worst of the Christian pigs and a regular devil of a fellow too," said another officer.

"Don't you know that the two nephews are the most famous of Christian spies, and one of the greatest generals there are?"

"Sure and we hear they are impossible to capture, and impossible to defeat when in battle, as their armies are too strong. They are also dangerous to pursue as they may turn on you like a Persian lion before you expect it."

"That is right," exclaimed a captain.

"If we could catch or cause the morally wounded of that dog of a general Jack Evans we could then secure those yivian girls easily, and with them in our possession we could make general Hannon surrender mighty quick or leave that region," declared another officer.

"But general Evans is a desperate fighter and he is hard and could lack scores put onto him together and are more difficult to capture than the yivian girl friends of his."

The way the Glandelinians were talking of general Evans, and then in general excitement Violet and her sisters saw to cause commotion among the Glandelinians they pushed upon the log together, until it started rolling toward the graycoats. Down it crashed with a thundering roar, crushing bushes and twigs, and raising a cloud of dust and making a great noise as it scattered everything to the right and left. Hearing the noise the Glandelinians looked behind them, and saw the log coming and also the eight little dirty children as they appeared to be, and with a cry dashed pell-mell in several directions to escape the log. Some cursing, some shouting, and some making exclamations. They succeeded in avoiding the log, and just in time for it crashed down upon the path where they had stood carrying it all before it.

"Those boys up on the top of this hill started it," yelled the captain.

"After them," shouted the man in purple.

More Glandelinians suddenly appeared from the bushes having been attracted by the yelling, and the noise of the crashing log and seeing the eight boys up on the hill's summit dashed up yelling for them to stand there and don't dare run."

No indeed don't dare run. Of course they did run, their pistols ran and the Glandelinians were surprised to see eight of their number fall to the ground severely wounded. The twenty others gave a yell of derision however and fired back but Violet and her sisters realized the situation and had dashed on, knowing that the Glandelinians were coming. They went first, and then Gertrude after firing a few shots over the heads of the rebels followed them, dashing down the other side of the hill as fast as they could. For a moment the Glandelinians did not appear in sight, but then they mounted the summit, while to the surprise of the fugitives some others came around another direction and started up the hill to cut them off. Gertrude brought down two graycoats, and reaching the base in time to avoid the others, Violet and her sisters again drew their pistols with the intention to shoot should the Glandelinians gain on them. Seeing in the distance a long brig bridge of wood, the little girls made for it. Gertrude following and firing at the pursuers. The Glandelinians who had started up the hill turned round and followed after the fugitives, while those above now had reached the base and started opening a furious fire, but either their aim was not true or the range was too long for they did not hit the little girls, who were continually protected by a mass of trees. Violet and her sisters did not respond but dashed onto the bridge and across as fast as they could and thinking the Glandelinians were now out of sight halted a few minutes.

When Violet looking behind saw a swarm of Glandelinians approaching across the bridge as fast as they could could run. This bridge happened to be one thousand feet long and crossed the Angeline run river which was not wide at this point but very deep and in furious waves as a gale of wind was blowing.

Seeing that the foremost Glandelinians had gained upon them Violet and her sisters brought them down with well aimed shots, Gertrude picking and wounding two men. Then the little girls dashed on again and soon reached the end and recklessly in their confusion dashed through a hedged hedge of thorns that was growing in their path sustaining torn clothes and scratched, hands legs, and faces. The enemy in their mad haste, thinking they had the fugitives now, did not see the hedge and dashed into it, far fairly sprawling among the sharp thorns.

The cursing and swearing the Glandelinians set up was something awful. And with difficulty they extracted themselves, their faces badly scratched, their hands bleeding, and their uniforms almost in rags. The remainder of the party now came up and cut their way through the hedge despite the protest of the owner who came up on seeing the commotion. Violet and her sisters and Gertrude Angeline were far ahead by this time, but the graycoats recovering themselves, fired a volley and dashed off or then again. The ground which they now were passing across was quite a swampy and Violet and her sisters kept a strict lookout for quicksands as they continued on. Suddenly as they reached a certain spot

Jennie found herself slowly sinking, and grabbed for a branch of a tree but maintained. Her sisters saw Jennie's peril and despite the near approach of the pursuers, Joice, and Violet set about to rescue Jennie, while Gertrude and the rest of the little girls stepped behind some trees and prepared to hold the enemy at bay. Violet saw that the only means to rescue Jennie was by a means of the branch. So Joice climbed onto the branch, and Violet followed. The weight of the two lowered the branch so that Jennie could clutch at it with ease. Then Violet and Joice grabbed her under the shoulders, and lifted her to the branch, just as the rest of her sisters and Gertrude started firing. The three however had difficulty to get off the branch however and were exposed to the enemy but they managed to do so just as the Glandelinians came dashing up, and then they retreated. Violet and her two sisters poured a hot fire upon the foe, and brought several of the Glandelinians down severely wounded, and then followed Gertrude and the rest, and dashed down a certain road with the enemy close at their heels. Though they now emerged from the small swamp they made they still made for the open road and then seeing a field of high grass with garnations growing there made for that. The Glandelinians who were gaining on them steadily were just about to overtake them when one of the Glandelinians accidentally knocked from a low branch of a tree a large nest of yellow jackets, and another nest filled with insects called the black and blue winged sawing needles, as the Angelinians called them. These kind of insects were poisonous, the falling of their nests, and the presence of running and shouting men, and the sound of shots aroused these latter insects which were as big as dragon flies, and they went for the graycoats in a cloud like a furious charge. The Glandelinians seeing them coming toward them with a loud hum turned the other way, and if they ran precipitately after Violet and her sisters before, they now did their utmost to outdistance each other in their furious desperation to escape, but were unsuccessful.

Some of the graycoats in their utmost haste tripped one another, but they all reached a green creek with thousands of the insects in the winding about them like a rip saw, dived in, but nevertheless all were badly stung. Thousands of the insects even pursued Violet and her sisters but with her coat, and with pieces of cloth the little girls managed to beat them off, though Jennie was stung by a few of the bees. However the little girls soon recovered from their scare and changing their direction strode in the direction of the Christian lines but every now and then they glanced back to see if any of the Glandelinians were still following the way then they reached the Christian lines without their horses they were halted by a sentry, but he recognized them after a few words, and laughing quietly to himself at their queer make up allowed them to pass. Gertrude Angeline went to another point of the lines while Violet and her sisters went straight for general Hannon's tent and finding him alone related to him what they had discovered.

Then general Hannon called his generals together and there was a council.

"The only way we can continue our advance to Wickey Landina is to play a trick ourselves," said general Baldwin. "Maybe if we have a certain portion of our army pretend to retreat in they will advance to pursue that retreating body and then our main army can fall upon Bepoo Evans in full force. And we can sent a force to give those who are pursuing the maller retreating army a hot reception."

As Violet and her sisters agreed to this plan, general Hannon began to realize that this was the only way and decided to carry it out as soon as possible.

He therefore reported his intentions to general Moro Vivianina and then said as the general looked serious; "Don't be alarmed when you see a quarter of my army retreating, for it will only be a makeup to lure the other section of the glandelinian army out of its hiding place."

General Vivianina said that he would not and remarked; "If the division which is to make that show retreat needs aid in case the rebels do worse it, you may send me advice and I'll send general Hindernine to strike the flank of the advancing foe." "I'll do so in case of danger," was his answer. "And don't forget that come what may you are not to desert your attack on general Picknellian, or Beppo Evans until either one of them retires. And the glandelinian army who is in front of me has to be forced at under any conditions."

General Hanson then assembled all his officers and telling them his plans, ordered general Charles Brown to make the trick with his own army. In half a day about seven hundred horse and thousand sharpshooters were ready, and toward evening the whole one quarter of the army of general Hanson, Vivian's division was in full retreat toward Santa Monica, which a part of the glandelinian army discovered through their scouting parties. The glandelinians had an idea it was a trick on the part of the Angelinians alright, and also were suspicious of some plan that general Hanson had in mind, and when morning approached general Hanson Vivian got a surprise as he concentrated his main army at Santa Monica. At ten o'clock August the fifteenth the glandelinians moved forward under general Gander and launched forward in two heavy columns many miles long upon the two main wings of general Hanson's army still remaining yelling like a million demons. General Hanson seeing that his plan was not working as it should, and hearing the sudden terrific roar of battle along his other two wings, sent word to general Charles Brown to come back immediately, while he sent officers to rally the retreating columns driven back by the shock of the attack, and maneuvered another portion of the division supported by a chain of cannon across St. Cecilia's Plains, and manning his biggest guns to repel any attack that might come upon him from this quarter.

The strange nature of the rear of the distant battle was enough to alarm any great general as Hanson Vivian and so he decided to have a furious counter charge made with the other forces he had with him right away, and ordered general Vivian to move against the rear of general Beppo Evans.

He sent two million, three hundred and forty five thousand, five hundred and fifty five men to engage the right of the glandelinian column advancing in long massive lines across the plains, while the rest were to attack the left and centre with all their fury. He led the Angelinians in person who were to attack the enemy's center and here the main sway of the contest began first. By the fierce and bloody assaults the enemy he advanced on the centre was three times smashed down in frightful crushing defeats, and driven back a mile, but the main section had come up at the moment and a terrific counter assault supported by a heavy artillery fire cut the christian line up and threw it into terrific confusion. Dashing upon the enemy's right wing the Angelinians under general Roswell Puster Johnston met the glandelinians full tilt. The fighting for several hours was fierce and extremely bloody but the glandelinian defenses were broken down at all points with terrible loss to both sides. The enemy retired about half a mile and then all that afternoon fought with frightful fury.

General Gannon was sent forward with his Winkie Abissinians and Angelinians and these made a terrific charge upon the enemy's works literally hewing their way through the desperate columns of glandelinians who soon lost all their bravery and fled. The left wing was also driven back crushed and mangled with a loss of hundreds of thousands in killed and wounded, and by the advancing forces of Vivianina which struck the enemy's rear a terrific fire was maintained upon their disordered flanks which soon completed the panic of Picknellian's glandelinians and the flight of the whole glandelinian force here became general. The battle had raged along this point from ten o'clock, until seven in the evening, but along his other two wings all the endeavors of the christians to drive back their desperate assailants was in vain. The enemy along this point had lost nearly or over eighteen hundred thousand, out of which five hundred thousand were killed, or mortally wounded. General Vivianina was then notified, and so was Vivianina, and general Hindernine was requested to go to the aid of general Hanson's left and right, and he brought up all the available forces that could be spared, but early in the fight general Hindernine fell severely wounded, and his command was soon thrown into confusion during the meanwhile general Roswell Puster Johnston, and Charles Brown's forces of Angelinians having fortunately heard the sound of the terrific battle, were advancing to the aid of the crushed and mangled lines under Hindernine, and these columns of troops as they advanced heard very queer sounds. The officers listened attentively and aroused the others when it increased. The other officers and Vivian and her sisters who were with one of these divisions heard it also, and soon the whole force was in battle formation, and no sooner had they done this, when the suspicious sounds soon swelled to an ominous roar of yells, musket shots, the clash of sabres, the ringing of bayonet against bayonet. Then came streaming toward them a force of confused Angelinian troops, and as they drew nearer enough, a frightfully big column of glandelinians was seen pouring forward against the columns of panic stricken Angelinian columns. The whole christian force pressed by to the right or swarmed with the others and were rallied, the others going to the rear in the wildest confusion, then the whole glandelinian front surged forward like some tidal wave of immense size and came rushing forward in the shape of a serpent and struck against the newly formed line with the greatest violence, and for a time literally carried all before it, divisions and brigades being shattered to fragments, and driven in dire confusion. However behind the line was an immense battery of cannon which let loose a stream of shells upon the victorious glandelinians, trees were uprooted by hundreds by the force of the explosions, big boulders were wrenched from cliffs, and everywhere terrific havoc was wrought. Never before in this region was a battle heard to make so much noise, and the hissing of the steam blast could not outdo the roaring scream of the shells as they soared through the air, shrieking and roaring, and blasting the air with their explosions as they tore through the gray columns, piling trees among them, and tearing everything to pieces. The storm of charge made by these glandelinians lasted fully thirty minutes, then came a downpour of destruction until the glandelinians were forced to recoil. Three hours after when the panic stricken columns of Angelinians were getting into shape again the firing all along the line was still going on and a fierce had been the conflict that it had threatened to rise a flood of blood and mangled flesh, and in some places the ground was covered with blood to a depth of several inches. The storm of conflict had poured among the attacking columns as if rain had come when the flood gates of heaven had been opened and not a brigade of glandelinians could face that terrific annihilating curtain fire and live to tell the tale. For hours the whole christian line had been sheeted in fire and now as the serious christian columns with their own great batteries thundering in the greatest titanic throes ever seen in gunfire of that sort began to press forward against the receding glandelinian columns the glandelinian forces under general Zephane Peck, Leopoldine who strove to cover the retreat was crushed and mangled with a score of their generals down killed or wounded and they fell back in panic before the advancing christian army. Fortunately however it was only general Picknellian's army that had engaged Hanson and whose armies had extended their main wings and stormed for hours with destructive attacks and attacks and masonry and cannon firing and which had shredded the christian lines in too bloody a manner to relate.

The battle of Santa Monica had been a christian army victory for the christian army and the glandelinians knowing Hanson's intention retreated toward Wickey Landina with the purpose to defend it. When the christian armies were sixteen days later nearing Wickey Landina without further opposition, general Paragaterian and Francis Stank at Vivian's fifty miles away became alarmed for it was also rumored that general Francis Concentinian Abouburg was advancing to help in the siege of Wickey Landina.

Not only the whole Glandelinian army at Vivian was at stake with so many christian armies now moving for it, but the entire Glandelinian Empire and Tribulation Congresses in Galvernia also, if the Angelinians should capture Wickey Lansina and open a path for direct advance of advance of Concentinian Aronburgs army. General Purgatorian felt also that he and his whole army was at stake and sent envoys calling upon either of the M Manleys. In the Name of Satan to go against Viviananna, Concentinian Aronburg, or the two Vivian generals, and other christian armies, but the envoys could not pass through the region of Galvernia where so many armies of the Federals were, and were mortally wounded when attempting to flee before a party of pursuing Abbleannans.

Soon general Viviananna was the first to arrive, and closed in upon the city of Wickey Lansina held by the Glandelinians under general Gladonia Cannonia. It held out however, and for three days and nights the city and the enemy lines were under a storm of shell fire which played more havoc with everything in the city and the enemy works worse than the ravages of a tornado.

The Glandelinians then made a desperate assault and drove Vivian from his positions and captured some of his artillery and it looked as if the siege was broken. But general Viviananna in advance of the main army of Hanson, Vivians came up two days later and the siege was resumed with redoubled tightness and with a redoubled artillery fire. Soon general Cannonia Gladonia who held Wickey Lansina so bravely and doggedly with his five million five hundred thousand men he had been shut up in a circle of christian cannon, and with the help of his army destroyed, the city battered into ruins or on fire, his works blown in the air committed suicide rather than surrender. General Leopoldine, then was in command and resisted most tenacious against the siege, until the arrival of general Hanson's army. General Vivian was then ordered to make an assault upon the badly battered works. This was done in fine style.

But it was repulsed with frightful slaughter and general Vivian killed ten of his generals mortally wounded. General Vivian was horrified at this disaster and the commanding with the aid of general Hanson's guns now being placed in position became annihilating. This continued without results for three days, in which mean while general Leopoldine sent a frantic appeal to general Manley or Beppo Evans to come to his aid. All the Glandelinian general generals still surviving, and who doggedly resisted the bombardment except Leopoldine held their breath in fear of a terrible disastrous defeat. Even all of the christian nations were waiting in eager hope that it soon might be the end of the deadly war and all eyes had been for months been turned to the Court of the city of Glandelinia itself. Should Vivian Wickey fall, the whole of Julio C Galvernia would fall with it. And the only way of this result was the capture of Wickey Lansina to open a direct path for the advance, and this town was more stubbornly defended than general Hanson had supposed. Even while Wickey Lansina was so strongly besieged Glandelinian messengers had succeeded in getting away in disguise and arrived at the main armies of the Manleys sixty miles away imploring one of the great generals to come to the aid of the stricken Galvernia city, but he could not do so for the great christian armies under Concentinian Aronburg and Wic-Hollister by intermingling barred his way and was pushing him steadily in a slow retreat toward Francis Atlanta. One of the Manleys had even before this managed to send a army of seven million men under general Kenneth Estrabrook to aid the besieged, but this army got struck a blow by the suddenly arriving christian army under Jimmie Vivian, and had been crushed to fragments long before now. At the city itself the whole siege and battle line of artillery was a magnificent spectacle as far as eye could reach, and for every time a battle by infantry raged you could see the dense columns in charging formation, the clash of gleaming bayonets, sabres and pikes. Indeed the whole surrounding country seemed covered in clouds of battle smoke the artillery fire of the besieging christians being terrible and incessant. Finally in September general Vivian Viviananna beheld new Glandelinian forces descending the hilly region far to the rear of the besieging army and he could scarcely believe his eyes.

When the army of his own army had spread out in the fields he would not believe that they outnumbered him, but general Leopoldine had received aid from general Estrabrook Johnston this new army being nine million six hundred thousand strong. Yet he was bound to capture Wickey Lansina at all costs and warning general Hanson of the new army by wireless signals sent large forces of Wickey Abledunkilians and some others, and Concentinians, to repel the advance of these Glandelinians, should they attack, but the new army did not as yet attack, though along the siege line the roar of battle and cannonading was still as continuous as the roar of successions of heavy seas breaking against the breaker during the hurricane.

General Vivian Johnston, notified general Viviananna of something wrong, and the latter also discovered suspicious movements among the enemy of the besieged and redoubled the strength of his offensive, and soon again his whole line was in action against the city works and its defenders, and from many messengers general Viviananna learned that a series of forces of men nine hundred thousand strong were pouring forth from the right of the rebel positions to make a fearful assault, and that the enemy's battle line was almost impossible to approach, without danger of annihilation for the scout forces. Even they predicted that large forces of the enemy had been changing their course, and that the new army of the enemy under Estrabrook Johnston was threatening to move against his flank, and engage Hanson at the same time. General Viviananna decided to guard against this, around his whole rear, and placing the soldiers on their guard, and supporting them by the reserved batteries of three thousand thousand cannon, so as to crush down any attack that would come upon his rear.

General Hanson from his own positions had observed the approach of the new army of Glandelinians and to learn what manner the enemy intended attacking him or Viviananna he decided to again send Violet and her sisters in disguise as usual to find out. Of course Violet and her sisters at this critical moment had to be very careful for Glandelinians were everywhere now, and that they would be in danger of drawing a fatal fire from rebel batteries.

They went down a certain road where battle scarred and shattered hemlocks grew on either side, and she shielded by these tall trees, they felt safe indeed though at times a tremendous roll of musketry far in the distance would excite them to alarm at certain intervals. They had ridden for a short distance, when they turned a bend in the road and suddenly came upon a large force of Glandelinians who were all on horse back and galloping like the wind with brandished sabres. They happened to be too near the graycoated soldiers to escape, but as the few who stopped did not recognize them they continued toward the "Scoundrels pretending to be as unconcerned as ever."

"Hello kid!" called one of the officers reining in his horse. "Where in the world are you going and why don't you all get cleaned up. You look like little tramps, and why do you dare go into the midst of such a big battle field over your heads. Don't you know you are in danger of being killed?"

"We are lost in this region and are on our way to a large creek where we can clean ourselves." "Did Violet disguising her voice." "At least we can get a bath. And we did not know a battle was going on in this part as it is all quiet here. We thought it was going on near the city."

"Why don't you take a bath in this little creek running along side the road?" Asked the officer.

"The water is too cold." Said Violet.

"I thought you dirty little boys were afraid of cold water all right." Said the officer with a laugh. "Seen anything of the Vivian Spies?"

"Who the general they called Hanson Vivian?" Asked Violet. "And what is a spy?"

"Why you ignorant stripling." Thundered the officer. "Do you mean to tell me you don't know what a spy is you little fool. A spy is a man who listens to the conversation not intended for their ears, who steals our plans, or who double crosses us. But there are four or five of them known as the Vivian girls, mere children. Sometimes they are accompanied by Annie Aronburg, Jennie Turner and Angelina. Have you seen them. They are known to be very pretty girls!"

"I have never knew the yivian girls were five in number." Said V o v Violet not answering the question. "But maybe they will pass you before long as I know they will spy on you. Go down that road to the right, and maybe you will catch them by and by." "Huh."

The officer looked at her long and then remarked;

"They seldom come by roads and they are too smart for that. We are looking for them and expect them from that field yonder."

"Well I guess we will have to be going." Said violet anxious to get away. "I and my comrades are eager for a nice bath."

The officer paid no attention to their remark but said;

"Maybe for the service of Lancelinia you would be great boy scouts and could help us to capture those yivian girl spies. As mostly girls are afraid of boys. Do you want to help us?"

"AND GET SHOT! No indeed. We don't want to tackle spies of any kind for they can shoot like the dickens. Those yivian girl spies as you call them are not afraid of boys or even any men or even you and prove it."

"I guess those little dirty faced boys are afraid of their own shadows." said the officer to himself as he ordered his men to ride on and rode off. "They are certainly timid."

"WHEN--but that was a narrow escape." Said violet as she and her sisters rode on. "We walked right into those Scoundlers. I'm glad they did not recognize us."

The little girls now rode on toward the ever increasing sound of battle in the new direction and as soon as the trees began to grow less and as they approached the region of the enemy's new encampments they saw a never ending maze of Angelinians and Glandelinians mingled together in a death struggle, and further in the distance a crashing roar of cannons and musketry almost stunned them. However the little girls halted and violet alone went forward cautiously and suddenly saw a large group of graycoats moving forward toward their own hiding place. Violet and her sisters wondered how they could pass them.

"If we had secured a pass from that officer I had the conversation with it would have been easier than this way." Thought violet. "We will have to try another way."

She went back to her sisters and told them what she had observed.

"We will have to make across the meadow in the other direction then." Said violet.

They remounted their horses and gave galloped toward the meadow and then again dismounted, and tied to their horses too trees but out of sight of the enemy.

When they went on and as a swarm of graycoats suddenly arose in front of them and opened a rolling musketry fire toward the charging Christians the little girls dropped out of sight, and waited until the Glandelinians who would pass. The retreating line was quite a slow polk at that for they were fighting stubbornly as they retreated and violet and her sisters wondered if they could be enabled to pass here without doing something desperate. Violet and decided to do so and told her sisters of her plan.

"We will have to be quick and see that their leader does not hold or let his pistols go off when we seize him." Said violet. "This attempt in the midst of a raging battle field is very dangerous, and might lead to our end if we are not careful." Yet however they decided to seize the leader who was a captain and who alone was falling back directly upon the spot where the little girls were hiding. They waited until he came close then the seven like wild cats sprang at him simultaneously and bore him to the ground before his followers observed what was going on. Violet suddenly grabbed his pistols out of his holster and leveling one at his head said;

"If you utter a single sound this gun will respond. Lie down flat please."

The Glandelinian captain did as he was ordered and then one of her sisters gagged him with his handkerchief while which Catherine found, while Jennie and Angelina bound him tight. Then under fire they all dragged him to a lane and placed him in the tall grass. Just as they had done this and started forward again, they came upon a group of Glandelinian officers, who were watching the progress of the battle at a safe location (Maybe they were afraid to die) and who were in conversation.

"Well this is serious indeed." Said one of the generals. "The best time to make the attempt to relieve the besieged is as soon as possible. We can send a large force upon the rear of General Hanson's army while our main forces are in action with his frontal positions and then rout him and prove prevent him from helping general yiviananna, and capture that besieged general's army, and probably that part of a Hanson yivian too."

"But we will have to be cautious as there are many boy scouts signalling to every Christian commander, and one of these squads may see out flanking parties too soon, and signal the danger." Said another general.

"And we got to look out for a certain number of famous spies known as the yivian girls. They are like all the others in time of escape."

"Yes I know that." Said the chief commander Estrabrook with a frown. "They are dangerous and I would shoot them on sight."

"Anyhow we will have to look out for them as they are sharpshooters and quick at it too." Said another officer. "But as to this plan. We could get our brigades around to Treacins Creek by the east bank and descend upon general Hanson's rear and rout him. Then as for general yiviananna."

"The noise of all the firing despite all going on would arouse him." Interrupted interrupted another general whose name was Scorer. "We ought to attack the whole flank simultaneously and beat them all."

"Yes I forgot that indeed." Said the main general. "As general yiviananna is a most ferocious fighting and more harder to beat than one of the other Christian general's we ought to attack the whole flank."

"But couldn't we somehow get upon the flank of the Christians under those yivian girls and surround and capture them all?" Asked a lieutenant. "It is a very dangerous thing I know and all are mounted and led by ferocious warriors as the yivian girls, besides general Poney Penguin, and other generals."

"Yes I am surprised or so surrounded they may surrender." Said another.

"But the yivian girls do not lead divisions of men, but only regiments of boys and girls only." Said Estrabrook. "And Christians surrender? Why you poor boob they would rather be massacred than lay down their arms. They will never surrender unless their Government are captured and a just now it would be an insult to ask them to do so. They are as reckless and as ferocious as tigers even worse, and if they are cornered or surrounded, they would fight with white fury. I know their nature too well."

"Well what ever their nature is a flank attack will decide the battle." Said General Leopold. "We got to keep general Hanson from pressing too closely upon the key Lancelinia, or for if that town is captured there will be no means what ever to check the advance of the biggest armies of Federals against yivian key."

"Well I think it is the best plan." Said general Estrabrook. "As for those yivian girls they would make an important capture as they are the Little Princesses of Angelinia and if we did get them into our power, power, the whole Christian army would be beaten, and maybe in their desire to get them back again would abandon the siege, and perhaps we could."

"CRASH-----BANG-----N-----N-----N-----"

Instantly a great cloud of smoke arose in front of the little girls, they saw two generals stagger like drunken men and just as the little girls in confusion darted from their hiding place the two men dropped. For a time all was well the generals having not seen them, but a little later the little girls in looking back saw a considerable number of Glandelinians pursuing them.

"Bang went another shell, but the leader of the pursuers cried out;

"Never mind the darn shell. A After those strange dirty looking kids quick!"

The little girls now ran like mad but the Glandelinians were gaining on them swiftly while another shouted;

"They were spying on us. I saw them hiding near our generals. They must not get away. After them quick!"

Down through the lanes the soldiers dashed pell-mell, and some of them jumped upon their horses without taking time to saddle them. They yelled for a large number of the retreating privates to follow and now there was great excitement.

In the meantime Violet and her sisters ran full speed like rabbits across the meadow and seeing the glandelinians not coming at break neck speed fired rapidly as they they could while running, and brought down seven of the rebels. But the survivors did not slacken their speed and would have ridden the little girls down, had they not sprang out of the way. The little girls fired again and again with utmost steadiness bringing down nearly eighteen glandelinians of the seventy seven pursuers, then in the confusion raced to where they had left their own horses, and finding them jumped on before the rebels came up and dashed away. The remainder of the glandelinians came after them dashing in several directions with the purpose to head the little girls off from escape.. but the little girls halted for a moment and fired again bringing down an officer, and then away they dashed once more.

"After them y" yelled a captain. "Head them off they must not escape." The same glandelinians dashed after them at a thunderous gallop yelling and opening a withering fire. A shot struck Jennie in the hand leaving a painful and serious wound, but she kept her seat. The glandelinians were fast riders, and as Violet and her sisters saw them gaining steadily they urged their horses to their fullest speed. Still after them sped the glandelinians at a more furious rate. In the meantime the glandelinians whom Violet and her sisters had first encountered were returning from their scouting tour which they had been accomplishing, and hearing the commotion in the distance ahead of them, galloped on faster to learn the cause.

"Those boys are pursued." Yelled the leader. "And maybe they are the spies I come on and close in on them before they escape."

The glandelinians dashed forward to obey and when they came near enough they closed in on the fugitives surrounding them on all sides. Carbines were leveled at Violet and her sisters, while the rest of the pursuers came up.

"They are spies." Shouted the officers in charge, dashing up. "They must have heard the conversation of our generals and not two of his staff. To the death house with them without without delay."

Violet and her sisters still on their horses were led away under a strong guard of glandelinian cavaliers and soon they were recrossing the meadow.

"You will get it." Hissed one of the captors. "You fool fooled our general by your glib sayings but now you are caught. Spies die by torture especially when they are kids and there is the house over yonder."

Violet and her sisters saw the building which was a two story affair, being of wood, and having a flat roof. It was on the other side of the meadow not far from the firing lines, which was half a mile away. Thither they led Violet and her sisters, and took them inside. They were stripped by force of all their weapons, made to remove their disguises so that they would be recognized in case they did succeed in escaping, and then six chairs were brought up into a small square room.

Then made Violet and her sisters sit down except Joice, and bound them hand and feet to the chairs. Then Joice was more securely bound and placed in a place in a corner. One of the glandelinians said something to her and she only stuck her tongue out at him. One of the glandelinians then left but soon returned with a pail full of yellow and red sulphur and a large tin box. This was set in the middle of the floor and prepared for being burned. The windows were then closed tight, and the door covered with a sheet so that none of the flames would escape. The glandelinian proceeded at this work without saying anything at all to the little girls. Then after setting fire to the sulphur they went out and closed and locked the door. As they were gone Joice desperately made efforts to undo the knots, but the glandelinians had tied them too securely. Her sisters also strove in vain to free themselves but the knots became more tighter. The room was rapidly filling with the poisonous smoke and Violet and her sisters were almost choking. Suddenly Joice hit upon an idea. She rolled herself toward the burning sulphur and rising carefully but slowly held the rope around her wrists over the little tongues of flame shooting up. The rope burned through in a minute and Joice forgetting that the ends of the rope were smouldering flung the remains in a pile of rubbish and choking from the fumes as she got up, coughed so violently that in her excitement she accidentally upset the tin box containing the burning sulphur upon the rubbish. She tried in vain to put out the fire which she accidentally started and seeing she was unsuccessful lost no time in her other plans.

Seeing the rubbish fully ablaze and burning fast she quickly untied the knots of the ropes around her sisters which held them to the chairs, and freed all except one, who themselves strove to stop the flames but in vain. Jennie was more securely fastened to the chair, and as Joice's finger fingers were not strong enough to loosen the knots she picked up a piece of glass lying near the fire and cut through the ropes that bound her sister to the chair. Half choked by the blinding smoke she cut the remainder of the knots around herself, then seized a large piece of wood lying in the room, and strove to bat out the fire but it burned fiercely and fiercely. Realizing they must get out or smother, Joice picked up one of the chairs and hurled it with all her might against the window. The smoke coming in the thick volumes not set them all too quickly and the more they coughed the more they took in and choked. Joice missed the fling of the chair she threw hitting the wall beside the window with a crash, and breaking it all to pieces and smashing down a bushel of plaster.

Her sister Violet picked up her own chair and threw it, but gasping for breath, and a hocking violently from the smoke, she missed her own aim and almost hit Joice in the head. The chair when crashing into the rubbish, scattering the burning stuff around. Joice took up another chair and staggering nearer, aimed a mighty blow at the window. Out went the pane, as the chair and chair together. Violet who was choking the most then sprang for the window coughing and gasping but sank to the floor. Quickly Joice seized her, and lifting her up managed to get her over the sill and let her tow her three feet to the ground, where she sank gasping for air and choking. Jennie was also overcome and almost unconscious, and Joice had to do the same thing for her, which lost much time for her own self. Angelina, Catherine and Hattie were able to jump out. Then Joice sprang out and dashed to Daisy's room for several minutes they lay there fortunately in high grass and weeds for many glandelinians were running up at seeing the clouds of smoke pouring out of the window.

"Fire, fire" Yelled one. "Fire, fire, fire." The glandelinians who first came up, broke down the front door of the house, and then rushed into the house which they found filled with smoke. Several simultaneously made for the room where they saw the gleam of a fire, and burst down that door too with the butt of their rifles. The room was a furnace. From floor to ceiling the flames leaped and roared, and tongues of flame leaped out the open doorway, driving the glandelinians back.

"Go for the hose." Yelled one of the officers. "And search for those little firebugs. They have escaped." The men ordered to do so were some time in bringing in the hose which was fixed to a little water main outside, and then the hose was brought into the building, and the stream turned on the fire, which was spreading along the ceiling of the corridor. The water was poured upon the flames in full force, but it only made steam, and the flames unknown to the Glandelinians had already spread between the walls of the whole hall. The blaze was beyond control for that one hour, and the glandelinians were soon driven out by the smoke which came from the cracks in the walls and floor.

In fifteen minutes the hall was an inferno, and the glandulitians were driven from the house above them. After recovering their breath Violet and her sisters looked up and saw the leaping flames above the outside wall of the house, and crawled from it, for fear of it tottering upon them. Not far away they saw their horses, and they went steadily toward them. Their hearts beat fast and loud as they neared the horses, for they saw traces of glandulitians everywhere in the net of scorching.

"Look out that they don't see us; as they are surely looking for us," said Violet.

They quickly mounted their horses, and galloped swiftly away, but the glandulitians saw them, and started firing, just as the horses came in, a blazing wreck.

There were three good galloping vivian girls, the centipedes of hell, and they are escaping. Houted a Scodder officer. After then they must not get away. Many of the Scodder glandulitians mounted their horses and set off after them at race horse speed. Jennie was suffering from the wound in her hand, and was forced to bandage it in a clean handkerchief. Unhired as they were, they were in quite a fix, but nevertheless they were bound to escape their Scodder pursuers. Whistles whistled about them incessantly, and they were compelled to lay on their horses' necks to keep from being hit. A perfect swarm of Scodder glandulitians on swift horses were now racing after them at a tearing speed, but the little girls seeing these champions dash in the distance in a haze of smoke, did not give up hope, and tried to increase the speed of their horses.

Yet most of the enemy was well mounted, and seeing that the Scodders were fast galloping on them, they cut across a meadow, their horses galloping on at frantic speed. Suddenly far ahead Violet and her sisters saw a large body of vivian Abyssinians, and shouted with all their might to attract their attention.

General Walter Jennings happened to be in command of this body of Abyssinians and he being attracted and seeing the truth shouted to his men:

"To the rear, rebels! Those rebels are gaining on the vivian girls forward."

With a large shout the foremost of the Abyssinians cheerfully foredoomed full tilt toward the enemy or who were overtaking Violet and her sisters. The Angolians followed with great fury, the Abyssinians checking the pursuers by a rebounding and deadly volley with a cry of joy. Violet and her sisters dashed toward the rebels, but with fierce yells the enemy came on, opening a withering fire and every one of the first column of Abyssinians soldiers were felled down, and the seven vivian girls were seriously wounded, their horses being killed under them, the horses and their riders sinking to the ground in heaps. For a time as the Angolians closed with the rebels, there was fierce fighting, but being outnumbered by a much larger force the Angolians were compelled to retreat, and after they dashed the victorious Scodders and some of their dismounted men again led Violet and her sisters prisoners.

"They are the most reckless pursuers I have ever seen," said Walter Jennings, "and they have the vivian girls again in their possession." After then dashed the rest of the glandulitians, pursuing them within clear sight of the Christian lines and almost overtook them, bringing the red purple coats down by the score. Yet a full regiment of Angolians came dashing forward at this point, and charged the enemy, pouring in a hotter fire. A terrific conflict ensued. Walter Jennings was killed, and as the regiment made another onset, and the sound of this conflict brought more and more on the run, but again the enemy were victorious, though Violet and her sisters were fortunate to be taken by the Angolians during the frightful melee. Violet and her sisters were brought into the lines, and wounded as they were, demanded to be taken before General Hanson, which was done, and they reported what they had heard. Hanson noticed that the whole seven of them were severely wounded, bleeding from several gashes in their faces, and all over, and ordered a surgeon to attend to them right away.

"Come here Jennie, and I'll dress your wound," said Hanson to his Jennie personally in his own care. "How did it come you and your sisters are wounded?"

"We had a nice time of it in getting away," she answered. "We were discovered and pursued, and one of their bullets hit me in the hand at the start. We were then caught and placed in a death house, where John worked himself free, set us free, and accidentally fired the house. We got away, but were chased again, Jennings coming to our rescue, and in the fight we received these wounds."

"Well, I guess you are now realizing what war is all," said Walter Jennings. "I bet you are going to back out now, after the two scouting trips."

"Well, we are not going to continue unless it is more sary and no one can command us but father," said Violet in a dignified tone. "And we are not afraid of him or his men either. In fact we were a asked to go out on a scouting tour and not to spy. We could not dare enter the foe lines."

"You are brave little girls all right anyway," he said. "But can you face any danger without flinching?" But a doubt of the enemy attacking at the time was mentioned because they later you learned their plans, and tell us.

"But they may attack earlier or later," said Hanson. "Or maybe on the time of a rebellion in this, to show they were not whether they are discovered or not. But they will probably do so now in every other manner."

From a distant looking woods after coming there quietly, and without any to keep away from the first line, on a slight effect the rebels and some were suffering. She and her sisters decided to take a bit of advice, as they were not feeling and could not get a bit of rest and comfort the boy about it. Regiments.

"Forward then will just like us do," said Violet. "I don't like them with the boys, and follow every direction that General Jack Evans gave us in hand glad. If they worry about our horses tell them it is alright, that we are just waiting, and will be with them in a few days."

The officer agreed to do her bidding. About eight o'clock that morning the flank was full on the ground, but a few minutes later General Toby Jennings was ordered to withdraw the regiments of boys, recently under Violet and her sisters from his right, and take them on the center, to do some signifying for all they were worth. He reported the order to Violet who said:

"With us it is alright, as soon as attack soon, and on the very hour we stated it was coming, and it is best for you to obey and support the flank with all willing so to give information. But this does not mean my boys to withdraw. I want them to stay doing with our girl scouts."

"Night away," answered Toby as she got off from the camp. "Your sisters are lying down and resting themselves I suppose."

"Yes, but I'll away home there," she answered.

After studying and receiving her order, she galloped away. After eleven o'clock they were now almost upon the center and heard suspicious noises like mill a millimeter walking or running in quick time. However she and her sisters would not take a bit of rest now, and their officers ordered the cavalry forces of boys to halt, these obeying, and soon they were signifying with all their might. They had discovered seven million one hundred thousand of the enemy advancing, and by their signals round the flank, and the Angolians prepared to meet the foe, all the cannon being swung round, and the battle was on in this location also.

Despite the thick smoke at other points of the battle field, the Angolians were able to see the enemy well, and observed the glandulitians were advancing swiftly but cautiously as well. It happened that the enemy was deceived, as to the number of the Angolians and being almost like a strength. However after the time had succeeded, Walter Jennings division which kept its position for an hour and a half under heavy fire had now been compelled to withdraw. For a time Hanson's whole flank, held its ground, General Frank W. after it also standing another portion of the Christian flank with the help of General Collins divisions, and on, and he pressed the main columns of the enemy through their front line and turn numbers.

The whole gray line was now within sight of the whole Christian flank and all at once the whole Christian line seemed torn by flashes of fire, and the glandulitians fell appearing in hundreds of thousands. Though hundreds of thousands had been forced down the survivors rushed forward with a yell.

"Forward boys, avenge your losses," were the cries of their leaders as they rushed on through the deadly storm.

"That we will," shouted the men, and on they rushed, and during the fighting another Christian division was forced to yield, and now the whole Christian flank was broken down. For when the force of the glandulitians assault made itself felt, while their advance also by inspired the other combatants, and the a a design progress General opened fire with all his biggest guns pouring shells and double shot shotted counter point blank. The chief leader of the glandulitians was killed but this did not demoralize them, and they only pressed forward, counting the Christians to retreat in confusion. Twenty large glandulitian columns were advancing, with the most steady step, and now straight on for General Kinderhook's front.

They got near enough, the noise was as if the enemy was running into the very jaws of destruction, for glandulitian divisions raised one thousand cannon upon the glandulitian columns, and hammered away, tearing their line with frightful effects. The assaulting fire was indeed appalling, and the glandulitians were dashed down at their horses, and halted under slight covering.

"Forward boys, forward," shouted their leader as the terrific firing of musketry seemed for a moment along Kinderhook's front especially the left. "We must carry these guns."

Recovering from the consternation the gray columns swept forward again, the glandulitians put a of smoke along the Christian line turning into a sheeted pall, and no sixty more cannon were brought into action the unfortunate glandulitians went down in more frightful numbers. The rear of cannon along Kinderhook's front still was over but now they again suddenly opened a most fearful fire, and showers of shot and shell and grape were now coming along the foe, who continued to advance nevertheless. One of the gray columns got very near (shout) and opened a most fearful counter fire, and down the purple coats themselves down in fearful numbers.

The enemy were quite near now, and seeing the seriousness of the situation were a moment more brought up and turned fully upon the nearest columns. When a flank fire was opened up on them but the survivors reached the center and made a more furious and blood onset, attacking the Christians with furious desperation and merciless fury.

The frightful cannon continued on both sides, and the severe fighting continued for an hour until the end of the assaulting column was rushing up and plunged

He fortunately noticed the purpose and realizing the previous disaster, made an unsuccessful attempt to turn Estabrooks left flank, but the heavy and bloody assault of the enemy came too soon, and was so persistent and vehement, that other large bodies of troops had to be brought up, Pickens' brigades receiving the brunt of the fiercest part of the attack, but the enemy held his own formation unbroken, and after a still more persistent and bloody conflict, swarmed over the works, pressing on still more furiously, and overlapping the right and left, drove them in on general lines and made a sudden and most determined rush upon the whole line from three points, but general Barney Blodgett, and William Blodgett his brother of the Glandelinian ninth corps with many other officers were killed in the bloodiest part of the fray, as they leaped the works with their men. The carnage was now redoubled.

The dreadful discharge of musketry that now came unexpectedly from the wile of Russell Hunter Johnston a line surprised and demoralized the assailants, and some of the Glandelinian cohorts abandoned the works they had carried, while thirty thousand Glandelinians all dead, lay piled up in heaps on both sides of these blood covered works. This tremendous slaughter enraged Estabrooks, and while he resumed the assault he sent a hasty appeal for a hundred thousand cavalry men.

In the meantime three million, three hundred thousand Glandelinian were thrown in heavy column formation against Tony Sangaline right wing not far from the Big Girl Knoll road with frightful violence. General Judson Halford line with many divisions of Glandelinians also attacked Pickens' right wing with morbid fury, and a dozen more divisions were ordered up from the right of Hanson, with column and sent to Sangaline aid, the fury of the conflict grew wilder and wilder.

Three more Christian generals were killed there being James Cranberry, Frank Turk, and Thelma Fellows. Estabrooks all this while was making the most vehement efforts to break through the solid purple line, and in this furious onset on the left of the rebel line general Halford fell mortally wounded. Russell Hunter Johnston had revealed the first knowledge of the results of the battle that day, and he concentrated so heavily that now despite the carnage, the enemy could not progress any further, than the first line of works he had captured, as the Angellians were maintaining their positions at all hazards, and repelling the fierce assault with all their might. Maurice Costello who at this time was moving up his division, also saw the enemy advancing to attack his force and extended his own line so as to put a hot fire upon the foe and hurl the rebels back if possible. The assailants moving to attack him now were rushing forward with blood curdling fury, but despite the speed of their onrush their whole line of attack was torn by a ravaging fire, and the ground along this point of the battle field was also fairly strewn with piles and shadows of dead and wounded Glandelinians. In meeting this assault two Christian divisions a hundred thousand strong each were shattered to fragments by the fiercest onslaught but the enemy suffered heavier loss in meeting a sudden and fierce annihilating fire, but the losses of the survivors, were bent on avenging their losses and resumed the attack, rushing furiously to the attack yelling like demons. Again the whole Christian line poured upon them a pitiless storm of bullets and grape and canister which dissolved the nearest column into fragments but nevertheless on pressed the survivors with relentless fury over the piles and mounds of dead and wounded comrades, and division after division surged above the works only to also melt away into pieces.

Yet on pressed the surp survivors but the Angellians despite the odds stood to their works manfully and stubbornly and poured in a fiercer fire, and no force that the line of assailants was torn anew for an hour this furious kind of fighting raged on both sides of the works and with the greatest ferocity, and with unceasing and murderous violence, but fortunately general Costello with the help of a large division of Winkie Abyssinians cleared his own front after a still more murderous fight, and he managed to turn upon the flank of the main line of rebels with more tremendous fury than the assailants were attacking themselves, and drove the Glandelinians back pell-mell. Finally more of the multitudes of the dead and wounded Glandelinians lay beside the works and outside the works and again the enemy in a most staggering defeat, and recoiled inullen rage and despair.

During the scene of carnage along this point on Hanson's main left, large bodies of other Glandelinians made an assault more furious and determined on the other section of the Christian front under general Baldwin, and made as fierce attempts to carry the works along this point, but here also the line of assailants were broken to fragments and swept back with the most frightful loss. General Walter Jonina a still revealed the Glandelinian assailants. Here the bloody struggle was continued and Hanson's tangled forces which had been withdrawn in the morning were replaced by a new force, and the officers of these divisions hurried up with large batteries of artillery, and soon these guns were pouring a terrific torrent of shot and shell, but the Glandelinians under Costello Estabrooks drew back from the assault only for a moment, then he threw his divisions forward again, and attacked these Christians with hellish fury. Tanks went down by the score, but nevertheless under their own terrific artillery fire the Glandelinians continued on but were soon again forced to withdraw, but five minutes afterwards they again rushed to the attack again on with more tremendous fury.

Pickens' main line of artillery therefore was ordered up to support general

James Gannon and Walter Jennings, but on account of a terrific rain of shot and shell from concealed Glandelinian batteries that was doing horrible havoc and destruction everywhere, and therefore the guns unfortunately could not be brought up into position to fire upon the furiously attacking Glandelinians which offered such a fair mark of artillery. The whole line of Christians here had fought back and desperately against overwhelming odds, but they were deprived of the main use of the necessary amount of artillery, and which had failed to reach them and which in a case like this constitute their main strength, and therefore all their concentration could not check the furious onrush of the various Glandelinian divisions, and soon hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians began to carry the entire line of breastworks capturing three generals, and eight pieces of artillery, and mowing down thirty thousand men in a minute. The extent of this disaster was not realized at once as the terrible incident happened so quickly, and the three million one hundred thousand rebels who had made this bloody assault resumed their advance, pouring a heavy fire upon the fleeing columns before them. The enemy had now pressed the whole Christian left back for a mile. Yet on pressed the enemy when Walter Jennings seven brigades and field corps of infantry who were immediately on the left of the works that were captured drew back to the rear, and went to the aid of the retreating divisions.

As the assailants came on, the new line of Christians poured a galling fire upon the massed line of the enemy, which soon checked his advance, and threw it back once more with severe loss. During the previous days of actions, Hanson had completed elsewhere: perfect breastworks of boards and logs, and here a line of Abyssinians were stationed and mowed the grass down by the hundreds of ranks.

The Glandelinians however charged as furiously as they did before, and again the ranks in gray were mowed down in hundreds in quick succession. Yet the attack was pressed with great determination for over an hour more, and Hanson was compelled to draw out a part of Hindmarsh's brigades and sent it to relieve the terrible pressure on his left, and restore his line where the enemy under Blodgett, Halsey had carried the works. The struggle was now growing more fierce still. The enemy attacked the works the whole length with more frightful fury, but most of the rebels were exposed to the same terrific fire once more. Also a hundred other pieces of artillery swept down the enemy's front line, and soon once more the attacking force was badly broken and driven back before it came well within range of the Christian musketry. One million one hundred thousand rebels under general Shawmann also pressed forward to support the assailants who had been repulsed, and a portion of this new attack swung upon Kindersnes front, and this time the Glandelinians seem to face the Christian fire as if it was only a shower of gold, but two divisions on the right gave way and were forced to recoil. The fire along the whole Christian line was more galling and deadly than before, but on rushed the other rebel divisions yelling again like demons. Again the Christian artillery fire played upon the still attacking enemy forces with the most cruel and still more destructive effect mowing down thousands of ranks this time, but still division followed division, until a regular gray wall of human beings surged toward the works.

The Christian fire now became so terrific and incessant that for several minutes the assailants hesitated. But their leaders were bound to carry the works, and regulated the tremendous Christian fire through their glasses, but all was a perfect sheet of smoke before their eyes. A most terrific storm of bullets and shells swept all approaches to the works, but the officers inspired their men by threatening to go alone. In fifteen minutes had been a hundred thousand had been killed or wounded and thousands more remained along the wounded unable to move hand or foot. As quickly as they had been carried away during slightfalls more had dropped, and many others too badly wounded to crawl away were killed by the bursting shells. The Angellians during this battle handled their artillery like mad. Tony Sangaline worked with great energy in strengthening the long lines of troops of his own and directed his own destructive fire from all the guns he could bring up with the greatest skill, again and again sweeping down the front line of the rebels, and tearing up the whole main line. For three hours already the fierce attack had been kept up along this line, and now the action was still just as bloody. Along Hanson's new line of battle the enemy attacked with unabated ferocity. The furious attack was still kept up, the whole Christian line extending along the banks of the Wickey Lansen run, and at the center during a furious onslaught firing one thousand one hundred and fifty cannon broke a part of the enemy's line moving down two hundred thousand rebels, but it was at once restored by reinforcements, though the new force also suffered heavy loss. The bloody action extended along the whole Christian line with the same violence as, actually under Hanson personally, and the grand and furious onset was made at all the time by millions of Glandelinians, who were now fighting with the fury of desperation.

The struggle all along the line was desperate, bloody, and even merciless, and even upon Hanson right one million two hundred thousand Glandelinian under general

Claiborne and many other generals pressed forward with the same terrific fury, and during the fiercest charge which ensued to land leaped over in scores of thousands at once, but were driven back by a furious counter charge. Yet the advance of the main line was more irresistible and simply frightful and the storm and furious resistance the glandelinians met. The heavy columns were thrown upon Hanson's line with such a fury and desperation as to astonish the christian general himself. Bigger gaps were torn in the enemy's line, but the glandelinians had been reinforced by Manley and continued the most desperate efforts to carry the works, the christian artillery all this while causing the greatest destruction.

Yet the fury of the glandelinians was aroused, and soon two more christian divisions crushed and smashed to mere bits were hastily retiring on Hanson left before the concentrated attack of the furious glandelinians. Fifty thousand more wounded rebels were already carried away, and the glandelinian soldiers who carried them away risked their own lives under a most deadly fire of the christian cannoners. The main rebel force however was pressing on all along the line, and five million five hundred and seventy thousand of them had reached a large plain where beyond the strongest portion of the christian line was posted, and here they were met by a withering fire that tore their columns to fragments, and the death of one of their many generals by the many of Francis Oyster Clin resulted. The fire that swept through this dense column of glandelinians was more sharp and murderous than any other glandelinian column had met and hundreds of glandelinians went down at every step. The fire indeed was the most keen and ravaging of the whole battle line just now, and the most fierce these gray coats had ever met, and as they went forward more massive gaps were ripped in their line. Hundreds of shells shrieked and exploded among them, and the moaning of the mines and canister was weird and appalling to hear. Thousands of victims were picked out by the shrapnell, canister and mines, and yet across this deadly plain this whole wave of glandelinians rushed, many more never to return. Five thousand were mowed down every minute during the charge and seven hundred regiments were cut to fragments, but it would have been worse to stop now, and so on dashed the survivors Baldwin sent more aid to Hanson also with more of his artillery, and therefore the Angolinian forces on the edge of the plain held to their positions like demons, for they knew if their whole line would be swept back a total rout would follow even if the assaulting columns should ever take the position.

It was already one o'clock now and along this portion the battle had assumed an awful fury. The Angolinians in possession of the edge of the plain kept up the fire incessantly, and the desperate and pertinacious struggle increased with redoubled fury. Along the whole of Aronburg's line on the plain a severe artillery fire was also kept up but despite it all the large force of glandelinians had pressed or passed over half of the fields of the plain, their leaders being determined at all risks to capture the works here also and drive back the Angolinians. They did not in the least cease to regard the heavy withering fire which was so ravaging, and which thinned their line, but continued to advance, and as they came nearer, the whole line began to redouble their exertions, and still more fearful was the din. Each discharge of artillery and musketry still more intensified the dense smoke, and increased the pall to a great extent, but nevertheless the aim of the christian soldiers was still quite certain, for the gray coats soon rushing forward were picked off in masses, and as fast as they came within view. It was awful indeed. The glandelinians came in the most perfect swarms, and made a most gallant rush up to the very muzzle of the Angolinian guns on the edge of the plain giving forth blood curdling yells as they did so. On both sides of the main line of works at this portion now a fearful and most bloodiest struggle of the battle seemed to rage. But both sides made the most horrible use of their fire arms yet in the conflict, men on both sides along the whole line of the battle went down by the hundred thousand, and also all the artillery horses within sight, ammunition wagons were blown down by explosions, and others had to be dragged to safety. The gallant christian general Hanson, Lyman was the only mounted officer in sight. He flourished his hat in the air with one hand, and his sabre was in his right, and bravely he cheered his men in the face of the wildest assailants who strove with almost preternatural fury to swarm or push their way over the works.

"Hod the work at all hazards for the Sake of God and His Blessed Mother." He yelled. "Know then that we are the ones who are able to relieve them on their own selected ground."

The men were inspired to the highest pitch at that, and though thousands of their officers had been either killed wounded or dismounted they stuck to the works and other positions, many thousands firing from behind trees, rocks and the dead horses. The moment however for the christians was critical. Maurice Costello was wounded, Griswell Buxton Johnston had a wounded hand, and general Hanson himself was wounded. Big columns of the glandelinians had arrived on the left of the work, many of the rebels having rushed forward during the attack parks of pathling guns, and they brought these into action pouring at short range a tempest of double shot shotted canister, and the whole onslaught was crushing; Hanson's whole line completely. Long before this unknown to him his whole flank had been crushed to mere bits, and though the braver glandelinians were staggered by their own frightful losses, they nevertheless kept up the frightful storming assault with unbroken fury, more fresh guns being rushed forward, and were placed close to the christian works, and fired again and again and still again in frightful broadsides, which tore the most massive christian columns frightfully. In the top of the return fire many of the glandelinian cannoners fell wounded or dead by tons, but the guns were not abandoned, and the firing remained just as terrible. Along kindermine's front itself the battle was already at white heat, but his own line was plowed through and through by the terrible fire of the glandelinian batteries, and there had been so much smoke that the aim of kindermine's men became very uncertain. On and on in the face of the same withering fire the rebels rushed. Already one hundred and twenty pieces of Angolinian artillery were silenced, and lay unworked, while hundreds of thousands of trees all along the battle line were cut and hacked almost down by the great storm of bullets and canister and shells of the opposing forces. Even the wheels of many of the christian cannon were half sunk in the bloody ground, while scores of hundreds of horses belonging to the silenced guns lay strewn in their rear, riddled by bullets, and many of the countless thousands of dead soldiers of the christian side were slashed by the fragments of shells. Piles of dead and wounded in purple or red and in gray besides the works or on top were either torn to pieces or sliced by shot shell, and canister, and when the wounded were taken away after the fighting the stretches were covered with gore.

From the victorious glandelinians the same merciless withering fire was still continued all along the whole gray line, which again shattered all the purple divisions as quickly as they rallied or tried to rally. Hundreds of thousands of bleeding men on the christian side even resisted the assaults with preternatural fury, though the glandelinian fire continued to mow them down again in the most frightful numbers. All along the whole of Hanson's christian line the glandelinian fire had even increased steadily, and twenty brigades and ten divisions of other generals and lower commanders which had also went to repel the foe in this fierce action had met the same rebel fire at all points and especially from enemy sharpshooters hidden in bushes and among tree tops and elsewhere and having been almost annihilated with the loss of all their commanders withdrew. Even to make it worse more advancing artillery of light pieces were brought up by the glandelinians which also committed the same havoc the bloody struggle increasing still more and the massacre also. General Majorsonia also went deep into the bloodiest part of the struggle, and some times the roar of musketry and yells swelled above the thunder of artillery. Yet the whole christian line was still swept by the tempest of bullets and torrents of canister and the losses of the christians was becoming more and more frightful. Other divisions also came on and going to other parts of the line opened fire with the greatest vigor, and now Hanson's whole line was almost crushed to fragments, but still it held. Even seven brigades of Abbeonians on Hanson's center were riddled and their leaders were killed, and again and again the Angolinians had counter charged to retake the works but the same deadly fire of canister from the rebel guns mowed their lines to pieces anew, and the storm of bullets of both sides had literally torn every battle flag or banner of both sides exposed to shreds, and even many battle flag bearers were carrying more flag poles and did not seem to know it. The thousands of tattered Angolinian colors were shot to pieces, and many times in the desperate confusion of the frightful melee the flags of both sides were almost side by side, and yet torn to shreds by the same killing fire. Not once now did the thick smoke clear away and so heavy and continuous had been the same firing that all the wooden breastworks and all the trees that grew on the edge of the plain and nearest the works and even far beyond were so terribly cut and torn that they fell with loud crashes. Thousands of trees were so completely hewn off by the terrific firing that they fell across or into the trenches, and other breastworks along the whole line, and the work during the battle was soaked in blood and three times per hour had been cleared of the dead and wounded. The fighting along this point also was now at white heat, and Hanson's whole line crushed and mangled and with their main commander down, and severely wounded was being severely worsted. The christians had suffered horrible losses from the glandelinian onslaughts, but the Glandelinian artillery firing and musketry, caused more havoc, the glandelinians firing six hundred rounds per man. All the glandelinians had their lips encrusted with the powder from biting cartridges, all had their shoulders and hands and the butts of their muskets covered with dirt and mud and also blood, and even the glandelinian columns which had been torn tottered, and bleeding had rearranged their lines, and swarmed over Hanson's works the whole length.

Hundreds of thousands of dead and wounded of both sides lay in windrows piled over one another and in some places the fallen lay six or seven high, hundreds riddled by bullets or dismembered. Seventy thousands of accoutrements were destroyed a thousand score of ammunition boxes were scattered or blown up, and countless ammunition wagons broken and smashed were lying here and there by scores in groups.

Countless numbers of musket balls and shell lay scattered about everywhere, and everywhere could be seen shattered trees and broken foliage. The dust and light and fire of the enemy had told fearfully in the Christians and the whole line of Hansons' army had given way, the enemy following but drawing a galling fire from new concealed Christian batteries and setting whole lines ablaze. Hanson's right wing, smashed to pieces was the first to give way, and yet the enemy still suffered from a rattling fire of shrapnell and chain shot from some of Baldwin's concealed batteries, but yet the survivors rushed on in long long lines. And Hansons' surviving men though threatened with annihilation continued their storm of firing as even as they retreated. Storms of bullets swept the Glandelinian columns to pieces but nevertheless the enemy was fully victorious as any one could realize, and that this battle which raged twenty miles south of Julio Gallo was to be a remembrance to all that witnessed this struggle and which gave a proof that Vivian Wickey cannot be taken as yet.

The struggle along Hansons' line had been something terrible and had continued steadily since the beginning without pausing the losses having been one thousand five hundred per minute or more than ten thousand per minute at some minutes on the Christian side alone. Kindermine having been wounded four times had also been forced to withdraw his columns his whole right wing having been rolled up and displaced, and the divisions under general Maurice Costello still in ignorance of the fall of their leader, still held the works stubbornly and suffered annihilation because they had received no orders to retreat. The Glandelinian columns had come on as fast as men could run confident that their superior numbers would give them success. The only line still holding its ground was under general Costello's command and this division seemed to be enveloped in smoke and their works seemed as if swept by sheets of flame the firing also rising to white fury here, and the hellish roar was deafening. The dead and wounded Glandelinians lay piled up before the works but the hundreds of thousands of survivors surged over the trenches keeping up a murderous fire point blank. One of the Christian generals as his thousands of demoralized survivors were retiring heard the defiant yell of the enemy who were swarming over the works and he grasped a flag from the color bearer and swung it to the breeze hoping to rally them. This did rally them for a moment but then he himself fell and the Angelinians again retreated.

It happened at this time during the losing part of the battle that Hanson wound as he was had wrote a note to general Vivian, and as there was no one else to go there and as Violet and her sisters were intending to go to Vivian's army where it was safer, he begged them to take it to him. They went of Violet having the note in her possession and she delivered to him in person. General Vivian read the note and he said to Violet: "Go and tell my superior general Hanson Vivian that late this afternoon my armies have been smashed down, and that the whole battle is lost. I cannot do anything but cover the retreat." Violet and her sisters saluted him and soon reached general Hansons' retreating columns, and told him that the whole battle was lost. Indeed the struggle along general Vivian's front had been more severe than along general Hansons'. Ten times in their frightful onslaughts millions of Glandelinians had come upon an extensive lunette holding thousands of cannon, and ten times these very same waves of Glandelinians had succeeded in driving back seven brigades their own same number but they had met a continual and most deadly fire of musketry and cannon from all parts of the lunette which shattered their whole line and ten times the Glandelinians were repulsed with the lost frightful loss. For a time the Glandelinians were demoralized but being reinforced rallied, and made titanic efforts to capture those guns whose fire was so murderous. Again the Glandelinians charged from time to time but nevertheless the very annihilating Christian fire caused them to recoil. Many of the Christian commanders defending the line of battle at other portions had erected a sort of lunette of their own and general Hanson's columns of Mangaboos and Scoedlers as they charged toward it immediately drew upon them a withering fire many hundreds of cannons and the shells exploding in streams fell among the divisions in gray with indescribable fury. With still more tremendous fury Costa Lio Johnston's divisions on the right of the assaulting column assaulted the Christian front directly opposed to them the Glandelinians rushing forward only to dash upon log barricades by barricades which the Christians defended and so thoroughly mowed that it was impossible for the Glandelinians to take them without flanking the purple coats. The withering fire along this Christian front had become unspeakably terrific and raked down the enemy's columns frightfully, the losses being heavy and incapable and terrible was the loss in officers. Yet other columns of Glandelinians under general Nelby Pail advanced to attack these positions themselves but again the fire was hot and heavy and the Glandelinians as they gained the edge of the felled trees and barricades and penetrated were mowed down in all their numbers. General Barklin moving with them saw spurts of smoke from behind logs and rocks and cheered on his men but fell wounded. The heavy fire of the Christian forced the Glandelinians to stop but general Nelby and Henry Toothache rallied them and made a more vigorous effort to carry the barricade, but a hundred thousand of his men were mowed down close to the works and he himself with Toothache were mortally wounded.

General Harvey Jenkins another rebel chief made the same effort with many hundreds of thousands but meeting with the same withering fire his ranks were mowed down by the scores of thousands, and he himself was internally injured. The Glandelinians were increased and again advanced despite the deaths of their commanders under the same destructive withering fire. Yet again they were repulsed with redoubled loss. Along the extreme center of Vivian's Christian line the Glandelinians under general Kindermine Caldwell came surging forward with the greatest noise and fury ever heard. But the whole of this portion of the Christian line was protected by high piles of rail, long barricades and a sand bags and terrible was the Glandelinian losses. Kindermine's surviving columns that halted, returned the Christian fire with utmost steadiness and now amazing was the carnage. The first great attack was badly repulsed, but the enemy kept up an incessant fire until whole battalions arrived to their assistance, and again they charged. The Angelinian commanders saw their coming, and as twenty hundred regiments had been sent to him he ordered his men in line of cannon into action, and one hundred and fifty shells per minute was fired upon the advancing columns producing the most horrible carnage and destruction, but the hostilities went on, the oncoming waves being received with dreadful fury, and though their lines were shaken badly in a number of places, the Christians made a strong resistance, and rolled the assaults back broken and shattered.

Kindermine's men had been mowed down terribly and ten of his best officers had fallen, and he was enraged over his succession of repulses, as he was bound to carry this Christian position or die in the attempt. The whole of the Christian position at this a quarter was on a high rise of ground, and as the Glandelinians again swarmed up the Angelinians repelled the assault with titan fury, and the roar of cannon and musketry was redoubled. This bold Glandelinian assault was also swept away, but general Estabrook Darcy came with three million men who charged in double line and with terrifying yell. Yet also they met the same steady ravaging fire, and suffered bloody losses. But during the stupendous carnage a part of this Glandelinian column passed beyond the extreme left of this Christian position and for a time this exposed wing was attacked on two sides by hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians, armed with repeating rifles.

Yet the main line of Christian batteries swept their lines through and through, and during the tremendous cannonading fourteen regiments under general Bowen Boswer came up and drove back the child butchers with frightful losses, but in the frightful losses he and another general whose name was James Powell were disabled by the explosion of a gun carriage. Revenged over this repulse, general Estabrook sent for another three million, and when they arrived moved forward to storm powder train batteries to which they really belonged, and who though disabled was able to retain command.

As they rushed on the sides of the long hill a feeble discharge of the cannon came, then the cannon suddenly opened in full fury, and down upon the Glandelinians crashed the thousands of shells. All of these Christian guns were trained upon the Scoedler assembly especially under general Cohenta Cohen, and Bellina Handon, and so the very earth was shaken by the tremendous cannonade which aroused general Vivian.... The enemy charged desperately but the fierce volleys of shells at three hundred and seventy five shots per minute mowed them down in columns. Never before near Julio Gallo outside of her anyhow was there such an uproar, and the very sides of the hills became gray with the prostrated Glandelinians, and the air was dotted with the screaming shells, and therefore the survivors hastily drew back leaving two hundred and ninety nine thousand in that one assault which lasted less than thirty minutes. Though the enemy was retiring the Angelinian batteries kept on thundering and the column columns still making the attack on the center of the line were also fully exposed to the fire of the same Christian batteries, and their losses were equally as fearful.

For a time the enemy here also withdrew, and waited for reinforcements, to come up. Along the right of the Christian line under Vivian where general Kindermine's left was also making a fierce assault the batteries also reached them and the Christian soldiers firing more than a hundred rounds of shots per minute, held the enemy at bay. Yet they were reinforced, and again they pressed forward with such fury, that the batteries had to go to their full fire on them. Three thousand Glandelinians fell every minute, but on came the survivors, while one million three hundred and fifty five thousand other Glandelinians mostly Growlows were sent by generals Brooks, Dickchopsticks and others to carry the line of artillery.

"As long as these guns are there, we cannot carry the Christian positions at all," he said. "These batteries must be carried at all costs, and despite their numbers fire."

Estabrook in the meantime rallied his shattered forces which had made the attempt to storm the batteries, and also rallied his brother's center and right, general Frank Darcys also which had been driven back. As the awful firing increased in redoubled fury, general Estabrook Darcy pressed again upon the Christian line, then while general plan, Baskin under general Estabrook's command, moved forward to help in the storming of the batteries.

Three other divisions of Glandelinians under General Bunker had been ordered to Senguela, and Glandelinians fell mortally wounded. For a time the numbers of these Glandelinians fell back, and cowering and swaying away from the Christian line. Brooks took the command himself, and led them under a murderous fire that swept the side of the hill. General Majestic Johnston trying to out stride his superior with his brigade fell, and Brooks did all he could do to stem the confusion. Estrabrook stormed the Christian batteries along his own front with merciless fury, and the carnage was more terrible than ever, and now another Glandelinian general by the name of Hanson Runkonib fell severely wounded.

A large brigade of Christians which drew from a part of their line of works or withdrew rather, and as a million of the Glandelinians swarmed over the barricade, several other Christian commanders issued all their fresh pieces of artillery upon them and opened a withering storm of canister and grape. The whole gray line withered before this sudden terrible artillery fire, and the survivors recoiled, being mowed down in hundreds of ranks. The center of Estrabrook's line was driven in with more terrific loss and he had all he could do to check the dreadful confusion. Hundreds of thousands had fallen as and as the Christian guns still kept up the heavy fire, the rebels retired to cover.

Large herds of Glandelinians under Major General Bracken made every effort to carry the Christian batteries, and in the frightful carnage General George Pao Ruster's horse was killed under him and he himself severely wounded, his Glandelinians being thrown into confusion. On pressed the other great Glandelinian columns with indomitable fury but were simultaneously met by a murderous fire and mowed down in hundreds of thousands all along along the line. One hundred thousand of Powell's Christian Glandelinian force of men were literally slain, but the rest of the divisions came up to his aid, and now the Glandelinians were almost upon the line of guns.

The slaughter was more dreadful still. The dead and wounded were fairly strewn before the work like masses of hay, but hundreds of thousands of the survivors swept up to the very muzzles of the guns with horrid bursts of yells. They met a terrible fire however that reduced their column or two million to only a few hundred thousand, and the slain survivors falling back to avoid this up a living fire. Yet Estrabrook could confidently that General Brooks could carry the Christian batteries brought on the rest of his forces. Yet again the Christian artillery mowed down the front ranks as fast as they came and the Glandelinians hesitated.

"Forward," yelled Estrabrook. "Forward. The man who falls back or hesitates and gives up will regret it. Forward."

Terrible now was the artillery fire along the whole Christian line but though the effects were terrible on the Glandelinian forces they again rushed forward, but were soon enveloped in the smoke of the bursting shells. The dead and wounded Glandelinians again lay in hundreds where they had fallen but the leaders would not allow the men to fall back now and ordered them forward under pain of death. In the meantime the Glandelinians under Brooks utterly reckless in their desire to carry the left of the batteries, rushed on up the hill with more terrible fury but awful gaps were again moved in his lines and again the long gray lines covered before the destructive fire, and retired only to reform for a desperate attempt. All of the Christian artillery broke in general action once more and now pouring a regular stream of shells into the gray lines, the contest being a genuine and again the enemy was repulsed with frightful slaughter. General Pao Johnston's met all the furious onsets of the enemy turning all the artillery upon the charging columns and mowing down their line with awful gaps.

Yet the survivors closed up their ranks and kept up the attack with preternatural ferocity and did not stop until many columns were mowed down. Then again they withdrew for a moment, only to reform more than one million one hundred thousand more tried their best to carry the batteries under so small but were repulsed with tremendous loss and with the deaths of five of their best generals being Sterling Hemmings.

Howard Poad, Howo Clintonia, and Gantonib, formerly who were killed instantly and General James Senixy was mortally wounded dying a few minutes later. But when the rest reformed they again made another charge sweeping forward with apparently irresistible fury.

Yet all the guns again opened fire with all their cannons and thousands of regiments were reduced to a few ranks, but now the Glandelinians being in greater numbers made furious attempts to get in among the guns, sweeping forward like tidal waves, the Glandelinians under Brooks also rushing forward to storm the batteries again, and now the gun fire became so deadly and fierce that the gray columns melted away in fearful numbers. Seas of dead and wounded lay in the hillsides but the Glandelinians who survived advanced more cautiously, and Brooks was bound to carry the batteries even at the risk of his own life. Heononia Baldwin relieved fresh men now, and these reinforcing other, others rushed on in grand array, yet their front lines also melted away before the same deadly fire.

Every gun of the Christian batteries were trained anew upon the gray columns, which plowed their line through and through, but despite the annihilation of many scores of thousands at a volley, the Glandelinians at last reached the summit, and swarmed before the works with fixed bayonets, but there was an undulating sheet of flame all along the line of infantry behind the guns, and with the going down of a whole line of gray coats, five more generals were killed, and Brooks among them. The other four were Generals George Distinction, Majestic Glorinia, Gallo Tanet and Henry Poorhouseington.

The shattered columns were appalled by this tremendous slaughter, and as their main line was again honeycombed with gaps the survivors withdrew, Baldwin on the rebel side himself having fallen wounded, but his wounds soon proved to be slight, and he was soon able to retain command. Estrabrook with greater numbers than before being again reinforced by Manley tried again with all his energy to carry the Christian batteries but as the foremost of the Glandelinian columns crashed upon the Christian line they were again met by the murderous fire that mangled them to pieces. Yet during the frightful carnage the shattered divisions were again rallied, and as more fresh troops arrived again made another furious effort to carry the works. Three hours of bloodier fighting followed, when at last the Glandelinian troops were again driven back. Estrabrook was astonished at the succession of repulses, and the Christian commanders were dumbfounded by the stubbornness of the Glandelinian assaults. The Glandelinians were terrible in their assaults upon Powell's Johnston's artillery, massing together in great numbers and sweeping upon the Angolinians with greater fury, but again they were met by a most galling fire that made the gray coats fall in most frightful numbers, the infantry supporting the artillery pouring a still more murderous fire, but nevertheless scores of thousands got among the guns at once, but they found the works fairly packed with the wedge of purple coats who drove in at their assaults with a tumult of bayonets and sabres killing them all. Estrabrook under a rain of shot and shell attacked his part of the Christian line hurling his forces forward in full fury now. Yet the same awful Christian fire tore more awful gaps in the rebel line, the front wave of the assaults being destroyed, but General Estrabrook filled with desperation at the over the approach of the main column under Vivian was bound to carry the Christian position, and so pressed his survivors on, but more and more Angolinians arrived and opened fire. Thousands more rebels fell riddled by bullets but the survivors were filled with a greater reckless fury, and continued the fierce attack, but again was driven back with still fiercer loss of officers and men.

Yet despite it all they again pressed to the attack but again received volleys of five hundred shots per minute of shells which again tore their biggest columns to pieces as fast as they came on. Maybe the Glandelinians desired suicide.

Five hundred were mowed down quicker than a minutes time but along a certain part of the Christian line the Glandelinians managed to push the Angolinian columns under General Senguela back for a certain distance, but now General Vivian arrived, and the fury of the battle increased. Along the whole line the fighting was savage and very bloody, and as more and more of General Vivian's men arrived, the losses the enemy suffered was more fearful than ever. Yet the Glandelinians kept on their attack, and yet the Angolinians stood to their works, hundreds of thousands after hundreds of thousands of the Glandelinians rushed on, the attack being repelled with more titan fury, yet the Glandelinians hurled themselves upon the Christian line. Again six or five hundred shells per minute had been sent crashing through the Glandelinian columns, all of the Christian guns having poured fearful volleys causing still more frightful havoc, but the hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians swarmed swarmed up to the very muzzles of the guns and among them, though their foremost score of regiments fairly went down everywhere the Glandelinians met the same stern resistance, but the assaults being now massed together could not be checked.

The enemy's line however was shattered by the withering fire along Vivian's line, and most of the rebels were forced to withdraw from the works they had captured, but still the other section of the rebel line kept up the assault with solid unbroken masses. All the while the havoc among the gray line had increased but again they swept up to the very muzzles of the guns and tried every means to carry them, but the murderous fire was too great, and now almost of General Vivian's whole line began to drive the assaults fell back to the main line, but their own batteries still continued their fearful fire. Yet most of the Glandelinians had fallen back, though two great columns assaulted a section of the great line of batteries. Also the assault was kept up against General Powell's Johnston's position, yet the Angolinians not only held their ground but hammered away with eight hundred pieces. Again and again the enemy stormed these two sections of batteries, rushing forward with awful impetuosity and in heavy column formation, yet more tremendous were their intolerable losses. The whole rise of ground was still wreathed in the thick clouds of smoke, the cannon fire coming almost intolerable, but still the foe returned to the attack yelling with the fury of can canibals and demons together. It was becoming awful.

On came the assailants, and now all the artillery men gathered up their strength for a fiercer effort, but after several repulses the enemy came so near in the next assault that most of the guns could not reach them. Another Christian general by the name of Baldwin gave strict orders to his men this time to hold their fire, and therefore the infantry did not fire any shots, the enemy now thinking the Christians had exhausted their ammunition.

"Wait until they are within our musket shot range," said Baldwin. "Then fire."

The Angelinian infantry therefore allowed the Glandelinians to come up within a few paces of the works, then they poured upon the Glandelinians a fiercer fire than ever bringing down scores of thousands of men simultaneously. The galling guns also then blazed away but the Glandelinians could not be checked, and they soon swarmed over the works, and the appalled Angelinian survivors drew back, but they had held their position with such stubbornness as to cause the selves to be threatened with annihilation. The side of the hill was still more thickly covered with gore, and the bodies of the dead and wounded of both sides. Common mounds of purple coats lay on the summit and among the guns, while the trenches were covered with many more scores of thousands of their fellows who almost bled to death, and writhed in mortal agony. Trees by the hundred thousand growing on the sides of the hill were badly torn and shattered and even rent by the fierce storm of bullets and canister, and as in other battles beaked again into the appearance of his korymbos. For two hours before this there had been the heaviest of cannonading exposed exactly during to the onslaughts of the enemy along Vivian's center, the whole Christian line here receiving the full burst of the rebel attack in the face of fierce volleys poured upon them by seventy thousand Glandelinian cannon which poured perfect streams of destruction. Many thousands of the solid shot crashed along the Christians killing masses, chain shot bore down their ranks, shells and canister killed and wounded whole divisions, and the rain of shrapnell and grape mowed down in business gaps, felled many thousands of others and committed the most deadly effects.

General Vivian was dismounted by a solid shot, and at every broadside thousands of his men and many more men were dreadfully cut up. The whole of the line of the foe artillery was ablaze, and the uproar was frightful the thunder of twenty thousand Christian guns making a great noise. As there was a lull in the infantry fighting for half an hour, preparations were made to renew the contest with all the might that could be mustered and soon general Vivian ordered a counter charge.

"You are certainly rushing your troops into total destruction," screamed Violet to general Vivian as the Glandelinian fire was redoubled in violence and fury. "Please order them back. I won't have this."

"Can't help it now, Princess," said general Vivian. "Their only escape is to carry the works." The Angelinians in a wave ten miles long advanced with a firm and steady step but every movement was continually effected by the rebel curtain of artillery fire, whole ranks going down at every broadside, but nevertheless they pressed on yelling, "On to Calverine. On to Vivian Wickey. On to Child Salvery."

The Angelinians pressed on, the divisions under general Miller Marillier yelling also like demons and definitely waving their torn and tattered battle flags. Whole columns went down by the tens before the fearful fire, but the Christians came on the seventy five divisions under Marillier and which were far in advance being rapidly reduced. The full severity of the gun fire from the twenty thousand Glandelinian artillery was turned upon these seventy divisions, yet despite the frightful havoc and carnage they did not halt, these divisions being supported by Herndon and James Sanguine, and soon they were all within range of the enemy's musketry.

All at once along the entire line of rebel work there sheeted flame and smoke, the millions of Glandelinians poured one most destructive broadside. The Christian wave was frightfully torn hundreds of thousands of their number dropping at once but on pressed the survivors and soon reached the works there being now only forty of these divisions left out of the seventy. Yet on pressed the main column with indescribable fury. Every Glandelinian division now opened upon the armies of advancing Christians a simultaneous fire of great intensity followed as swift as possible by a abrupt series of terrible volleys. The Angelinians however responded simultaneously and the battle became general all along the line. The rest of the purple column under Vivian and Hanson's received the full fury of the same galling fire, first hundreds of thousands of Glandelinian sharpshooters, and which was followed by withering tempests of grape and bullets and canister shot. The whole charge had extended for ten miles and upon this whole line with dreadful effect this fire had swept but the advance was so terrific that as the many galling guns came to lay upon them the whole line was annihilated, and terribly stricken the survivors of the other Christian columns behind, broke into utter rout and confusion, and abandoned the assault, though their commanders strove desperately to rally them.

On the Glandelinian side general Entrabrock Darcy was wounded while his brother Frank Darcy was also severely injured. The right of the Christian assault however still continued on not having received the shock as yet. Then after keeping up a most galling fire for twenty minutes the the Glandelinians receiving these assaults were forced to yield and fell back and general Marillier was the first to mount the works, but he fell riddled by bullets. In the distance the retreating columns rallied, reformed, and then held their line together despite the fierce volley firing of the assailants. Sixty hundred and so only shot and shell were not sent crashing into the Christian line by the main Glandelinian batteries in the rear, while along the whole first line of works, which had remained of the Angelinians pushed themselves of the trenches and planted their battle flags on the parapets. The battle following this tremendous counter charge was now at white hot fury and the works were covered three deep with the bodies of the slain. At some part of the line the struggle was almost preternaturally fierce and most terrific, but along the main section the enemy still held his works and could not be driven back. Hundreds of thousands of purple coats and Angelinians faced each other fighting hand to hand in the wildest ferocity of warfare, and mingling to together in frightful death struggles.

Angelinians receiving these assaults

Exploding carti cartridges actually set fire to the wooden barricades of the breast-works and thousands of Glandelinian cannons stubbornly refusing to retire were killed or captured. Also large divisions of the enemy managed to cut up many of the Christian divisions who assaulted them forcing the survivors to retire, and others already thrown into confusion, abandoned the works they had captured, and now the Glandelinians themselves were pressing forward again. The counter charge of the Glandelinians had been fearful, but they had recaptured the works, and won a victory as well, for Vivian's army was crushed to fragments. Both sides had lost in this struggle including Hanson Vivian and the other commanders in killed wounded, missing and prisoners 3,365,998 while the Christian losses singly in killed and wounded alone was 4,466,666, of which 999,999 were of the slain.

It was during the height of the contest along his own lines that general Hanson Vivian had found that his superior Prince Jibbie Vivian was missing. However after throughout investigation he had learned that Jibbie Vivian had been wounded during the battle and therefore was reported to be captured by the enemy. General Vivian and all his generals and other officers learned of this, and this compelled him to repel the counter charging Glandelinians with such appalling fury that his losses was still more horrible. The loss of Jibbie Vivian however was too great for the Angelinians and they were bound to recover him at all costs. General Vivian did not believe that the Vivian girls could rescue their brother but he immediately went up to where they were standing watching the terrible crushing down of his armies.

"Jibbie Vivian your brother is among the enemy's prisoner," he said. "He was wounded early this morning and was reported captured. I thought I would tell you and maybe you will go to his aid."

"Sure we will and will have to," declared Violet determinedly and with out lips. "We cannot afford to lose him. We will set off now and bring him back at any risk. We won't do without him any more under any conditions, not at last set for the old traitors." General Vivian had some conversation with them then he left after saluting, while they went off to their own places to put on their disguises. When they were ready they set off toward a portion of the rebel line not active now leaving the retreating Christian armies far behind.

"We will have to be careful," said Violet as they reached a clump of trees. "We might be discovered by the enemy if we expose ourselves too much."

They were soon near the enemy's line and suddenly were challenged by several sentinels they had not observed. Yet they showed these Glandelinians a fake pass which they hoped permitted them to enter. Yet at the moment an officer came up and ordered them away a saying in a surly tone;

"We do not allow children around these premises during a battle of this sort, especially not round the vicinity of an important prisoner. Get a move on and hurry up about it."

They seemed about to obey, but when the officer moved away they managed to sneak about into a small structure not observed, and discovered among the wounded there that one of them was their brother.

"What do you Glandelinian boy scouts want?" asked Jibbie Vivian in a surly manner failing to recognize them. "Did you not hear that officer tell you to keep away?"

"But we came to set you free if you will go," said Violet. "We are your sisters in disguise."

"Oh good gracious," exclaimed Jibbie Vivian in perfect alarm. "You here? How in the name of Heaven did you work your way in?"

"With fake passes," said Violet.

"Put the next question in how can you get me free?" asked Jibbie Vivian. "I've watched like a honey in a Treasury and if the rebels saw you going away with me there would be a hundred dead and wounded persons in a moment."

"I'm puzzled," answered Jennie. "If I was your size I could exchange clothes."
 "Let's fire the enemy tents," suggested Violet. "It will be a great surprise to them."
 "I have some matches with me."
 "I had an idea but we have no straw or other material," declared Angeline. "And it would take too long to place the match against the tent cloth."
 "I have a small bottle of bottle of benzine that I secured from a doctor," said Jennie Vivian. "But be careful as it will be exploding at the touch of a match."
 He handed Violet the bottle, and she crawled under the opening at the rear of the tent, and to another several tents away, and tossed one portion near the bottom with the liquid. She did not know there was a munition inside that tent or she would have thought twice before setting the oil soaked cloths on fire. She struck the match, layed it against the tent and it at once blazed up. Quickly she made for the stockade and crawled inside. Suddenly there came a deafening roar followed by an eruption. With a crash of confused and tangled sheets of cloth their own tent fell on top of them, rasping smoke filling their nostrils, and the flames caught their own tent. After some difficulty they managed to hurl the blazing cloth from them, and seeing that the explosion had aroused the enemy, they with Jennie Vivian made a wild dash for liberty as scores of tents now started blazing furiously, the fire spreading beyond control.

"Damn that Christian general, he done that," said an officer.
 "There he goes with seven boy scouts," yelled another. "Catch them, they must not escape!"

After the fall of a sudden dashed hundreds of grays, because a most important prisoner was escaping. Yet Jennie and the Vivian girls jumped the first horses they came to whether they had saddles or not, and off they raced. The Glandelinian cavalry had appeared at this moment, and about a hundred of them left the column and rushed after the fugitives.

"They are gaining," exclaimed Jennie Vivian. "To get away we will have to separate. I'm afraid."

"Violet and Jennie, you separate and dash for the woods yonder. I'll dash for the hill," said Catherine. "Joyce dear you for for the Christian lines. I'll follow my sisters."

They followed Catherine's advice, and the Glandelinians had to go into separate squads to follow the fugitives, and this lost to them some little time. Three scores followed, Violet and Jennie, fifty followed Joyce, and the rest sped after Jennie and the other little girls.

"Golly but they certainly use an army in pursuit," cried Jennie. "I never saw the like."

After them came the Glandelinians at a thunderous gallop, and as he saw them coming closer he began to start firing and dropped a Glandelinian dead in his tracks with nearly every shot. As Joyce dashed on she came several times in close quarters to Glandelinian squads but succeeded in eluding them for a moment, but they soon joined to the other pursuers, and seeing that her chances were desperate she drew her pistols and firing rapidly wounded eight. On came the pursuers like infuriated demons howling and yelling. At this moment a shell from some unseen cannon suddenly exploded near by, hurling showers of stone, fragments of iron, and other missiles killing four Glandelinians and wounding six. On dashed Joyce but in turning a bend in the road she found herself suddenly confronted by five Scouters on horseback who ordered her to halt and surrender. Joyce her saw her dilemma but she presented her pistol and answered:

"Halt yourselves or I'll fire."

At her word one of the men fired, but she was quicker and brought him down with a serious wound in the shoulder. She fired at the others before they recovered from their consternation, and then she galloped on through the barrier of horses, followed by those behind. A Glandelinian officer was now gaining on her, but she leveled her pistol at him. Both discharged their pieces simultaneously, but only the gray coat fell and he was mortally wounded. Yet on he after her with the rest.

In the meantime Violet and Jennie were pursued by seventy Glandelinian horsemen. The two girls first fired their pieces at the foremost and continued their wild dash. The way before the little girls to the woods was an open field about sixty rods across the other side, being hemmed in by an old rotten log fence, and still beyond on the outskirts of the woods a sort of chaparral of briar brush and underbrush. To this retreat Violet and Jennie started in quadruple quick with all the seventy horsemen after them. Fortunately for Jennie and Violet recent heavy rains had made the fields quite muddy, and the rebels horses slipped through the turf so badly that the Glandelinians could not lessen the distance between themselves and the two fugitives. All this time the Glandelinians were so keeping a clattering roar of pistols and rifles, several of the shells passing through the tops of both girls.

So cruel others went clear through their coats and lodged in their cartridges boxes. Still on dashed the heroines, and still on swarmed splashed the horsemen firing and cursing and swearing. Violet and Jennie at last reached the fence and with one bound from their horses landed on top intending to give a long spring over the top, but the fence was frail and crumpled beneath their weight with a great crackling, and as luck would have it both girls fell into a deep hole on top of a frightened hog, which scampered away with a squeal and a grunt, the fence rattling down on top of them. This was more than fairly down when up came the horsemen, and seeing no sign of the fugitives halted. They dismounted and sought the present cover of the shrubbery followed, but as a snare set with only the hog as a prisoner. As Jennie and an olive dashed on a volley was fired at them by the pursuers but both were not hit, though a bullet grazed the flank of Angeline's horse, and made him prance. Jennie replied with a pistol shot which killed the officers horse, and then she urged her horse across a creek and started up the slope, but the Glandelinians sent a shower of bullets water to the two two, two bullets of which wounded Jennie's right hand, injuring four of his fingers. One grazed his right leg, cutting two holes through his pants and another cut through one side of his sword scabbard. Seven bullets struck the horse Angeline was riding which reared under her but had strength and speed to bear her on long enough till Jennie lifted her to his own horse. Then the horse fell and died. The fugitives all of them, managed to elude their pursuers and reached the Christian lines, which had abandoned the battle and were retreating, General Vivian's army having been smashed down completely.

During the time General Vivian's was engaged great columns of Glandelinians had made frightful onslaughts on General Hindernine's front. General Hindernine's strongest batteries had opened upon them the Christian fire being excellent, and the shells scattered in all directions but on came the assailants, perfect hailstorms of balls, canister, grape shot and shells was now as poured upon them, and the ground became strewn with their bodies. The Glandelinians made desperate attempts to carry Hindernine's positions by assault but the Angelinians disregarding the defenses erected for them, leaped on the embankment and fired at the Glandelinians out by them down as fast as they came up. At half past eleven when the first day of the battle was in full swing General Finn Estrabrook was sorely pressed, though he strove with might and main to hold his position against tremendous odds. Several of his Angelinian divisions were almost annihilated, but General Jennings' division rushed over to Estrabrook's support and in swimming over the works the rebels met an annihilating fire but the assault was ferocious and again the Angelinians under Estrabrook gave way but in good order, and were driven not less than a mile. Hindernine's Glandelinian columns advanced in stronger force combined with Estrabrook's line and those under Bellhuff and Bellhopper, beside the Glandelinian columns under General Henry St. John but were received with a most destructive fire, yet they would not think of falling back and the Christians along this front were also driven into confusion and fled over two lines of breastworks and into the open fields.

Two lines of batteries on an eminence commanded the open space and the destruction from their fire was terrific. The whole of the Glandelinian force was inflamed, the batteries sweeping it from left to right, from front to flank. Goodness how they did pitch it into his columns. The fearful battle raged for hours, and hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians advanced to the attack. Never before were the rebels so much advanced or to fight with such diabolical fury. The most murderous fire, canister, grape shot, shrapnell, and musketry were poured into their very faces as it were, but nothing stopped them. As the morning wore on the pressure became greater and greater until all along those defending the batteries were hurled down the slope broken and discomfited, the Glandelinians following in hot pursuit. Yet the rebel losses were frightful. In two hours many hundreds of thousands had fallen in killed and wounded. Never before was there heard such a tremendous artillery firing, the very earth shaking beneath the soldiers during the most terrific and prolonged cannonade, and the hillsides and rocks seemed to reel like a drunken man. For all that day this terrific firing was continued during which time the fierce onsets, the shrieking of shells, the crash of falling timber, the fragments of rocks flying through the air, shattering from the cliffs by solid shot, the heavy mutterings from the valley between the opposing armies, the crash of bursting shrapnell and the neighing of wounded artillery horses, made the scene horribly grand and sublime.

Every minute eleven thousand one hundred men fell, every charge made by the rebels being terrific, and as the Christian guns volleyed and thundered, and the infantry joined in chorus, so terrific was the fire that tore through the Glandelinian columns at each onset that the Glandelinian armies presented an extraordinary spectacle of hundreds of thousands of men playing at leap frog, and in spite of every effort the Glandelinians for a time failed to carry the positions, although at several points they charged up and over it. The effect of the furious fire was terrible. Hardly a tree, or a rock in the field of terrible carnage escaped.

hundreds of thousands of the towns were covered and scorched with bullets as high as seventy feet from the ground. The firing had been wild and deadly all day, and both sides within an hour at intervals alone lost singly, 363,363. In killed and wounded. It was awful. However after the very repulse the enemy withdrew, and Hindernine managed to push his whole force forward. Artillery was still busy, but soon the guns reopened with spirit, and continued with more vigor. General Jemima found his division suddenly under a heavy fire which inflicted it, and the survivors had to fall back. The left of Hannon's division was also beaten fiercely engaged with the Christians also coming to the aid of Jemima's division, several more divisions also arrived, even with artillery, others with infantry. For over three hours the battle had grown to its full strength, and the line of Christian fire became murderous but availed.

Then the Angelinians began to give way a little, only a little, but at the first indication of a receding fire the line in gray made a tremendous charge, and started the whole of the Christian front from end to end. All the rest of the day the little ragged and the Christians met the attacks of the enemy bravely. Every attack was repulsed, but soon general Hindernine was flanked, and repulsed or defeated, and for twenty days the pursuit of the three separated Christian armies was continued but before the retro retreat started in general Vivian had asked the Vivian girls to find their way back to their fathers army before anything serious happened. In the whole battle so near Julio Gallo the Christian loss was 11,299,296 in killed wounded and prisoners and missing, while those of the enemy was 10,299,296 in killed wounded and missing and ninety nine thousand in killed and wounded.

As Violet and her sisters three days after the beginning of the retreat of the three Christian armies were on their way to King Vivian's command, which was moving forward to help Hannon in his siege of Vivian Wickey, startling news had filled the whole world despite the great Christian victory at Aronburg's Run. The three Hanleys, Shoenwicks, and all the great Glandelinian chiefs were hurrying their most immense armies forward to prevent the Christians from recapturing the sections of Vivian Wickey, known as Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo, and one of those armies was also moving for Beppo and another army was also making efforts to lay siege to the city of Dorothy Gale hundreds of miles south with the evident purpose of crushing the Christian armies and bring the great rebellion to a speedy close as a Glandelinian victory.

Of cities in the southern Calvernia near the boundary line, Beppo Lamsin, Dorothy Gale and Angelina Agatha were the only ones which were apparently safe for these were the only ones protected by the most vast Christian armies ever mustered and the one in the nobleship camps at Omar and Betsey Eobbin were under general Mic-Ho-lester Hindernine and Francis Vivian's and Concentin Aronburg who had fought and won the battle of Aronburg's Run which had lasted three weeks day in and night out. But could these generals successfully defend these places? That was the question.

But nevertheless the Angelinians still had hopes. Angelina Agatha and Dorothy Gale had been the scene of hundreds of frightful battles, and they had never been captured yet or the enemy had never got within their reach. Just the same the enemy had made many more attempts to capture these places and had been so disastrously beaten that all hope was lost. Battles had been lost it is true, for the Christian side when they raged around Julio Gallo and other portions of Vivian Wickey, but they had only been severe repulses and thus nothing else, and the siege only continued the more.

Vivian had only attempted with the help of Hannon, Vivian to stop the advance of reinforcements to the aid of the besieged and this he accomplished by forcing the enemy to fight him, and then by being repulsed allow himself to be purposely followed followed so as to draw away from the direction of Vivian Wickey the reinforcing Glandelinian army, and thus by this trick prevent the original besiegers from being attacked by the Glandelinians in the flank. Of course the defeat nevertheless for Vivian and the others had been real, as a picknollian is a fierce fighter, but nevertheless Vivian did not long for victory. To save the Christians at Vivian Wickey from being struck in the flank was his purpose, so now in retreating he was drawing the enemy away from that direction by a ruse, which he was working completely without a blunder.

The enemy were also making elsewhere a bloody Angelina Agatha Campaign in an effort to crush the Christians there, and now was apparent that Hanley was attempting to reinforce the Glandelinians at Norma Catherine to strike the besiegers there on the flank, and to make another attempt to capture Jennie Riches which was fifty miles southwest of Julio Gallo. King Vivian and his brother Hannon Vivian heard of this and warned all Christian generals to look out for the movements of the foe and not to allow Hanley to carry out any of his rebellious plans. The order was to oppose him fiercely at every step.

It was now the twenty first of September and the Show-nia Shoornick were advancing great forces upon the region of Norma Catherine Run and also concentrating other armies toward Jennie Riches, and threatening King Vivian's flank near Norma and compelling him to withdraw or be peacefully from that location. These two great Glandelinian forces had intended to attack the Christian armies before they could go to Norma Catherine of Julio Gallo to reinforce Hannon's army of besiegers, and if possible to carry all before them. Show-nia with more than eleven million men eleven million men was headed for Robert Vivian, while Hanley with seventeen million was advancing to capture Jennie Riches and if he did so to hold it against the Federal army moving toward it from the east. King Vivian who had been compelled to abandon his own part of the siege of Norma Catherine on account of this new turn of events, sent general Cornsack Picknell with forty one million to defend any point of Hannon's rear near Norma Catherine, and concentrated the rest of his forces at Jennie Riches, while he had cabled to general Hindernine to hold his own positions near Salientonia at all hazards. Violet and her sisters were excited over this great advance of the two armies though they heard that general John Hanley was moving with two hundred million men on for Dorothy Gale.

Half of this immense force was advancing upon Beppo Lamsin and Pig Girl Knoll in two columns. That evening Abraham Hanley's army was in sight of Jennie Riches first, but a strong Christian army was there, and then therefore instead of attacking right away went into camp. King Vivian massed all his batteries for action. At quarter to five the next morning Violet and her sisters having traveled with the army for days since they left general Vivian's army reached the vicinity of Norma Catherine, and as they unexpectedly neared an enemy encampment of another Glandelinian army under general Johnston, John Hanley and Mic-Ho-lester Johnston, they had to approach with more caution, though occasionally they heard considerable cannonading and the desultory roar of musketry. As they drew nearer they were confused by the enemy sharpshooters who opened a clattering roar of musketry, for they had discovered the little girls. Violet and her sisters therefore hid behind a clump of bushes yet unseen several Glandelinians were creeping upon them from the rear, and before they knew it the Vivian girls once again found themselves prisoners.

"So you Angelinian beauty roses are spies eh?" growled a graycoat who happened to be a Scoundrel as he searched them for weapons. "Well we got you now and you will not get away from us either."

They were now led away by the men and taken toward the enemy's lines, though the men showed evidence of alarm as the far distant sound of firing increased with terrible violence. As they entered the outskirts the leader of the captors said:

"Let's take them over to the abandoned camp vent powder. It is surrounded by hundreds of traps and they cannot escape. They can shoot them selves there."

"But they will have to be taken before general Shoornick." Said another. "He will be glad to see them."

The captors strove with fury to induce the little girls to tell of their purpose in heading for their fathers army when caught. As Violet and her sisters refused to say a word they brought them into the heart of the brasserie where the news of their arrest soon spread and soon general Thomas Federal and Show-nia Shoornick appeared on the scene. Violet grew pale at Federal's deadly scowl and her eyes were dimmed with tears for she knew what was in store for herself and her sisters unless she told them everything they knew. At that moment the ground shook as if there was an earthquake, every tent fell to the ground, while in the distance the houses in the country tumbled to and fro. On all sides were heard cries of alarm, and hun hundreds of soldiers fled for safety into the open high ways. A part of Federal's heavy cannons fell into ruins and from the debris were heard the cries of many of his guards and officers. The evening earthquake continued at inter intervals while all the time there was heard far in the distance a terrible loud reverberating roar, a thick murky whiteness began to hide the distant landscape and horizon, followed by an intense glow from the direction of the Christian lines. The shaking of the ground caused by the explosion of thousands of great mines which had wiped out a large force of reinforcing rebel army ceased. After the shocks ceased and the confusion was over, general Federal ordered that seven stalwart soldiers should lead the Vivian girls to a pass they call where they were heading and what they were doing so near the lines.

"Strike and tear them unless they confess. Strike them good or death shall be your punishment." was Federal's stern order.

The soldiers dragged Violet and her sisters to seven pillars and soon as they refused to tell anything the cruel blows fell ruthlessly upon their faces, necks and shoulders, and even some of Federal's soldiers and officers turned away in horror. Then the soldiers took pieces of broken earthenware and began to smash their faces and necks without mercy, when before the whole multitude of soldiers they were struck by a shrapnell shell, which came flying through the air, and every one were killed.

They were indeed buried in a windrow of wreckage with a redoubled roar the sound of battle outside increased, and clouds of dust from the debris almost strangled the Vivian girls, and flew into their eyes and mouths by the hand full. For an hour and twenty minutes the battle raged with unabated fury outside, the explosions piling up wreckage and furniture-like old junk. At last the battle was gathering in full force the concussion of a high explosive which burst with a stupendous ear-splitting crash caused Violet and her sisters with windrows of wreckage to rise into the air as if blown by an eruption and they fell to the ground five hundred yards from the building where pinioned by the wreckage they were incessantly and cruelly bombarded by flying sticks and stones every time a shell struck the building. A few minutes a bursting air smell though it exploded right where they lay swept the wreckage from them without injuring them in the least, and they managed to cling to an old stump for dear life. For a long time Violet and her sisters lay there clinging desperately yearning that the fury of the old battle would spend itself in this location, and no matter how it turned out, so long as they could escape those horrid bursting shells. Never before had they heard such an uproar. Everywhere there was a chaos of crumbling trees, big tangled lines of men charging back and forth and never before did the shells seem to explode in so constant a manner, and Violet and her sisters expected at every burst of some mighty explosion that they would be blown to atoms. At every time a tree crashed to the ground near them, they feared it would come down on top of them.

Then at a o'clock came and still there was no sign of an abatement of the frightful carnage among them and now poor Violet and her sisters save themselves for lost. Every minute they lay there they were in danger of being killed despite their vehement efforts to shelter themselves, and as the roar of the conflict continued in the same fury they became more alarmed believing that some shell would soon hurl them to some frightful death. For another hour the battle raged in such a frightful manner, and whole lines of men within their sight to their horrified gaze seemed to be annihilated on both sides, and all the time the little girls expected to be killed themselves. The battle seemed to be at white hot fury having increased to its limit, and a tree uprooted by the explosion of a shell almost fell on top of Jennie.

At one o'clock it showed signs of abating but Violet and her sisters did not move from the stump until the roar of the night battle had subsided and the opposing lines had receded out of sight, but a terrible scene of bloody horror was exposed to view. Indeed the battle of Jemie Pichee which raged in this narrative, and in which the Vivian girls had narrow escapes from being killed weapons of the bloodiest that ever raged in this region up to this time of the war at least. To say the roar of the hundreds of thousands of cannon on both sides reduced many buildings to ruin not far from the scene hundreds of thousands of others were damaged and windrows of wreckage filled the streets of Jemie Pichee. Those nine hours of mortal conflict which was a horrifying demoniacal destruction before heaven and earth had been worse than what Violet and her sisters had seen. Not a tree or a single thing was left to her above the ground on that battle field of horror, and nature herself seemed to have not been able to withstand it and even grass or corn were cut by bullets or uprooted by shells, and the frightful storm of bullets, and the fields were strewn with the wreckage of farm houses, houses, convents of the country, and asylums, twigs, branches and trunks of shattered trees, and thickly intermingled with the dead and wounded of both sides. Great and mighty explosions hurling columns of clouds sometimes three or four hundred feet into the air like volcanic eruptions had seemed to split the earth with the din.

In all its strongest fury the battle had raged and many small towns and villages in the vicinity of this battle field was destroyed by shell fire and conflagrations. The Christian line had been assaulted with the most pugnacious ferocity by the Glendelinian columns under general Gordon pullway, Henderson, Pichee, and Angelina, the Christian fire committing frightful damage among those rebel columns crushing them to pieces as swiftly as they rushed forward, whole waves of Glendelinians were wiped out, whole forests were uprooted and shattered by the terrific Christian shell fire. Lone and the ground was strewn for ten miles with the slain of both sides were they lay at manjoints in great windrows of dead bodies.

The twenty ninth of September had come to an end indeed and it ended with one of the most furious battles ever raging near Vivian wicker, and which had caused the loss of many millions of both sides. The third violent outburst of the great battle, a series that was progressive in deadliness and destructiveness and its greatest violence upon the whole Christian army causing the main columns again to attack and causing frightful loss in general. The attack of the enemy had been so sudden and fierce that few of the divisions after being killed had time to reform and the whole long line of Christian trenches was sent fairly buried under the windrows of dead, and nothing stood before the fury of the great Glendelinian assault. The Christian batteries however had not been carried despite the terrific blow of the assailants and the lines which swept all and threw all before them capturing a long line of fortifications and shattering all the houses inhabited by officers as their headquarters by their own terrific shell fire and the Glendelinians who had assaulted the batteries had fallen by millions.

All the high iron flag poles or wooden staffs were twisted or uprooted, and not a single forest in the vicinity escaped the sweeping fury of the battle, and there was not a single regiment who could present an armor flag, every banner and standard having been torn to shreds by the storm of bullets.

On the morning while Violet and her sisters were still prisoners Shoocumbe and Shoonan brought forward his whole ten million and at then into action against the entire Christian line. The struggle raged with the most titanic fury and soon the battle became general along the left and center, and after four hours of the most deadly and murderous fighting the large column of ten million assailants had been shattered and thrown back with their deaths of their generals Vivian Fleming and Johnna Pichee, while Shoocumbe and Cullen Anderson both brothers were mortally wounded. The great picket on the Christian side had during the meanwhile while the storming attack was in progress brought his own full force into the fierce action, and this had accomplished the purpose of driving the assailants back to their own positions.

The losses were frightfully heavy on both sides but during the rebel onslaught upon the Christian batteries, the rebel columns probably more than ten million strong, faced an annihilating cannon fire for every charge and were frightfully decimated, and hurled back with the loss of over four million. Then immense columns of the Angelinians followed up their advantage, and though repulsed twice with withering losses made a third onslaught covered by a terrible fire of Christian cannon, and this was the part where the Vivian girls were caught in. The Angelinian forces had swarmed to the assault after a fierce and bloody concentration for three hours until fresh for as the enemy had swarmed to the rescue of their comrades, and the Christian line of assault five miles long withered by the murderous fire of the new comers fell back slowly, followed by the enemy, and it was at this time that the Vivian girls after the first passage of the gray waves, were enabled to reach some place of safety before the great battle surge would roll in that direction again. After five hours of further and more murderous fighting, the Angelinians had been driven to their own works and from it Johnella's left wing was hard pressed despite the tremendous fire of cannon and musketry from all of the Christian batteries, and though the enemy lost many hundreds of thousands per hour, they came on. Johnella's line had been forced to give way.

General Antonio Sengulne had come to his aid with five million men out of his twenty million, and though sickle was driven from the works with the loss of millions, Sengulne rallied the survivors, and during the redoubled carnage the enemy again started to give way a little. The struggle then had been fearful along the whole line, and toward one o'clock both sides were in full action. Charges made by the Christians were kept up in endless succession, and hundreds of thousands fell at each of the onsets but the Angelinians did not give up. The battle had increased in fury at two o'clock and despite his furious efforts Shoocumbe for a time could not make any impression on the Christian lines, and his whole center had been fairly cut to pieces by a fierce charge on Adele-De-Sches massive divisions just then came up to take part.

Adele-De-Sches divisions had therefore been crushed to fragments, and a brigade of one hundred and fifty thousand men had been annihilated. The column after column or the Christians had been steadily moved down as they held their positions, but as whole divisions and columns more were annihilated hour by hour, the Christians finally were forced to give way on once more and they retreated toward Jennie Pichee, their main body moved down in masses even during the retreat. The slaughter was appalling, and scores of generals and hundreds of other officers fell. After retreating for forty miles Johnella's army came upon the one stationed near Jennie Pichee, and here he managed to rally the greater portion of his men and prepared to oppose the enemy once more, and in a single where in an hour one million three hundred and forty thousand Christians fell dead, and over two million three hundred and forty six thousand were wounded.

The Angelinians had on these grounds during the latter portion of the battle, after their long and continuous retreat managed to concentrate three hundred and sixty thousand guns upon the region of Jennie Pichee Run, which the next morning had opened fire upon the Glendelinians and these made the most terrific slaughter, almost as fierce as the battle the first two days before, and whole lines in gray more than twenty miles long went down in fragments by scores, before they desisted in their attacks in this quarter, and an indescribable panic ensued among the surviving Glendelinians. By this tremendous cannonade, the houses in Jennie Pichee were shaken to their foundation, and time and again the rebels had swept like stormy waves upon the newly formed Christian lines only to be hurled back to fragments.

Another shell threw another cloud of dust over the little girls and showered them with stones, twigs, and sticks all the while the little girls could hear the tremendous roar of the christian batteries. But it had not been very seconds when violent and her sisters saw that General Hannon's christian column of White Abnegant-ism forces began to waver, and through the rifting smoke of battle, the little girls could see a long line of soldiers probably thousands in extent to their view was first to and fro, and then break like a foam in a great river.

Several other men immediately attacked the legionnaires and tried to prevent any of their comrades from endeavoring to join the combat elements in that direction, and which had struck the legionnaires, and tried to run three hundred yards over open ground and squandered for most horrendous fire from the right and to the left, and on the center. General John Pershalls was hit at the commencement of the retreat, and was near being captured as he could not run. When more than half way to the line of shattered Christian Union, an American color bearer fell, and one of the African girls Jennie who it was, who was near by it at the time recklessly seized the colors. The pursuing rebel column shouted:

hundreds of thousands of glandelinians continued in the glandelinian continued to advance they proceeded to take every advantage of protection, but not without the same protection the destruction along the whole advancing glandelinian column was most fierce and terrific. Terrible to posts of shot shell and canister, over hundreds of immense gaps and burning whole lines to pieces. As general Shoorman's division continued to press onward despite so many hundreds of thousands of them being dreadfully cut up, picknell on the christian side ordered all his extremities of batteries into action. Instantly the whole of picknell's line from end to end was redoubled above, and the thunder of so many more christian cannon became frightfully deafening it being the heaviest artillery fire ever opened upon an advancing line of men, but on pressed the main glandelinian columns, the carnage becoming more fearful as the christian fire increased still more. Advancing short columns were indeed rushing into the very jaws of death but the steady artillery now now being in general did not affect them and though whole columns were swept down in scores, the survivors pressed on and their yell went up far above the whole roar of battle. On the right of the surging wave of attack was the Hic-Ho lestinians under general Break-In-The-Neck, and the Jumaramban Scallars and Zbrormannians and Omarians under Ambrose Edwin Fuller.

Of these troops also line after line had withered. Yet on rushed the glandelinians yelling like demons and definitely waving their torn battle flags, a left and center of the glandelinian column came on under general janson being about eleven million and eight hundred and eighty eight thousand, seven hundred and seventy seven and it seemed evident now that victory was won though Shoorman's glandelinian division and his whole left flank had been dreadfully torn having now into a most terrific artillery bombardment of nineteen batteries which mowed them down in a way to threaten them with annihilation, and so they alone broke into terrible confusion. General Handon's vivian's divisions of glandelinians pressed on toward the center of the christian line with the same terrific fury, supported by the divisions of Manley, and Manley and also Break-In-The-Neck; now again the battle became general along the line, the whole of the other christian divisions now received from the enemy a most galling fire which tore their own line to fragments, and enabled the glandelinians to carry this position. All the other christian batteries still in position however tore and mangled the left of the glandelinian wave of attack especially those under general Hinterdine Richardson who was killed. His men at his death became terror stricken and broke into utter confusion and panic. He with columns however rushed on more desperately and came close to a stronger position of the position of which appeared to be about ten miles in length, and the massive columns of Angelinians defending it would not yield an inch of ground, and general Galatin quickly rallied other christian columns and reformed them, and while he kept his lines together vivian and many of the generals with their commands reinforced them, and despite the murderous fire of the glandelinians ordered them to hold the position at all hazards. The battle inflamed Angelinians despite the fury of the attack had themselves now rushed over the position and planted their own tattered battle flags on the barricades in the face of their enemies, and then poured in a roaring storming fire of their own. On both sides of the position now lay monstrous windrows of dead and wounded, and the scene was worse than the death delivering stone walls at the battle of Calverine Hills. Yet the Angelinians held to it, and now the struggle became more terrific and fierce. Even general Shoorman's banner had raised his own force on the seemingly victorious Angelinians and both sides met in a titanic hand to hand fight hundreds of thousands of men fighting each other in mortal combat and fighting long and hard and with the fury of desperation, shouting, yelling and cursing at each other.

Even scores of thousands mingled together in frightful death struggle and the clothes of many thousands of the men on both sides were actually torn to shreds by the very flangers of the fighters, and hundreds upon hundreds of Angelinian generals fought to the last by their guns but were killed and captured. The left wing of the christian line had already been defeated and driven back with tremendous loss, general Shoorman's christian side also failing to hold his works, he himself was killed, and S. C. Shoorman's fierce attack upon general Madgalinin's works caused the right of his force to be cut up and the left and center of it destroyed. But the main strong position was the main problem which the glandelinians were striving to carry. Shoorman pressed six million five hundred thousand more men against the christian lines and helped the other assaults to carry it but time and again he met a terrible fire and his men were driven into confusion. The battle finally ended this way the whole christian army having fallen back at every point except the main works, and the failure to carry it made the enemy suffer the consequences later on. This battle had been the worse that had ever raged within this location the combined losses on both sides in slain being about 2,000,000.

In this place also had been situated the battle front with the flag had not even been reached, and one of the christian generals found her before picknell who was looking for her dead. A fall had when her sisters told her how the battle had been fought, and what a day!

When vivian's sister general Hambytonia were the first to be driven back under a shower of fire of Shoorman's cannon. You know Jennie dear, that during the battle, I and my sisters met Shoorman face to face and think what he did!

"What did he do?" asked Jennie.

"I scare of him," glandelinians were shouting at us, and trying to kill us, when he shot several of them down and ordered the rest to stop firing at us, and then told us to go where it was safer, and that he would see that no harm could come to us."

"He is a better glandelinian general than many of them despite his horrible looks," declared picknell. "Keep on the good side of him little girl Princess's of Abbinemia and then probably he will become a friend of your for life."

In the meantime fierce and sanguinary battles had raged between other christian armies under general Johnston, and the glandelinians under Hic-Ho-Forran, at Cecilina Run, Vivian's Plains, St. Michael's Run, at Melby Costellion's castle Caldwell, General, Jason Corinth, Eva St. Clare, St. Albion, Meldenia, and Galatin all being glandelinian victories. There was a christian victory at white Rose town, one at the battle of Rivers Mouth, planket purg purg, Eternal Creek, Angelina's river another at Rivers Mouth and Galatin and the losses of all these battles combined a cost both sides four hundred million men in killed wounded and prisoners. Each army had been over a billion strong. In deed the shadow of the terrible way war hung now like a great thunder cloud over the city of Jennie's riches herself. At any moment the storm threatened to break and involve the frightened inhabitants in the red ruins of massacre and out outrage. Should King Vivian's army retreat all would be lost. In spite of all the attempts to hide the truth the inhabitants of the city were beginning to understand the real position every day during the two frightful battles of Hambytonia. Just written the glandelinian armies under Manley concentrating upon King Vivian had been firing shot into the city and their ceaseless relentless attacks continued along general vivian's lines. If the christian army was surrounded and crushed altogether into such a seething mass of panic stricken humanity and driven from the defenses of the city the result would be a deluge of blood for Manley had issued decrees to all his officers to massacre every man woman or child they came across to give no quarter to no one whatever. General Jennie and Jennie Johnson who opposed this and being in picknell's army was also concentrating against the christian army at Jennie's riches but he refused to do so.

There had been a foretaste of what was to come in the news of the threatening victory of the glandelinians at K. Jennie's riches and of their frustrating vivian's plans to place new armies to besiege vivian's wicket. Thither on the next day during the battle of Jennie's riches was raging general Calamania Shoorman's army had withdrawn from the assault for the rest of the time leaving vivian and the others to the selves and marched with thirteen million fresh rebels under generals go onto and potent and Ren and Binning. In this fierce battle which lasted two hours the foremost of the glandelinian scallants met a crushing defeat but as they were retreating toward Calverine Run the main army came to their aid and after a fearful struggle which raged for two hours in a series of advantages, the glandelinians overwhelmed a goodly portion of the christian army, dealt them a crushing defeat, and as the christianians under Palmer retreating in panic, the leader sent to picknell who was still stationed at Jennie's riches Run the news describing the condition of the defeated army as desperate. In their terror stricken flight the christian columns abandoned everything. The losses of the christian army in this three hours battle of Trot Creek was two million two hundred and fifty five thousand six hundred and sixty six in slain, and four million seven hundred thousand in wounded, and twice as many taken prisoners. It was the total defeat of the largest christian army yet in battle. The enemy lost only three million, four hundred and forty five thousand, six hundred and sixty five in killed and wounded, and three three hundred and forty five thousand, six hundred and sixty six in prisoners, while one thousand eight hundred nine officers of all rank fell. As the glandelinians had dashed on in their frightful pursuit of this half destroyed christian army under general Flandon the veneer of civilization vanished like mist in the morning sunlight. Scenes of indescribable horror followed, as general vivian came up and threw his arms upon the victorious glandelinians.

The battle was redoubled, and the whole battle field seemed given up to rage, massacre and outrage and the hundreds of thousands of the most terrific explosions ever seen in battle before. The battle line at its worse had extended to forty miles, and raged a further without ceasing. The shattered forests were set on fire in many places, and countless thousands of the wounded of both sides perished in the raging flames. In agony of fear many thousands took to retreat and tried to get away from these horrible explosions, it being a regular bombardment of fire and blood. The total glandelinian loss was 10,000,000 in killed and wounded. Total christian loss 100,000,000.

While all this horror was going on Abbeismen sent from Concepcion to the to force a given order to enter a fleet of small gunboats. The had commenced by noon and the fortifications of Lucille, Abbeismen, Concepcion and others by river and bay, but the fire from the fortifications was too hot and in a two or three hours the attacking fleets were completely destroyed. This damage had also been terrible and the loss of ships and men was great but the Abbeismen fortifications had not been discouraged and sent fleets of their own ships to the attack. In second fleet of ships about one thousand in number steamed toward the Thunderbolt fortifications the main center of the Lucille picket fort. Each ship held about twelve hundred men, and twelve thousand marines they being the big gun ships the Abbeismen had ever pushed to an attack and armed with the heaviest cannon. Each ship had one thousand long range guns and looked very serious for those in the fortifications. But the shore near Thunderbolt and fortress Hays, was also armed with strong batteries, and these fortifications were considered impregnable. The ships began firing as they advanced in line, and as these fortifications did not reply they believed the silence, and therefore increased their speed and redoubled their cannon fire. A hundred of the leading ships, including the flagship steamed well within range the marines though thought a volcano broke into eruption from fortress Hays, for the batteries on the shore and the guns of the fortress opened fire with a dreadful thundering roar causing a million echoes all through the bay and along the shore, and the thousand ships received a frightful volley of projectiles that blew many of them in the air, destroyed and sunk the rest, and raked the decks of the others fore and aft. Their masts and cabins were shot away, some had their main cabins riddled and thousands were killed and scores of thousands were wounded.

The survivors of the ships recoiled a little way at this horrid destruction, but turned away at the batteries with their long range guns, and as more ships came on the disabled ones were withdrawn the attack and cannon fire increased.
 Three hundred fresh ships advanced toward the fortifications in the terrific roar of the biggest guns ever heard in a attack on sea, but fortress Thunderbolt and and Concepcion were still silent.

As no reply was sent in by these fortifications the admiral of the Angelinian or Abbeismen fleet began to think the fortifications had been abandoned, and increased the speed of the battle ships but when the foremost of them were well within range the guns of fortress Thunderbolt let fly a series of thunderous broadsides sound like the crash of a thousand volcanic explosions, and where as they ships had been there were only eruptions in the water, the explosions carrying all before it, and when the noise cleared away these ships were gone literally blown out of the water. The surviving ships staggered down at this surprise of the second horror and seeing forty sailing with all on board the others were horrified. Some however steamed round so that their broadsides faced that deadly fortification and rained away like titans but could do nothing. All the while the uproar of the artillery discharge had been inconceivably terrific and could probably have been heard for hundreds of miles, and receiving a regular stream of fire for to minutes the disabled surviving ships, without helm, and with their rigging in tatters and badly riddled, and with one hundred more of them already sinking or blown out of the water were compelled to turn about and steam out of range.

The last of every surviving ship but went by the board, and scores more were already burning in several parts, the crews fighting the fires desperately. From a safer distance they poured broadside after broadside upon the fortifications in quick succession causing an unceasing roar, and the air was full of screaming projectiles and shook with the terrible explosions that clouded the sky with smoke as thick as an approaching storm. The rest of the ships now steamed to the attack, to try their luck and opened fire upon the other fortifications which quickly responded with as many guns as they could bring to bear and the din became something terrible. The sea all upon the fortifications had been very persistent and now three million men were being loaded with the purpose to try and take the fortifications known as Silverbell and St. John by storm. The first assault one million men were sent forward, but after an hours fighting one quarter of that million were killed, and under a tremendous gun fire the survivors badly torn were scattered like chaff and then general Kellogg Heller was killed, hurled over this all the guns of the whole line of ship ships was massed away upon the fortifications, and while ships were being blown up by tons by the enemy's fire

General Hiramshin came on with two million men to try and take the two forts himself and after merciless fighting the assaults succeeded but not without fearful slaughter to break a part of the rebel line. The breach being made the Abbeismen rushed through and captured the main fort and fifty six cannon and ordered within fire on the rebel gunboats. But in overwhelming numbers the gunboats rushed upon them and drove them back with more frightful loss and with the death of their general. But Major General Gregory and Tarbell next made a furious attack on the opposite sides of the fortifications, and during the first assault a of general and a war carrying his point. General Gregory's best force was in when he fell dead pierced by twenty bullets and thus he killed the captain of his regiment. The rebels placed a hundred batteries and a hundred guns.

After the same the general Tarbell was severely wounded and carried from the field.
 Then Tarbell's place general Gregory fought his way up to the very top of the main point and the fortified works which surely would have fallen but had not the attack for the opposite parties been stopped by the death of Gregory. Volcanoes himself fell wounded wounded. General Hiramshin was still engaged with the gunboats who were opening Calcutta and having failed to drive the enemy back along his front now began brought all his captured gun into action, and the gunboats acted with much precision against him however that the Angelinian were repulsed with a heavy loss and fell back to the other side of the column. The general Tarbell made a general attack which was more determined but the gunboats fought with such accuracy against the Nationals who however advanced with irresistible fury, and the enemy alone lost in this savage engagement over eight hundred thousand men. The Christian losses was more terrible. General Tarbell had his shoe shot under him while leading a bayonet charge, and though he pressed forward up to the very gunboat cannon he could not get any further and again the Abbeismen were repulsed with the deaths of General Gregory and the wounding of Tarbell. Wounded of dead and dying lay all along this rear line of battle. Six assaults more had been attempted but each time the assault met with frightful decimation though for their successes the gunboats lost their generals Morrissey, Lawrence Hanson Munby, Collins, George Hamble, Kennedy M. Cunningham, Mansel Gatskin, and Comstock who were killed, while Allen McJelen, and McJewel MacDonald were wounded with Thomas Barnette, John Burgess, O'Connor young, Conroy, Catlin, T. H. Sweeney, Michael Zingonia, Roy Duggan, Acker Johnston, Thomas Callahan, Peter his brother and Charles Galligan, who were all mortally wounded, while Thomas Darryl, M. Michael Fleming, John and his brother John Stevens
 Thomas Stevens, Charles Morio, James Grady, and Charles A. Warner were all wounded.

The attack on the water and land was finally abandoned the admiral having lost thirty nine thousand eight hundred and seventy six men killed and wounded on board ship, and two hundred and thirty nine ships which were blown out of the water, and three hundred and eighty disabled. The Christian losses from the transports was one million killed and three hundred thousand wounded. The fortifications by land and during the final land action lost two million more. Thirty nine big guns had been disabled and none of the fortifications was slightly battered.
 Picknell's gunboats which were still holding its positions near Jennie picknell heard of this bombardment of picknell by sea and the general himself said with a look of surprise:

"They thought they could win it by sea but have not done it yet and will never do so in twenty years if they had the angels to help them."
 Despite the threatening Christian defeat Picknell was loath never to abandon Jennie picknell but with his reserves threw forward new armies behind the same old works and high achievements which already had made his positions unassailable and right good as an impregnable for an enemy to run himself into. General Shoemack knew of this, and while he prepared to make a general heavy bombardment of this strong position he sent three days later forces to flank picknell out of his position without the risk of running any more forces into too great a slaughter as before, as by now his army was almost crippled by its fearful losses. In the meantime Violet and her sisters wanted very much to find their way back to general Hanson, Angelina and asked picknell a way to get out of the region without any danger from the fearful perils. When they came before general picknell and told him what they were going to do he said:

"I do not like to let you go for now since the King has offered money and his side over fifty five million dollars for the delivery of all child on captured near Jennie picknell, and therefore they are more dangerous than usual since we threaten giving picknell. But of course as it is your immediately safety from the threatening ravages of this battle, and as you are the Princesses of Abbeismen I cannot refuse. But in going away from here you must be careful, for the shelling of any of the sections of the country is very heavy now, and look out for the rebel picknell generals for there are two more in the enemy lines, and every one of them is as wild as hutchers. You can go, but watch out for any of them, especially general Henry Gossard picknell."
 They promised to do so and departed later set off on their journey to escape the terrible this fearful battle horror.

"But these two battles were terrible ones," said Angelina as they came in sight of one of the rounder military lines. "But I can tell you are facing the rebels under General Shoemack. It must be his center."

"I wonder in what direction his center is," said Violet.
 "He is in picknell's center of the left wing or right wing of the center."
 said Violet.
 "It is a hard matter to say," said Violet. "Said Catherine with a gleeful look. "But I can tell you, I can tell you the right wing of the center of the battle that are now, and instead of looking for Hanson or just now how best to find out the direction of the foe, and then picknell from behind."

So slowly she lifted her arm and leveled her fist at his chest. Before he could an instant it there was a flash, followed by an explosion, and reeling he fell on the smoking little girl he let her down, staggered backward, and then fell to the ground with a thud, and lay motionless in death agony. Though poor Jennie did not at once recover from her shocking she managed to haul a dagger to poor Violet but she was almost overcome by the strangulation she herself sustained, and her tongue was pretruding all the length. Being almost unconscious she was too weak to hold the dagger, and she let it fall and being thrust first one of the gladiators managed to shock poor Jennie but was strangled to the heart, by but a yet there were seven more left beside general Pickens in battle with. As these rushed at her and her sisters they managed to bring a number down with well aimed shots and rescued Angelina before she was strangled to death. Jennie having secured a severe wound kept the rebels at bay by well aimed shots, while Angelina, Jennie and her other sisters attacked the Gladiators who were trying to shock Violet to death. Violet was so purple and presented all the symptoms of suffocation, pain and strangulation. Angelina and Jennie made dash at her and plunging their daggers into the abdomen of the man shocking Violet she he dropped to the ground mortally wounded, they rose. Violet from his grasp and slapped her on the back to make her recover for she was about to die.

Several more gladiators rushed forward to overpower them when all at once without the slightest warning there was an uproar as if the whole world was coming to an abrupt end. Before you could count one Violet and her sisters were pinched under a big tree which stretched down upon them with the roar of an explosion. At the same time the earth beyond seemed to rise high into the air and simultaneously an unearthly blackness obscured everything from view, and the uproar of the crash and the noise of falling trees was so fierce that it seemed to be some infernal blow. The gladiators seemed to have been swept from the ground as if they were feathers, there was an insupportable and of terror, pain, terror, confusion, confusion, confusion, confusion and confusion of men dashed together and thrown 4 or up into the air without the power of resistance.

Violet and her sisters had been stupored by the falling trees and lay still even after the sudden tremendous uproar had subsided. The very flash of the gladiators' explosion seemed to have scattered or shot along the ground and the crash or thunder of the blast had been loud enough to have the thrown down the steepest hillside from the conclusion. Everything made by nature seemed to have been torn to pieces by the great mine explosion, and the masses of spreading everywhere about in every place with an agonizing blackness.

When poor Violet recovered she found herself covered with spots of the bleeding bodies of the dead children, and also some wreckage and lots of earth, tossed upon her by the fury of the explosion. Struggling furiously to free herself from the tree she found it pretty hard, but she managed to shake the bodies from her and then free herself. Her throat felt sore from the awful choking and her head badly wounded caused by the explosion excepted greatly. It was still dark the smoke still lay over about it being early morning but the moon still shining could be seen through the haze and by the light she managed to drag her sisters free from the trees and to a clearer section of the ground after climbing over branches of trees a score of feet. The smother of blood and water was mixed together by the rain, and the odor of the powder was horribly strong and Violet was indeed terrified when she saw that her clothes were almost covered with blood. Lying down and fear was also tearing at her heart. She stepped over her sisters to see if they had recovered, and observing them to be lying as still as the corpses over yonder she believed they were dead, and only herself left alive to die when again discovered by the gladiators of the main army. Her heart beat wildly with fright and every time she saw a moving shape similar she believed it was a gladiator. Violet laid on top of her sisters and wept bitterly.

"Oh dear God! oh dear God!" I could almost wish I had died with them when the trees fell on top of me and not to have it. This horror all over again. What will papa do if he finds they are gone? I am dear God but I think they are not dead. They may have been saved from the army by the explosion but when the trees had not killed them. My dear friends are now in heaven!

"What's the matter, where were you?" spoke several voices. "We were asleep and not dead."

Her sisters were sitting up but now they arose.

"It threw us down so violently." Violet spoke as she looked at her clothes and as saw how ragged and blood stained they were.

"I don't know." answered Violet. "It happened so suddenly."

Fifteen minutes later still horror stricken they started on their way toward the Christian lines they observed in the distance, and as it grew lighter they saw the further away the explosion had wrought, and then realized the queerness of their being so suddenly knocked down and so violently. Near by was a gigantic crater in the ground and on its edge where there had stood before a whole forest only a tree here and there were left standing. They made slow progress over the fallen trees, but as it was lighter they could now see their way. They ascended the ridge where they had been seized but could not see any Christian camp anywhere.

However were a camp, but the gladiators' flag flying.

"I wonder if any of the gladiators in our father's army ever seen me?" asked Angelina. "I have been gone for over a week and were captured during the three or four battles of years before."

Suddenly the sound of rattling horses reached their ears and fearing they were a squad of the army, Violet and her sisters hid behind a pile of tall rocks. Soon the horses came into sight, and seeing they were American ordered with gladiators.
Violet and her sisters did not dare leave their hiding place, until the column had passed by as soon as Violet and her sisters left their hiding place after the passing of the gladiators, they were suddenly seized from behind, blindfolded, and carried off, to no one knows where.

In the meantime fierce action was being prepared for at Jennie Pickens. Hanley had concentrated large forces upon that no town but found Robert Vivian's army immediately opposed to him. During the time the action advanced was seen around general Callahan came riding up to general Hanley. Vivian saying:

"Your main division are also coming for his Majesty King Robert Vivian is going to make a brilliant and determined attack on Hanley's lines."

"We had a horrible experience during the time the army made his concentrating, a scene too horrible to explain, but you will observe it when you reach those grounds, where one of our fighting parties passed over early this morning."

Jennie Vivian at the head of one of his divisions now standing on his horse and addressing said to Hanley:

"You know Uncle the Vivian girls my sisters have not shown up since they left general Pickens' lines near Morris. I am worried about them. I also observed something that occurred yesterday about a mile from here. I expect you Uncle to take no prisoners in this battle."

"All right your Excellency." said Hanley. "But your sisters may have been captured by the gladiators and their intentions are probably known."

"Hanley's army is lined with millions of sharpshooters and artillery." declared another general riding up. "and you will only run your divisions into total destruction if you advance against the insurgent position just now, and if you are not more cautious."

"Well there are your own divisions." and you may lead them." said Jennie addressing. "I am in command here and I'll do the thing for or in my own idea. Hanley you to your command forward and give the enemy hell. You general! No go forward too but be cautious. We'll storm the enemy at all points simultaneously."

General Powell pondered Johnston prepared his divisions for the cautious attack. on general Federal divisions but he soon observed movements that made him fear that Johnston's divisions would flank Jennie's divisions and defend his superior of the danger and therefore was ordered to attack Johnston's artillery of masonry main system and been parted with care and covered in close order out on an open plain. While his divisions were executing their ghastly attack wherein the silence of their ranks a cautious approach was to be succeeded by the din and fury of a desperate onslaught and determined defense, the guns were to be guarded by Jennie's divisions closely. These guns had done much splendid execution in the previous battle, and were loaded to a vast shell the other columns went forward with just the plain old snail-like cartridges were to be loaded in the rifles, but the mute but so terrible bayonet was to do all the work necessary. This was the command given by General Jennie. Amen.

Suddenly in the grim and noiseless hour of a bloody morning the Christian divisions led by this time were in reach of the enemy's cannon. The storm of balls, and shells, fell before and behind them, but on pressed the Angelians to the point at which the fire seemed the most severe. Advancing in front of the cannon they got to within gunshot shot range of the enemy and scarcely was death of the front line was inflicted the cannon both there and at their rear began pouring a murderous hail whistled by the hundred within few inches of his head, but he fell not. The surviving lines fired with deadly effect upon their foes, and rushing forward received a perfect stream of fire that raked them frightfully, killing hundreds of officers including one of the generals. The horror of the fight now became awful.

Noise and confusion of many kinds prevailed, the incessant firing of thousands of cannon, the murderous whistling discharges of masonry extending for miles, the whistling of balls, the bursting of thousands of bombs, the roar of artillery, the noise advance of long lines of infantry, the shouts of the conquering, the groans of the dying, the shrieks of the wounded, large multitudes of the dead lying upon the ground, the carrying off, of the wounded by scores of thousands, and all enveloped in a cloud of smoke all to make one vast spectacle of horror such as never before Johnston had never dashed into before. He passed over many of the wounded Angelians, and oh how he wanted to aid them but could not.

Many men were found with bayonets in them, some side by side, each with his bayonet in the other. Over the dead and wounded the Christian column charged, and a most terrible fight raged for an hour, and the charging column suffered terribly many being shot and mangled without mercy. But now a large portion of the sea on Powell's right began to retire at a trot and in great disorder. At their approach, the enemy having lost two divisions of men which were annihilated, so left an excellent rifle battery of four hundred guns in the possession of Powell's right. Johnston's men, after all the cannonading had fought until all their horses were killed and they also everywhere the ground was strewn with scores of thousands of dead and fell wounded falling every minute. One of the Angelinians was set upon by a strapping fellow who gave him a pretty severe cut on the head with his sabre and knocked him from his horse. In another moment a second graysont seized him by the neck and strangled.

"We have got one damn or dh Christian dog anyhow."

The Christian soldier did not see it in the light however, and quickly drawing his pistol shot his captor dead, but now the greater part of Johnston's army was coming to the rescue of the defeated soldiers, Powell's right Johnston's army was attacked by a vastly superior force, and seeing his danger the Christian soldier, who had been in danger of capture brought down two majors, and a general and in the few minutes of confusion caused in the gray line rallied his regiment and began to retire. Jimmie saw that Johnston was checked by a barricade of trees, and that the rest of his divisions could not go to his aid, so he opened with a rain of shot and shell raining up to the ground and bringing down multitudes of graysonts.

The Christians fought like fatal devils to cover Powell's right Johnston's retreat, and soon Jimmie's whole line attacked furiously by general Nemo Green's unarmoured opened a heavier fire, but the enemy's infantry attacked with unceasing fury, and succeeded in driving several divisions on the right of Benjamin's line away in great confusion, and advanced upon Benjamin's whololins full tilt, and that was met by a counter charge on the part of the divisions under general Walter Jennings and now a fiercer struggle a rabid hundreds of thousands of terrific discharges of spherical case or other shot resounded upon Jennings' divisions which staggered them back, but they held their position despite the horrid carnage, and as full mile tudes and divisions came within range of the Christian fire they melted away almost instantly. But a part of the main line dashed furiously upon Jennings' front and during the fierce onset which was met by a sheet of flame from the Christian guns Jennings received a wound in the fleshy part of the left arm. Yet he retained his command but during the sanguinary conflict received a second wound in the thigh, but fell only upon his knee. He planted the flag upon the parapet and kept the colors flying. Despite their losses the enemy kept up the fire as fierce onset and though a monstrous multitude of the Angelinians hit the dust, it stayed them not. On they came yelling like demons scores of thousands of them crowding Jennings' position, but were mowed down, and broken and repulsed, the thinned line of the enemy suddenly retreating. The sharpshooters along Benjamin's line kept up an unceasing fire upon their assailants, while the valley from his main line was also continually four times in thirty thirty minutes whole columns millions strong rushed to the assault, until the whole ground where the sanguinary conflict was raging was covered with hundreds of thousands of slain and wounded. So, Colonel Thompson's plucky whose regiment attacked with the rest of the Glandelinians was shot through the head, and before he fell to the ground a shell struck him in the abdomen and in exploding blew him to pieces, swirling his intestines all over the man nearest him. His spinal column was found several feet from his mangled body. A few minutes later when the attack on Jennings' line was again in full swing he received a wound in the shoulder but he still refused to leave the field, as his leaving would discourage the men, where his own men were falling in thousands. Jennings was about to try to stand, when mid white a bullet past his face, about three inches from it, and made him draw back in a hurry. Jennings leveled his pistol in the direction of the advancing onset, and fired, and loaded and fired again. He got his revolver in readiness again, when another bullet whizzed pretty close. Then came another whose hiss could be heard for fully a hundred yards, and it went through another general's shoulder riding up near him. As he fell from his horse, several of his comrades picked him up.

Now a horseman came past in a hurry and when he was right opposite Jennings a ball struck his horse in the fore shoulder. Off tumbled the man, and down fell the horse, stiffened out and died. If the ball had gone through the animal it would doubtless have struck Jennings. A dozen now a hinned past Jennings' head almost a running man and a moment later he saw twelve men dead about him, and six more wounded picked up by the comrades. Oh the horrors of war. Jennings' line was now ordered to charge the advancing enemy, and in doing so they passed through such a heavy fire of minnie balls and traps and snipers that in that one charge hundreds of thousands were mowed down killed and wounded. The color bearer of the division being mortally wounded planted the colors in the ground amid the dreadful carnage and seeing the line in purple waving another man wounded as he was or crawled forward, seized the colors from amid a pile of slain and waving them in the face of the foe called upon the line to rally to it, which they did, but the enemy was advancing in overwhelming numbers and after more sanguinary fighting Jennings' line again was re-been Jennings' men retreated in a stampede and after some time spent in trying to calm them and directing the most of the men to form across the road using their muskets horizontally as a guard to press them back, the impact became so great that the men were swept aside and a great rout appeared inevitable. Just then a army quartermaster's wagon came down the road in the other direction, and a score of Jennings' men seized the wheels and ran the wagon perpendicularly across the road, which enabled the Angelinians to make a kind of barricade. But still some of the more active being terrified swarmed over the very canvas top of it with the agility of great acrobats. Finally a check was maintained, something like order was restored, and the stampede went back quietly, their apprehensions having been overcome by the steady departments of Jennings' men who laughed them out of their fears. If they had not arrested this panic as it had been a more serious danger if not a catastrophe perhaps the whole army would have stampeded then and there.

By general Jimmie's orders a large section of the Christian batteries was placed again in position and a destructive and effective fire was now opened upon the enemy's advancing army. The thousands of hurtling shells came in quick succession like soap bubbles blown from an eager child's pipe. They came in a fixed direction and left a scene of slaughter not to be gined from more destructive description. Everywhere was fresh numbers of slain and dying. Yet still uncomplaining warriors meeting each officer as they traversed back and forth over the same fighting ground melted away. Guns and sabres were scattered here and there, amid haversacks clothing and canteens, and also arms strewn broadcast to lighten the burdens or given up with life itself, as men quickly obeyed order to rally on the colors or face the enemy's fire with unflinching celerity. All this horrid debris, with abandoned accoutrements, and cartridge boxes, told of the repeated conflicts, and desperate charges that had taken place along the lines.

AN OCEAN STORY, casting all the wreckage of its fitful and pugna violence upon the shores, violently tossing the fragments hither and thither in a rain relentless sowing of destruction, crashing and breaking the victims of its wrath, with faces marbled and frozen from the grimaces of pain would alone be comparable to the pitiless clash of men in deadly grapple for the mastery of that fated field near Jennie's Ridge. Three thousand cannon now helped to check the enemy's advance or almost mortal advance, and plowed frightful avenues by the hundred through the lines of men in which gray was the color of most of the Glandelinian uniforms. Jimmie's divisions were able simultaneously in delivering a most destructive fire upon the Angelinian Confederate troops advancing upon the divisions under Jennings, and many times strategic points in the fields were occupied alternately by the gray and purple coats but finally in the full fury of the bloody contest, Ben's men returned to the ground to become again furiously engaged there in the flanking movements that were taking place with an enemy as badly crippled and confused as Jennings' line was in the now raging inferno of the storm of battle.

The storm of artillery fire on both sides was very destructive and an enormous concentration of the enemy's guns were made on an angular formation of the very Christian lines, and whole divisions by the score were swept with terrible effect, sometimes in flank and rear, but often from inflicting points. Other Christian batteries of quick firing guns had every officer in it killed or wounded and general Henry Garner taking command of it was slain in the field a few minutes after severely wounded. Every gun along the whole Christian line was belching flame and smoke and vapor: were batteries kept more occupied. General Bacon, with Corcoran's five thousand guns of the heavy type opened an appalling fire of grape and canister at close range an unusual and hazardous thing in handling artillery. The fierce onslaught of general Furgatorius' flanking Glandelinian columns had already driven in Benjamin's divisions and hurried them back upon the main line of hindering a force, and the crash of steel, and the flame of musketry was fierce and sanguinary.

On pressed the Glandelinians yelling like demons, and in less time than it takes to tell it the Christian ranks opened fire all along their line and the uproar was more deafening. Standing in a state of relief against the background of the soot thick musketry and a monotonous discharge now at close range took on an outline for nearly ten miles of a lurid quivering undulating sheet of flame from flames. It was answered in steel by fixed harrows of the graysonts but now countless numbers went down. Soon the frightful conflict reached up and into the stronger portions of the Christian lines and to that of general Hindernine. In one of the hottest and deadliest centers the color regiments of Colonel Goughmanns command moved with one impulse of pent impatience through the tangled inferno like waves and soon brought up into the Angelinian rifle pits on their front and it seemed for a moment if an ill the doom of a blast furnace had opened upon the gray line. But though scores of thousands went down per minute everywhere, the bayonet was silently and effectually at work. It made no noise but in the deadly lunges scored a deadly reckoning. But the deadlier Christian line, reinforced, now moved forward upon the enemy in unswerving lines, and the enemy not able to stand that fiery undulating wall and wave of sulphurous ignition and scorching blast of thousands of Angelinian cannon, fell back and landing in a snarl position of defense, if not attack, on the other side of the fighting ditch opened themselves, a most fierce musketry fire whole new formations were made by general Furgatorius, to take up another position.

Sengulino was struck by a musket ball on the left shin forehead, and staggering fell against a tree stump, but was picked up by some Angelinians. The glandelinians had pressed over J Kinderline's works now in appalling numbers, and the Angelinians fell back, their steady firing ceasing, while Purgatorians army opened a heavy fire of artillery and a heavier storm of musketry which crashed among the christian lines with more telling effect. But now general Hanson given was throwing forward forces to general Kinderline's aid, and general S. a Sidney James Riessen bary whose guns had made such havoc from well chosen points of the tangled battle field was swept away in death, behind his belching guns, while Purgatorians had towed his foremost divisions for fear of their annihilation. The constant fire of artillery with the bursting shells, and the deafening crash of musketry was awful. A few minutes later general Purgatorian was also borne from the field wounded. Quickly the woods in front of general Purgatorians receding lines became alive with Hansons Angelinians and Abyssinkilians in close column by divisions, and brigades, who delivered at once a most galling fire. The trees tops had been populous with sharpshooters in struts to pick off glandelinians officers wherever they could discern them. Shoemans massive Scodler glandelinian columns charged with fixed bayonets to drive the cheering confident christian force back as they surged toward them. This was repeated subsequently several times when the attacking line on their front became so heavy and aggressive that Shoemans forces were forced to fall back.

But general Lucian Baldwin, who had been massing his forces upon Hanson to drive him, or his Angelinians and Abyssinkilians before them, it with sheer force of numbers and the firing of both sides was again most terrific, and well directed.

Hansons forces in double lines made a terrific charge, and in the space of fifteen minutes his lines and officers became so frightfully decimated that it seemed useless to cope with the so replenished lines of Scodlers and Mangaboos hurled against his columns, though his forces had cut them up frightfully. One thousand three hundred gathering guns were brought forward and opened on Picknells troops in oblique directions, and especially upon his right and left flank, but reaching the right of the line after the rally, Shoemans directed the rear columns of his rallied divisions to close up and maintain the line (go out and die) and soon general Hanson given was hard pressed by the enemy, who swarmed upon his thinned line in an alling numbers.....

The deadly fire kept up by the marksmen in the trees, added to the discomfiture and loss and it seemed to Hanson if nothing human could withstand it, the officers were being picked off unerringly, and among them general Groaty Joy received a ball through the right lung, staggering back from the right of the colors, he sank on one knee to investigate how much of a wound he had received. Pressing his left hand to his breast, his right hand having become paralyzed from the shock of the ball passing entirely through his body he found that he was bleeding profusely and growing weak. He rested his hip on the ground, and steadied himself in a half sitting position, with the good arm, and eluded that his best chance was to remain perfectly quiet, and as quiet as possible. Lieutenant Calvin Shoeman another of his general rushed to his aid and tenderly asked him what the matter was, and the extent of his injury.

General Joyce told him, that he had been shot through the right lung and if there was any discretion on his part so as to pull through, it would be in keeping still.

"But the whole of our line is being driven back," said Calvin. "the christian dogs are pouring upon us everywhere in great numbers, and if you remain where you are you surely will be captured." He added, "You must make an effort and let us get you to the rear, where the surgeons and the field hospital is located."

Finally yielding to his entreaty Joyce got on his feet, his right arm hanging limply and powerless, and powerless, he tottered along with him. They had gone but a short distance when the shelling and musketry fire having made the air murky and sulphurous, he saw what appeared to be several divisions of men lying on the ground probably three hundred thousand strong, seemingly lying on the ground on their arms, and as he supposed, held in reserve, but who were really all dead.

Along the whole christian line now the battle raged, and the whole scene became more like an inferno. General Hanley led one million five hundred thousand, against general Jimmie Vivians columns, and his batteries poured streams of shot, shell, canister and grape shots upon the massive gray lines, but swarming in, overwhelming numbers the glandelinians threw themselves upon the whole of Jimmie Vivians force with the most dreadful fury if fury can be termed.

General Jimmie Vivians center in the midst of the most dreadful carnage was driven in (where) with dreadful loss, and would have been obliged to retreat, but Gannons general line of cannon under general Quintus Kormann opened a hell storm of fire upon Manleys shelling columns and for fifteen minutes the almost decimated glandelinian columns were held at bay. It was a fire that nothing human could stand before, and hundreds of thousands who had rushed up to the muzzles of Kormanns and Levine Meldons batteries and swarmed over general Vivians works were either moved down short, or blown to pieces with intestines scattered all around like a blizzard. In meeting this fire Manleys line was of assault was reduced to fifty thousand and he was appalled.

Manley took and her howdahs however hurled another massive column against the christian works, the tremendous fire of Gannons cannon neither aimed to the right or left, but Manley was bound to carry general Jimmie Vivians, and after some superhuman effort managed to push the entire advanced line of Gannons christian divisions and Jimmie Vivians Abyssinkilian Winkies back from their works and behind their cannon barrage, but Gannons gathering guns were run up to the point and the fire from these guns, added by the others placed ragged avenues in Manleys whole column, and he could get no further now having lost three million at this point alone! Just on account of Gannons guns. The fire alone of general Jimmie Vivians right under general Maurice Ben, Benigan, was more tremendous than Gannons infantry or artillery, and in the terrific and most bloody fight that raged for four hours along the whole line, officers of all ranks on both sides went down like by the score, the glandelinian columns of Shoemans Scodlers rushing madly to the charge were torn in pieces, with scores of generals down, and general Jimmie Vivians columns of Winkies Abyssinkilians strove with the fury of hundreds of thousands of demons to retake their works, but wave after wave of counter charging troops met with frightful destruction. Jimmie Vivians was seriously wounded but retained his command, Kormann the battery commanders killed, and Gannon wounded in the left leg, and still the Angelinians held on like leeches.

General Jacob Baldwin seeing that Manleys columns held the works against all the horrible assaults and cannon cannon fire of Jimmie Vivians divisions and fought with the same stubbornness as the Angelinians themselves, drew up his own guns and opened upon the gray columns with showers of grape and canister, which tore Manleys whole line to flying fragments, and pushed forward with three million of his Abyssinkilians and Winkies, and amid the dreadful carnage in which scores of divisions were decimated by the terrible return artillery fire along the rebel front, reached the works, but just as hundreds of thousands of Winkies swarmed over they were all cut down by a searching withering fire, and he himself fell seriously and dangerously wounded. Thousands upon thousands of his Abyssinkilians fell everywhere along the line and the struggle was more fearful.

Under a rain of millions of minies the surviving purple columns now began to retire, and the glandelinians receiving reinforcements advanced on the Angelinians with greater fury driving Baldwin half decimated army back to and from their main works with more dreadful loss and with the wounding of general Henry Baldwin, Jacob Baldwin's brother, and a mortal fighting raged along portions of Gannons retiring divisions for four hours, but he was hard pressed by the enemy who kept on advancing despite the terrific fire from a line along the christian line, and outnumbered, Hanson was forced to fall back, and the enemy capturing his line of works held them firmly, and placed Hansons line with a rain of shot and shell.

In the meantime Shoemans having reformed his shattered and broken lines pushed forward to retake Kinderline from his position which he still held. Kinderline was poured in a veritable tempest of shot and shell. More and more of the enemy came down upon the fields and it was too much for poor Kinderline, and he was overwhelmed and forced back his lines battly out of it. It was already four o'clock in the afternoon, the furious battle showing no signs of abatement, the whole christian line was now falling back and the battle seemed lost. After three hours of bloodier fighting Jimmie Vivians forces were also driven back with most dreadful loss, and general Purgatorians men now under the command of general Joseph Jennis massed together and swept upon the recoiling christian lines with the most tremendous fury, using the bayonet once more with good effect. The carnage during the rout was more fearful than we can even think, but the christian forces were in slow retreat. The receding fire along the christian line was still effective but the countless numbers of glandelinians continued to press on.

During that afternoon it had been a simultaneous attack all along their line but now it was a series of separate engagements, and this enabled general Jimmie Vivian at the same occasion of the fighting at one part, to move his unengaged forces to the main point of attack, and now the assailants met with more resistance than before. But Adels-De-Car has great forces advanced to the assistance of the glandelinians. Shoemans right grand divisions being almost annihilated was succeeded, while Picknell and Manley maintained portions of the Angeline pieces and Jennie Riches plains and succeeded in capturing a strong christian battery. Manley now directed Picknell to cross his forces over these great plains, to sweep another gap across the great Jennie's Bridge and carry the left of the christian line at all hazards, the Angelinians having made another stand on new ground. The crossing was affected under a murderous fire by Right P.M., surging round to the west with his three divisions Picknell went into fierce action against the Angelinian left, his attack being assisted by a number of batteries which inflamed a part of general Jimmie Vivians line and caused frightful carnage. The result was the gradual and general withdrawal of the Angelinians to the woods of Jennie Riches, where a terrible struggle raged until 10 P.M. Picknells forces having been reinforced again caused a swift withdrawal of the christian line whose firing all that time had been simply dreadful. Smash-In-The-Head was severely wounded in this four hours sanguinary fighting in the darkness of that bloody but moonlight night. Adela-De-Garbo left, entering the woods ran into a terrible ambush of twenty Angolitan brigades on his front, and thirty on his flank, with the result of the annihilation of that division. Adela-De-Garbo was severely wounded, his main divisions falling back badly crippled and shattered, with the loss of ten brigade commanders but nevertheless they were rallied and reinforced. Calhoun Shoemann made a most spirited and determined assault upon the Christian line along his own front, and fortunately the right of the Christian center, where Shoemann's main columns were also attacking, and where they had seemed to mass an overwhelming force had been shattered by an infiltrating fire of three thousand masked guns as they with their whole line gave way before Shoemann's assault, and it was quickly discovered, that by wheeling to the left they could flank and infiltrate the troops who held so tenaciously held the edge of the plains near the woods near Schlossers big barn. But amid the horrible firing the attempt failed, and the whole plain was literally covered as thick as straw straw with dead and wounded Angolitans and Kindernines together. Despite their being exposed to the sharp artillery fire from batteries on both sides of it the plains, assault after assault of the most pugnaeous character was made, and only abandoned when Johnnie Johnston was severely wounded.

At about one-o'clock in the night, there was a lull in the firing and hostilities were practically suspended by the left and center of the armies for the remainder of the night, but along the right it so still raged with unabated fury. Bicknell's batteries infiltrated the Angolitans in his immediate front, and then he stormed the purple lines but met with frightful decimation and was unsuccessful, but this attack was followed by another, and meeting with the same result, general Richard Plantersby was sent to flank Kindernine, which was done amid the most horrible carnage at 5 P.M.

After five hours of the most sanguinary fighting general Bicknell's entire command as it moved forward was subjected to a cover of fire from the Christian batteries, and meeting with the most frightful decimation, Bicknell's columns on the left and center being shattered and mangled, recoiled but the right stood its ground and began firing in an alarming way. Kindernine's series of stands was marked by horrible windrows of dead, dying, and wounded, but general Walter Jennings managed to drag forward one thousand six hundred machine guns and opened another fire of double shotted canister, mowing down the gray columns completely. Hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of rebels were lying afresh on the ground, but Bicknell's main line obscured in the thick smoke of the smoke except on, but now Jimmie Vivian arrived once more with three thousand guns which of course had to close just in time to be captured. The increasing and steady roar of Jennings' cannon was frightful.

But the Gladiolians who captured Jimmie Vivian's guns among them around and threw a perfect tempest of shot and shell upon the Christian artillery line causing more frightful carnage, and damaging many acres of Christian musketry. Now Jennings men turned their attention to the captured guns, and soon all of Bicknell's men found themselves in the midst of one of the worst roaring infernos of battle they had ever seen before. Whole columns of his men were mowed down, and to add to the terrible carnage

Jimmie Vivian by the help of his father managed to bring forward fresh guns and poured an extra tempest of shot and shell upon Bicknell's lines and now his men began to fall in larger multitudes, his whole line being shattered, maimed and mangled, with their survivors torn and bleeding, and columns by the score torn and rent to pieces.

But supported by Hanson, Bicknell made a series of the most furious and determined assaults, but in these attacks which were repulsed with slaughter of horrible cruelty, Hanson and Hanson were mortally wounded, and Bicknell though wounded himself, strove to rally his men. Kindernine had now received heavy reinforcements sent by Robert Vivian and now advanced upon Bicknell, meeting his divisions with the fury of desperation. Shoemann seeing that the gallant Bicknell was severely wounded in that roaring inferno, went to the aid of his men with all his command and fiercer fighting continued with bloody and merciless savagery for two hours more, then Shoemann seeing that his divisions were making impression on the purple lines, ordered a charge.

As Shoemann's army came on in big masses, Kindernine's men strove with demoniac fury to drive them back, and retained their ground with great stubbornness, and as the gray columns still came on, Jimmie Vivian ordered all his infantry divisions to be thrown forward, and these struck against Shoemann's line of advance like a thunder bolt. The Angolitan infantry during their impetuous onset strove in Shoemann's center, but met a merciless storm of minies and canister and were forced to recoil. The losses of the infantry and the suddenness of their decimation so disconcerted them, and leaving hundreds of thousands of more dead and wounded where they lay, they fell back, Jennings batteries covering their retreat.

All of Jennings' guns were in a titanic uproar, and every 15 seconds a column was torn in Shoemann's line and the whole of Kindernine's main front was hidden in smoke and flashing flames. Jimmie Vivian had now been wounded a second time, and all of Jennings' gunners were either killed, wounded or captured, and he himself wounded again. Despite the withering discharges of minie and canister Shoemann's whole line had continued on like an avalanche and carried the guns. Kindernine himself was wounded now, but his men did not falter or fall back until the bold and desperate advance of the enemy overwhelmed them horribly. Then as the gladiolians who were now rolling like millions of demons broke through the long line of barricades, General Vivian again opened a tremendous fire with his heavy and cannon cannon, while his infantry kept up a murderous fire with minie and gathering guns, and even used bayonets in a cruel manner.

The battle was indeed now terrific in the extreme. Maurice Gottlieb now arrived with nine parks of Gatling guns and opened a more fearful storm of bullets and canister and also grape and increased the carnage in a frightful manner, threatening the new plants with annihilation. Under this terrific and almost annihilating fire that was raking his men in line with indescribable fury, Shoemann saw his left grand division give way gradually, and he dreading that this would cause a general retreat, sent general Johnston with his divisions from his center to his left, but when he got there, he found that the left wing was in retreat, and trying to rally the men fell mortally wounded. The loss of officers then became frightful. General Pontiffie Glendenn, Hilary Jiggs, Dye Doyle, Filadelfian and fields and Chetelton were severely wounded, Buster Johnston was killed, William Patrick was mortally wounded, and also was general Heaney, while Edward J. Carr, Patrick J. McKay, Frank J. Scott, Col. Angelo, Logan, Patrick Howard, Kiscoo Turner, Gallagher Hager, General Feller, Sullivan Handouts, and Revere Revillie were also all mortally wounded. These very Gladiolitan generals had shown remarkable service at the Bristol too Station battle, where they had received their first wounds.

One of Kindernine's left grand divisions was being withdrawn from Shoemann's front, but over seventy thousand still stood fast, and in doing his utmost in encouraging his men Maurice Gottlieb fell severely wounded, and was reported also mortally wounded. His men were confused over his fall, and Cannon did his best to rally them, and urged them to stand firm by their work and hurl back the advancing columns in gray. In the meantime general Hanson, Vivian and his nephew Jimmie had under fierce stand near the Maroon. Illusion Plains and the artillery fire along their two whole lines was terrific, and many thousands of regiments of Gladiolians went down before this rain of shot and shell and high explosives, which seemed to tear the very battle field up into the air. Hundreds of massive columns of all kinds advanced with the ferocity of demons. Despite the fact of the fury of the Christian fire general Manley continued on and Jimmie Vivian managed to change front and throw forward great forces of Abyssinians and Concentinians every day to oppose Manley's advancing columns who were also crossing Jimmie's river, and amid the frightful carnage which made the scene a bloodier inferno than ever, or like a regular inferno of blood, fire and mangled flesh and intestines, he received a third wound and had to go to the rear. Five thousand of Robert Vivian's guns were now pushed forward and turned upon the furiously advancing Gladiolitan columns but they came on, the whole Christian army under Jennings was now crushed to fragments and driven back across Jimmie's bridge, which the enemy at once occupied after a regular tug of war with ten other Christian divisions which maintained the flooring of the gigantic bridge with the slain of both sides. The whole battle line was indeed a regular morn morgue.

All along general Hanson's line lay long fresh dead and wounded thickly strewn on the ground but the dead and wounded graycoats lay in long windrows. Manley's whole columns though they met such frightful losses continued the same, and most furious and still more determined attack, and with redoubled fury on general Vivian's entire line and four four hours a most terrific death struggle raged, but at last the greater part of general Vivian's line was driven back again into confusion, and as Manley's columns so pushed forward in regular blazing fiery waves, Roswell Buster Johnston again rallied the retreating columns, and as general Henry Buster arrived with one million three hundred thousand red coated Winkie Abyssinians, the Angolitans again made a most furious and stubborn stand, and Roswell Buster Johnston's Angolitans on receiving heavy reinforcements was thrown upon the left grand division of general Manley's army, and during the further hours of terrific fighting in which both sides seemed to try their best to annihilate each other, general Vivian reestablished his broken and shattered lines and began to withdraw slowly, but his covering artillery rent and tore the whole gray line in their front to a thousand men and melting away the rear wave like a great thaw in a river during the summer heat. The left grand division of Kindernine's army now under general Roswell Buster Johnston was rolled up in confusion a thousand fold, but Roswell Buster Johnston came to his aid and after general Vivian rallied again, and in the severe and mortal fighting that followed both Buster Busters fell, Roswellian mortally wounded.

The dead and wounded lay for many scores of miles and even several portions of the woods were on fire, but the steady and constant attack of Manley's divisions was kept up and soon the whole of a general retreat was withdrawing.

In the meantime the retreat of the Christian line under General Hanson, which stood fast despite every effort to dislodge him, began along his front both sides contented stubbornly, then Hanson's whole force also gave way, as the charge of the glandelinians was irresistible. General Anderson attacked the left or right of Hanson's army, and a portion of the attack fell with the greatest force upon Hanson's center, and German Gander on the enemy's side was killed, but the Angolians continued the murderous fighting until the attacking forces though badly defeated overpowered them and then the whole center rolled up, General O-Kel Gander in the rebel side being killed.

The whole of general Hanson's line retired, but not in disorder. General Hankerton's Baldwin's main line of artillery were placed in action and as the forward columns of glandelinians pressed their advantage this line of artillery opened up the moving down down scores of thousands of glandelinians per minute and hundreds of officers, Anderson being among the slain. At the same time the torn and bleeding lines in gray met a veritable tempest of bullets and being moved down like leaves in a terrific hurricane, the rebels moved, and began to retire in confusion and then disorder.

The left grand division of the retreating line was in a serious handicapped condition for the dreadful fire from the entire line of Christian cannon plowed great avenues and lanes in their whole line. It was a fire that they could not stand, simultaneously directing a murderous fire of eleven thousand upon Manley rallied the disordered troops and then moved obliquely to the left to meet the right of the retreating glandelinians, which had fallen back in a panic.

"The whole Christian line is giving way so we must carry the Christian artillery at all hazards," he shouted, "come on and I'll lead." Yet despite his efforts the glandelinian troops along his front was temporarily checked in their sweeping advance, and it was three hours before they would move forward again. It was already night, and Hanson's divisions supported by Baldwin's flashing guns rallied once again and made a stubborn stand, and now the carnage was more frightful still. General Manley having at last rallied the disordered rebel troops to left led them forward to storm Baldwin's batteries in front, while he sent general forces under General Phila to storm its flank. At about nine o'clock about two million, three hundred thousand of Manley's men charged furiously and with irresistible force toward and upon Baldwin's batteries, then on came three million more, and as they came on they met a fire that reduced their lines as fast as they came within range.

A large division of two hundred and twenty five thousand men were reduced to ten thousand, but the batteries were carried, and Baldwin's army was severely wounded, and borne from the field in a critical condition. The flanking party had not accomplished its purpose, but was also struck on the flank, but nevertheless Manley had carried the battery, only to lose it again the next two hours. Along general Germaine's division now there was a general battle in the great battle, but along Hanson's line it still raged with redoubled fury. Fifteen minutes later a large division of Meldonia's infantry regardless of the overwhelming numbers of the enemy's soldiers and cannons, advanced to counter charge with relentless force and dashed directly up to the very muzzles of the cannons.

There was a deafening and murderous roar, followed by a shot which undisturbed flash simultaneously mingled with the wild uproar of millions of glandelinian musketry. In less than that fifteen minutes two hundred and twenty thousand Angolians were lying dead on the ground in piles before the horrible guns, yet the dead and wounded gray coats lay thicker. Generals Meldonia and Maltona Jennings on the glandelinian side were mortally wounded, but just the same the shattered Christian columns were compelled to withdraw, but general Germaine's division promptly came to their support with some of his own force, and the whole swept forward again with the same fury. But again the enemy poured upon the advancing columns a withering tempest of shot and shell and cannon.

The whole line of assault had been reloaded with merciless fury once again, and the whole line had been riddled and was forced to withdraw leaving the ground paved anew with their dead and dying. Despite the tremendous slaughter general Vivian moved forward with his Abyssinians and determined to try his share. This time he ordered his men to move more cautiously and use only the bayonet. In the meantime the line of artillery was attacked furiously on the left by a large portion of Hanson's men, and as Vivian's men also moved forward the carnage became more ghastly. Seven major generals fell in this part of the appalling contest these being Alfred Lotze, Immodest Carl, Chilloh Fillon, Break-In-The-Neck, Break Mine, Gaudise and Walter Berry of rebels who were killed, except Break-In-The-Neck, who was severely wounded about the face and the hands.

As the fearful firing increased with redoubled fury fourteen other rebel generals fell mortally wounded and as fast as the columns got within range they melted away.

But the latter must be carried and a new series of determined attacks were made in which the rebel general Hankerton was shot from his horse as he dashed up in front of a cannon-embankment of the advance was untenable by reason of the strength of the line by Vivian's men and on the left and center of the attack in full force, and they had to floundered and abandon the cannon, but at the height of the attack Vivian's men fell mortally wounded. The Angolians recaptured the guns and during the fiercest fight which raged from nine until two thirty o'clock that night, the left grand division of Manley's center under general Walter Hendon Harrison was rolled up in the greatest confusion and mortal loss, toward Jamieson bridge, and then across the bridge with shattered lines and Hendon and Goo Sen, Gullabanda wounded mortally. After this the firing along this part of the line ceased but it again opened up along the center at three thirty as Manley made a vigorous attack upon his center, and forcing it back with tremendous force. At this moment Love's friends forced came to its assistance and assumed the offensive holding the enemy at bay for a time but sustaining frightful loss.

Manley seeing that his attack on Hanson's center was checked, brought on portions of his whole line hour after hour and made heavier and bloodier assaults on Hanson's whole line, and simultaneously unsuccessful attempts were made to burn general Love's friends left flank. Soon these attacks upon Hanson's line became so persistent, that other large forces of troops were brought up from the rear to its support.

General Love's friend was killed, and Gullabanda Meldonia who succeeded him was wounded, and these two divisions were held back after staggering blows from the enemy charges, the carnage was now more stupendous.

All the rest of the night the struggle raged along Hanson's line and battery after battery was brought into action until the fierce cannon volleys became more murderous and annihilating than sweeping tornadoes. When morning dawned however Manley's line overlapped the right and left of the line under general Bernard and William Janine and made a sudden and sweeping attack and both generals fell mortally wounded but the line still held. The carnage was growing more now. Gander on the side of the glandelinians fell next, but the survivors still pressed on furiously, in human bodies, and threw themselves in heavier columns against Hanson's left grand division, and soon three hundred officers of both sides had fallen riddled by bullets. Yet Manley's line advanced with irrepressible bravery, Hanson's right and central grand divisions receiving the full force of the attack, the rebels striving valiantly to break through the Christian line, but the glandelinians were again moved down by the hundred thousand.

Yet the enemy during this in human assault managed to force the withdrawal of the left grand division, but the rest of the men held their line at all hazards for two hours despite the fierce assaults, and general Phila came on with one million three hundred thousand Winkie Abyssinians, the glandelinians along the left of Hanson's line could make no further progress and had faced a bloody and complete disasterous repulse.

But the army of Manley's was again sent forward and again renewed the fierce attack along the other two wings, and in the terrible fury of battle John Manley received a wound in the foot but retained his command, the front line of his army now ceased in its advance, as their whole line was now battered and bleeding, but they laid down and commenced firing, and this was kept up all along the line until the ground was fairly piled up three feet high with their own dead and wounded.

Manley was bound to carry Hanson's line of works at all hazards but it seemed like suicide to advance his men any further as the heavy purple lines reached of their own losses stood fast to their blood soaked trenches, and a furious and swift dash would only mean annihilation to scores of whole divisions. Fourteen named Glandelinian generals had fallen in the meantime. They were general Francis Donald Hanson, Frank Smoney, Canning Manning, Lawrence Lambert, Brogie Reynolds, Koromun on Scanlon, Edward James, Haughty, Kurter Mahoney, Ben glan Evans, Frank Purgatory, Ab Ambrose Fuller, Andrew Avellio and Andrew Avellio. Hankerton, besides Goo Constellation Montrose. Hundreds of his men per second were being killed despite their lying down, and he decided upon a wild dash, but resolved to bring up more divisions first, about eight thirty they arrived and the assault was made, columns after columns dissolving before the pitiless hurrying hurricanes of bullets and cannon that plowed through their human waves but the survivors pressed on with merciless and tremendous fury, and though time and again they rushed over their sons of dead and wounded comrades they never reached the positions held by the Angolians as they went down in whole lines by the score. Manley's lines were rolled backwards by the impact of the counter charging Christians, and as they met the wildfire of the Angolians' cannon, but despite the dreadful carnage general Manley and his other divisions stood fast and opened an insidious fire. Manley kept up the furious attack with the fresh divisions but the continued Christian fire now only moved down his columns but hundreds of officers as well. General Manley therefore decided to make a general flank attack, and gathered one million, three hundred thousand for the attempt.

These divisions were set on the march under cover while the other attack was continued with redoubled fury on Hanson's front. In the tremendous fury of the firing along his lines General Hanson standing on a high rise of ground happened to see the flankers approaching and therefore started to retreat with a portion of his line but saved his whole line of retreat with wideness upon wideness of dead and dying, while the greater part of his line was retreating for better cover, Hanson took a great force of white Abyssinians and held in ambush for the flankers, he sawy therefore ran into it and the scene was like a general massacre, nine hundred and sixty nine thousand glandelinians lay propped down and literally slain, and various hundred thousand taken prisoner out of that devoted militia three hundred thousand, and the rest fled like sheep.

While this great glandelinian attack was in progress on the other portions of Manley's line of formation made an assault more determined upon general Garrison's divisions, and three million and hundred thousand glandelinians made furious attempts to drive him back but whole divisions by the score met with frightful destruction, whole thousands of regiments were cut to pieces or annihilated, and the panic-stricken divisions were driven back in a panic. The struggle was bloody bloody along the northern and southern portions of the glandelinian column was broken and swept back with dreadful loss. But the main divisions poured in overwhelming numbers and General Joseph's whole brigade was annihilated, and himself riddled by bullets. Yet a large portion of general Garrison's division Angolians under general Waldman's banner and many colonels were forced to draw back from the line of works at which general George Faye and General Johnston's brigades were under general Jennings were hurried up to carry all before them, but met a most terrific tempest of shot and shell which tore every one of their lines to fragments. George Faye was mortally wounded, his column was cut down by the three score by a murderous infanterie, and then Jennings was killed, the whole surviving column being forced to retreat, while general Armstrong's division who had come up with ten brigades to support them met a terrific fire of eighty nine hundred quick firing guns and his line broke in disorderly confusion and retreated in a panic. Armstrong was killed, as by a gang-gangball which also killed two regiments of his own men. General Nicholson's Stone rushed to their assistance and killed the men, but also fell riddled by bullets. But nevertheless the rest of Manley's column came on with the same ferocity and General Sherman's batteries of ninety hundred guns could not be brought up in time to strengthen general Hamilton's troops which offered such a fair mark for artillery, and though these guns did come up in time they could not withstand the answering fire, and General Sherman was mortally wounded. But this did not weaken the forces under general Wilson and they strove with the fury and energy of despair, to check the further and onward rush of the glandelinians, but all along the left the glandelinians began to overrun the whole line, capturing a thousand pieces of artillery, but general Wilson extending strong and massive lines before these glandelinians who had rained their blows, opened a heavier fire which moved down their massive columns by the hundred, and six thousand glandelinian officers of all rank were killed and wounded. But general Indora's divisions of white Abyssinians, through some blunder drew back every one of his lines, and then something happened which threw all the front line of christians into melting fragments like the thaw of some great ice flow in a boiling stream of war.

General Nemo Desmond whose ten divisions were held in reserve, hastened to throw them in front of the heavy masses of glandelinians who were attacking as furiously as they knew how and the struggle again became most fierce and sanguinary and some horrid and nearly vengeance seemed to be thrown upon the glandelinians. Indora was killed and Nemo Desmond was put in his place. The pugnacious attack, was still pressed with greater determination by Manley's whole entire line, and the carriage now increased with still more redoubled fury. General Francis Moplin, and Henryson's Gorgonian were mortally wounded on the side of the glandelinians, and as general Frank Bud also fell mortally wounded these three divisions became demoralized.

Yet they were reinforced, and rallied the struggle again increased in higher fury becoming more fearful, the glandelinians keeping up the attack, tenaciously, and now general Floyd's Dugars whole divisions move moving forward to join become exposed too much. His divisions swept a whole line of trenches nevertheless but his men did not fill the gap and encountered an annihilating fire which cut down one whole division and drove the rest back. General Paul Maroon's arrived to Floyd's assistance and moved forward his divisions under a heavy withering fire from a thousand pieces of artillery which swept all their approaches, and killed Floyd and Stone. These two attacking forces were badly broken, and cut up and driven back in disorder with heavier loss before they came within full range of the Angolian infantry fire.

But all these bloody disasters did not daunt general Manley. His whole line was exposed to a still deadlier fire but all his summer divisions kept up their heavy and bloody attack with till the persistence of great storm waves against a rocky shore or breakwater, and in the dreadful carriage general Hopper Hope, and Calvin Shoenann, and Shu Shawhill Jensen's fell mortally wounded. General Olingu's Angolians and white Abyssinians after pouring in a destructive fire at point blank for two hours were compelled to draw back, then general Willie Woodruff on the christian side fell mortally wounded, when demoralized, Woodruff left and center was turned during the bloody engagement and also gave way, having suffered heavier losses. In fact the christians seemed to gain no advantage whatever as the enemy were continually pressing on with incredible violence. But Manley's divisions along this portion form fortunately however did not advance very far, the stronger line of battle, poured in a deadlier and more galling fire as the enemy columns in great numbers on more furiously, and now they met with more serious resistance than ever on Aronburg Jensen's front brought his red coated Abyssinians and opposed them, and now the whole christian line again appeared in a blaze of fire inconceivable to soldiers, while the storm of masonry was like a thrilling raindrops on a tin covered roof. General Aronburg also brought up one thousand, ninety six guns which played with the most cruel and destructive effect upon the gray lines, some twenty hundreds of enemies and losses in their own ranks of men and animals.

Also the fire along the christian line became so tremendous, and fierce, that their very words seem about to blow to pieces, and it was incessant for hours. General George Wilson repulsed the most tremendous firing of his own line ever seen in the war, from a hill which was exposed at intervals the glandelinian explosive shells, and to a storm of shot and shell, grape and canister, and saw plainly that even all the terrible havoc among the gray line was not going to stop the charge, such dreadful carnage he did not wish his father the Virgin and Princess to see, or even hear of, and would have had them taken from the scene of battle had they been there.

It seemed like another Jemima Wilson, or gunboat Greek shore than three million and hundred thousand glandelinians lay in front of even their own works, and all along the christian line of works only a mile in extent, while the countless numbers of fallen all along the whole battle line seemed like a slaughter of the whole nation, hundreds of thousands being killed and wounded even out on the plains, and hundreds of their general officers. The fire was merciless and general Wilson fearing his men would exhaust their ammunition sent for a supply for the rest of the army.

Five thousand Angolian artillery was hand loaded incessantly and many times general Wilson had almost exhausted himself in the attempt to strengthen his own lines, and sent officers and gunners out the like to direct the most destructive fire of his own guns, and to sweep not only the front of Manley's column but its flank as well, and also those of the supporting troops, but still the attack was kept up.

Major general Ben Ros Sanghina Gola was severely wounded, but his divisions had crossed the christian trenches and remained in the action nation, and no numbers whatever could drive him back. On general Wilson's right where the strongest firing line extended toward Jemima's bridge it was broken at a point by the steady glandelinian attack but it was at once restored by reinforcements and with heavy loss to general Meldonia Damer Dale whose forces of Munghabon was attacking there, and who was wounded in and his horse killed. But yet the grand and furious attack of the glandelinians was kept up and as soon as other divisions joined the bloody action which had been raging along the first two main wings, now again extended along the entire christian line and now the desperate and bloody struggle became a merciless mass of the most horrible description. Damer's divisions soon met with a repulse but the rest of the main line continued the struggle along the center. Hanson had rallied his own forces but now the advance of General Shoenann's divisions and Phantasm glandelinians were more relentless and simply tremendous and millions after making one assault after another leaped the breastworks the whole length after a most fierce hand to hand fight, but as they possessed themselves of the trenches, they met a galling fire from the red coating line, and this was added by a withering tempest of grape shot and shells from the works which still held and which mowed the Boondlers down as fast as letters are seen in a book on one hundred pages at once. General glandelin of the Boondlers was wounded, and his assistant Damer Hunter killed, his two divisions being cut up, and glandelinians annihilated. Now the fury of the struggle was becoming something terrible. In the meantime general Hemis Curran having rallied his own Angolians and some others placed them behind a long rail fence and behind a stone wall beyond, and now Shoenann's whole army of Munghabon met with such serious resistance that his advance was again checked.

Kidding, Jensen, Tension, and Gorgon Henryton all brothers were severely wounded on the glandelinian side as their gray columns in charging upon Hanson's line had been shattered, but Shoenann's columns had been springing upon him with greater impetuosity. Fury but gaps were again torn. But Shoenann had been reinforced and he continued to make his most desperate and titanic efforts and even his own lighter artillery were pushed forward, and getting these into position he opened a murderous fire upon the christian lines. General Curran's forces before the concentrated attack of the gray Boondler columns soon recoiled, and as the enemy poured in their return fire with their masonry and cannon their retirement was hastened, and Curran was borne from the field mortally wounded. Five thousand of his largest regiments had been slain, two hundred others crushed, ten divisions annihilated, but his few survivors were not in panic, and as the glandelinians pressed on and cleared another line of breastworks with the bayonet, they reached an open wood, where they suddenly and unexpectedly met a murderous fire so sharp, that as it swept through their most massive line it shattered it completely, and mingled hundreds of columns.

As they strove to continue on this curtain of rifle fire became so keen, that their whistling was shattered more and more, and soon the entire line, with the shells roaring and shrieking about them, and with the mines booming in the furious concert like the hurricane through the rigging of a ship, and the sharp and sinister-looking out victims by the thousands seemingly every second, began to recoil before the front of that deadly wood, leaving the ground paved with their dead and wounded, and the horrible sights of the "o man's land" in this war of the Al lies have nothing on this terrible scene, of the wild and bloody massacre of troops of both sides at the battle of Jennie's Bridge.

One million one hundred thousand had fallen before that fat open woods, and now a large force of Abyssinians, and Angolians under general Con Cornson Hubbard picknell appeared through the thick wreaths of smoke but suddenly met on all sides a fire from the recoiling Glandelinians that mowed down five hundred thousand of the Abyssinians in half an hour, but the fire of the Angolians being returned to cover the Abyssinians brought down six hundred ranks of one thousand men each, with the summary of an execution, and general Cornson's division of Crowleywood was crushed to fragments and he himself killed in trying to rally his men and have them dare face that seething inferno of the open woods.

"We must hold our works here at all costs," said Hanson as the fury of the battle slackened somewhat. "If for if Hanley sends heavier reinforcements to Shosvum aid, he will be able to sweep the works and our back our entire line, and a total defeat will follow. We have already been forced back thirty miles from our first line of works. Hold your ground against Shosvum's general attack at all costs. I'll shoot the first man or general who turns his back on me in this crisis."

It was now again one o'clock and the battle was still in full swing along the center. It now became a struggle beyond anything known in fury, and was something most inconceivably terrific and violent. Shosvum was advancing all his troops to make the final attack of the day, and now the struggle became part of a thousand.

My thousands of the christian regiments and the divisions recoiled against the works, made up of bodies only, while the rest of the line slightly recoiled itself and recoiled in front. In the meantime general Shosvum aided by general grand-In-The-Hands terrible artillery fire of the most intense intensity, and while which was a drum drum fire, began to push forward all his largest divisions and now he was determined at all hazards to carry the Angolians over and drive back the christians still further.

The Glandelinians continued to press on and they seemed to rush on in a sea of blood and fire. Angolians stood to their positions and the fiercest yell ever heard from a battlefield, and large numbers of brigades came to their support, and then ran over the Angolians retreating all their efforts. The weather was stormy and windy and though the smoke had been intensely thickened by the fierce driving it was now not so intensified and the line of the Angolians was too horrible to describe to explain. Not a soldier missed his mark and the Glandelinians were less and lessening in number.

The Glandelinians hoping to be able to move forward under cover of the smoke were foiled on account of the wind, but one section of the Turnerian surge supported by the Shosvumians and Gargovians raised such bloody curdling yells as to probably drive the very devils to fear and confusion and so in no more voices, that the fiendish yells of the rebels seemed to split the earth. Again it was the old time "Devil Yell" over again. Keeping up that frightful tumult of yells they swept most gallantly and most furiously up to the christian works in perfect wave and up to the muzzles of the christian guns which now roared above the din of a volcanic eruptive eruption, and occupied in no time the whole line of works, and now the struggle was most fearful and bloody all along the line at close quarters. Along the christian line near Marocco's and Jennie's Bridge the Glandelinian wave of assault of the most tremendous length reached the breastworks and swarmed over. For several hours now the whole gray line had the advantage of all the christian positions, but as both sides seemed to open fire at once they looked like a long writhing snake spitting fire and smoke from its body. For a minute or so the men of both sides all along the line went down by the hundred thousand before pistol shots, bayonet thrusts and other blazes of gun fire. Nearly all of the christian artillery here a mile to the rear were shot down by the random shots of the terrible Glandelinian storm of fire, and the gallant generals Corneille, Ivan and his Uncle Hanson were not even in sight, and all their staff seemed to have been destroyed, killed or wounded and all their horses torn to pieces by bullets.

The open ground in the rear of the christian works was completely choked by the victorious troops and at this most critical moment a large section of batteries under general Wallace pickens was quickly run up by hand close to the captured works and increased the frightful infernal storm of slaughter at a short range by opening upon the enemy with murderous broadsides of double charges of canister and a perfect hail of minutes and shrapnel. The enemy was completely staggered by this search in searching fire and as more galling guns were brought up and fired again and again, hordes of fierce Winkies, and Concothians and Calverinians and also Dondolians and Tripl Tripolings came up to the scene and pushed upon the enemy and at once there was a conglomeration of men in a fierce mixup and the Glandelinians were pressed back off from the works by this terrible tide of men.

Thousands of the Angolians drivers and cannoniers fallen in this writhing ball of battling legions, but others quickly took their places and the firing and confusion was now at white heat. Hanley's whole line was almost devastated by this deadly affray, but the survivors stuck to the other portions of the captured works like millions of locusts being determined to keep the Angolians from retaking their position. In ten minutes four hundred pieces of artillery under general Illinois were placed with their muzzles projecting over the works and they pitted like the mouths of dragons at the enemy. Thousands of the poor christians began far to the rear of the battle line had been reached by exploding grape shot, and hundreds were cut wide open with all their intentions exposed. Many others, including countless numbers of men on both sides were frightfully torn to pieces and made a similar scene to that of the child butchery only a few days ago which violet and her sisters had seen through and witnessed against their will, and which cornson's whole had committed. The scuttler as it had swept among the crowded Glandelinian troops at the works, had fairly scattered flesh and blood like butter all about. So a seventy twelve pounder and four hundred more machine guns were brought up and these also opened with the rest of the guns, which fairly shattered grand-In-The-Hands whole line to mere nothing, and brought him down severely wounded. A whole brigade under general Cornson went into the fierce action and soon more divisions came up bringing still more artillery, and hurrying away with all their might. Then divisions divisions and two infantry brigades under general Nicholas Janoff had arrived, and went deep into the bloody action, which increased along all portions of the battlefield with the most terrible fury. The deafening roar of fire arms and cannon was now more terrible, but along general Lyons central division the roar of artillery seemed to read the language.

Shosvum's largest column was riddled, and the rebel losses became more and more frightful every minute. Many of the first, and second divisions now took part, and evidently Shosvum's whole line was now crowded in many parts. Thirty men deep by reinforcements, and soon on account of the rapid fire that was maintained on their whole line general Mahorton's Korvum's Glandelinians began to recoil. Several more Glandelinian brigades were badly riddled, Major general Henry Follen was killed, and general Charles Johnston and James Litchman who succeeded him were shot dead amid the dreadful carnage and a moment later general Mahorton who continued a continually excited the admiration of his column fell riddled by bullets in his attempts to rally one of his demoralized divisions.

What remained of the many divisions who had made the fierce onset under the hot galling fire and concentrated, at this point despite the deadliest fire of general Wallace's batteries had been all shot down or fled, and Shosvum's whole center was sent entirely out to pieces, and the countless numbers of regimental flags were shredded rags than anything else. General Corneille and Wallace on the christian side, being wounded, generals Homer and Clarke took their places, and rallied Desmonds divisions.

The firing along general Claude McNaire's line was too horrible to witness, and he himself fell mortally wounded, Wallace's division taking his place only to be shot dead a minute later. So heavy and continuous was the almost preternatural firing, along both the opposing lines that whole fences and all the trees of the whole battlefield were so badly cut and torn that they literally crumbled to the ground by the thousands. A thousand big oak trees which grew in the rear of general Lyons' line, was so completely knocked off by the heavy converging fire of both sides that they fell among the christians with a deafening crash, killing hundreds and wounding thousands.

The trenches for full their length fairly ran with rivers of blood, and though already cleared of the dead and wounded bodies of both sides twenty it times were to be only again covered with them. Hanson's whole line suffered terribly from the misery fire along the whole gray line, but more terrible and destructive was the destruction among the enemy's line.

Shosvum's left grand division, torn, tottered, and bleeding (feeding) gradually gave way, and fell back to rear an arrangement its shattered lines. Hundreds of thousands upon hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians, dead and wounded, lay piled over one another in long windrows, and hundreds of thousands of the dead of both sides lay ten or seven deep, and they looked as if they had passed through a number of butcher shops. Many of the dead officers were shot in or about the head, riddled by it the bullets or dismembered by the explosions of the shells. A hundred thousand broken firearms lay scattered everywhere, seven hundred accountants lay strewn about for miles, and thousands of boxes of ammunition were blown up by the concussion of the bullets as they struck them. Countless numbers of the cannon shot, shell fragments of leaves lay everywhere, and broken foliage and thousands of shattered trees made a sight too horrible to describe.

More christian batteries were now dragged up and opened upon the enemy and the whole christian line was again ablaze, the whole battle field becoming like the forest in a conflagration. Shosvum's line under a rattling fire of thousands of shrapnell was already reformed and he himself managed to drag up another battery of galling guns, and opened fire with these but made no attempt for further advance, as it was like suicide in doing so.

General Hanna was mortally wounded, his divisions were shattered to fragments by a rattling fire of shrapnell and storms of canister shot. Manley's main column moved further up in longlines while general Vivian arranged ten of his active batteries near Jennie's bridge to keep the columns of glandelinians from overtopping his right, grand division and attacking his unprotected flank. Stanley swung his own division around to flank general Vivian's right or left grand division but he fell mortally wounded, and his men encountered an annihilating fire, and drew back. Vivian's upon it is one of Abbe's divisions and Angelinians adjusted themselves for the deadliest portion of the conflict and soon general Vivian's line was having the most frightful struggle of the battle, which continued steadily, the fighting of the third day now being at its highest fury.

Other divisions now came to the help of general Manley, the attacking forces striking the christians more furiously and with the utmost steadiness, repulsing columns that came for ward to meet them and captured and secured a portion of the works. Every christian battery, and column did the work well, and did even great and most stupendous wonders but it had not been for the prompt arrival of some more of General Hubbard's picked men, general Vivian's whole line would have been rolled rolled up and destroyed.

But general Picknell brought up his whole division of five million men as quickly as he could march or run, and general Vivian's line was succeeded before he was forced to yield his ground, and general Manley saw the arrival of reinforcements as his men advanced to within three hundred yards of the christian line, and before he could order a withdrawal there was a blinding sheet of flame, along the whole line of reinforcements followed by a deafening ear splitting uproar, and again in the countless dead and wounded glandelinians lay piled up before the christian works. This tremendous volley was poured at point blank, and Manley's shattered lines, becoming panic stricken and demoralized and retired from the work they had captured in disorder, and Manley being charged at the defiant yell of the Angelinians cursed and swore like a demon.

At that moment Manley received two balls, but as the wounds were not serious he continued to swear at the christians like a mad dog howl. His divisions were soon heavily reinforced, and picknell's big brigades were forced therefore to recoil, and the glandelinians again seized some works, and after a bloody and continued hand to hand fight general Vivian's right grand division was driven from the trenches, but Manley's line met with such a steady and continuous fire of musketry and cannon from the stronger portions of the christian line, that many of his columns were again badly shattered, but seeing that the left grand division had at least last been driven back, after a long titanic struggle in which both sides charged back and forth from time to time, the gray line retained the position and repulsed the first charge of the Angelinians, and driving them back to the works they had just left but could progress no further.

General Frankie Mc-Cabe's Angelinians making interposition now opened a new and more terrible fire with their own heavier cannons on general Manley's whole line, pouring a stream of shell into all of his showy columns and wiping one of general

Jenton Davine's regiments. General Peevish's George's glandelinians division was almost annihilated, and he and Davine were killed as they strove to get their men to carry general Patrick's cannons line. Along the center of the christian line general Shoeman's men were still standing fast, especially where they had withdrawn, and Hanson's men were now rushing forward to follow up their advance but they met a continuous and galling fire along the whole gray line the glandelinians being behind log barricades, and to take this position under such an awful fire was surely utterly impossible, and so again the whole of general Hanson's line was crushed to fragments and met a most bloody repulse, and he himself was stunned by the wind of a cannon ball and was borne to it the rear.

Shoeman's losses from the christian batteries in his own front, and from the withering fire of musketry that raked his whole line like a fine comb does hair, was most frightful. And the fire along the rest of Hanson's line which yet did not counter charge was still more terrific, but Shoeman's men seeing that the fire along the christian line was receding began to advance, but slowly. Thousands of the foolish glandelinians were continued to fall by the minute, and as Shoeman's men halted before the heavy fire he rallied them saying:

"Forward boys. They are falling back and we must keep them going."

As Shoeman's men pressed on vigorously, Bernard P. lay with the assistant of lieutenant general Peter, Edwin Brady tried to rally the christian columns, but both generals fell severely wounded.

Along the christian left the struggle was at its whitest fury. The glandelinians along this point over a million four hundred thousand five hundred strong, advanced in the face of a most deadly destructive fire from two sides, and reinforced they surged on with great noise and fury and George P. O'Leary's glandelinians advanced successfully, and with frightful fury, and so the left grand division of the main center was the first assailed and still more terrible was the carnage. The three million two hundred thousand Angelinians along this point under general Bengia in Julian fired with most the utmost steadiness and with all their fire arms and artillery, tearing the enemy line with an ing fury, and soon stopped and badly repulsed the attack along this part of the line with their incessant fire, but whole divisions of the glandelinians went far south of them despite the destructive fire of general Vivian's batteries. General Thomas J. P. M. Davine saw them coming, and he sent four divisions which had been held in reserve upon these advancing glandelinian columns and dragging up three hundred and forty galling guns poured in a hurricane of grape and canister, producing the most horrible a range and destruction, and the hostile columns under the most frightful artillery fire broke back in confusion.

In quick succession general Hanson's columns, Cannon's go's, and Bernard Cannon of kindred's center and right received the oncoming tidal wave of rebel troops and these columns of glandelinians also being torn to fragments the rebels gradually gave way, and the christians charged down upon the retreating army so furiously that the gray lines exposed fully to all of the christian batteries were still more demoralized and suffering fearful losses, with many of their officers killed and wounded, the gray columns withdrew and fell back to their own strongest positions.

Manley also began again to withdraw his men, and now again the infernal scene of horror was exposed to view, and it seemed as if general Manley had taken place. Dead horses by the score of hundreds lay strewn everywhere, and baggage and provisions were wrecked and half burned, lay scattered. Even all forest fires were burning, probably set on fire by the storm of infernal shrapnell shells and red hot canister.

Every lane was choked with the mangled dead and the banks of the Jennie's creek, for miles was paved with the dead and wounded of both sides. During the night when the sudden darkness had come to stop the christian counter advance the enemy opened fire with many of their interior of big guns and cannons and now the very heavens were shaken by the most tremendous cannon fire ever heard and all the flashes on both sides looked like countless drops of blood. The air was opening and closing with each booming roar.

For an hour this tremendous cannonading raged both sides bringing nearly thirty thousand cannon into the action and pouring fearful volleys of shot and shell at each other, while again and again the surging forces of both sides rushed upon each other with uproar was like thousands of volcanoes in eruption, and the very sky was dotted with the stars of bursting shells which made flashes like lightning as they burst in rapid succession.

By midnight the tremendous cannon fire began to slacken and finally ceased, and the next morning while many assaults had been going on Manley was filled with the utmost desperation to make another determined attack on general Vivian's center.

But when he did so he again met a strong resistance and his first advanced columns were shaken badly in places, and shattered and broken at many points. But around he brought his whole division on to the attack, and in the frightful carnage ten more of his staff fell being generals Goeman, Picknell, Concernia, Hoemannia, H. H. H. H. Harry, Frank Stanley, August Brake, Gust Johnson, Hardraffe and Miller. All except Hardraffe were killed. Heavy losses were sustained on both sides and the loud angry rattle and roar of musketry and cannon was impossible to describe. General Vivian's whole line repulsed the assault with titan fury and violence, while the glandelinians tried with all their courage to carry the line, and even brought up more of their own artillery. Manley however charged to organize a severely the attacking cavalry force that swept away the left grand division of general Vivian's line by a furious charge in double line, but were not standing by the strong interior of the christian line and repulsed with bloodshed.

But in the impulse five hundred thousand Mangaboo glandelinians passed beyond gladders extreme right and a center and his exposed flank was swept by a terrible rain of bullets. Four hundred thousand repeating rifles cut down whole lines and also a large division of glandelinians under general Piney attacked a gladder's whole flank, and carried his line but with terrible losses. General Vivian's center was driven back next but the enemy ran into a perfect inflame of christian artillery, but the gray columns despite the terrific slaughter pressed upon the recoiling christian lines and with such fury that generals Marten and Thomas Jennings had to come to their aid, and with these combined forces against them, and facing another inflame of one thousand cannon the glandelinian center recoiled with the loss of fourteen regiment regiments and five divisions.

CHAPTER FOUR.
THE LAST DAY OF THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE! AND THE RESULT.
THE ADVENTURE OF GENERAL JACK EVANS!
E. EVANS.

AMID the dreadful carnage the left grand division rallied, and soon during the heavy firing their own assailants recoiled. The center and right grand division of Manley's columns were pressed back for a mile but the Christian line met a terrible fire from Manley's batteries and were pressed back the themselves for the same distance, with the loss of a score of regiments. The Angelinians along the center repelled the foe with murderous fury and Shoemans left grand division numbering five hundred thousand were reduced to eighty thousand.

But it managed to drive back the right grand division with more terrific loss. The carnage indeed was terrible and meeting his whole left against the Christian right grand division he was unable in this charge to control his reckless men who being refreshed steadily overthrew the right, and carried all before him. Shoemans managed to rally the left or right grand division of his own troops and again pressed on with merciless fury, when the Christian center received more reinforcements and increased the terrible carnage by making every effort to check the advancing gray columns and Shoemans horse was killed under him, as ten regiments of his men fell simultaneously, he also receiving a ball in the left hand. Serious as his wound was Shoemans did not let on, but kept his command and attended to his wound himself. Therefore Shoemans columns continued to press on, and again and again the Glandelinian dead were laid out in windrows and Shoemans columns knowing that the Christian right was overwhelmed and carried, were utterly reckless in their desire to carry the whole line, and kept on with terrible fury despite the awful gaps torn in their lines and surged over and above the works though again and again the Christian lines blazed with fire, the surviving riddled columns wavered before that galling fire and ten fell back, the tops of the works and the interior fairly shocked with multitudes of their dead and wounded comrades, the slaughter being more dreadful than ever, the Angelinians repouring over the works and toward the Glandelinians with a horrid burst of yell. Three whole lines of Shoemans men had been cut down, two main divisions had been decimated, and recoiled swiftly despite Shoemans desperate attempt to rally them. Along the Christian left the assailant's met the same fire worse than they had faced the day before as they rushed on and the effects was terrible on the gray columns. Thousands of ranks were mowed down as they moved in millions against the Christian line, but they did not falter and tried their best to drive back the red and purplines, but three hundred and twenty thousand fell seemingly every minute again, and the survivors were forced to recoil on account of such losses, and the Angelinians recovering from the shock of the onset made a tremendous charge themselves, sweeping forward with irresistible fury but after a bloody collision, the Angelinians and Abyssinians drew back, but captured many thousands of prisoners. All of the Christian cannon were now in constant action being turned anew on Shoemans columns and the horrible cannon fire tore gaps in their gray waves, but no further counter charges were attempted on Shoemans divisions, as Shoemans army had been fully reinforced by Manley, and were advancing again upon the Christian lines.

Manley's whole line having been repulsed with the almost complete annihilation of one thousand regiments withdrew his columns under a shower of grape and canister, which rained an thick and fast among his lines, but he drew up fresh men from his reserves and brought up more and the last of his artillery, but then despite the fearful cannonade the Angelinians maintained their efforts and general Vivian led three million three hundred thousand men to storm the battery.

On rushed the Angelinians and though whole divisions melted away like snow before the terrific fire of grape and canister the survivors charged up to the very muzzle of the guns and drove the foe back at the point of the bayonet, and swinging the guns round opened fire upon the columns of rebel infantry tearing their shattered lines into flying fragments, and spewing Manley's whole line through and through. The carnage was now more terrible than ever and two million two hundred thousand Glandelinians made the most desperate efforts to recapture the cannon, but all of them that came within range were mowed down in such a way that many whole divisions were reduced to a few ranks. But Manley's whole column was in full force and many more divisions swept forward to retake the cannons but the fire of the artillery became so terrific that each division as they came within range were soon reduced to a few men. And again the assailants had to withdraw leaving piles upon piles of dead and wounded in front and among the artillery.

Manley was bound to retake the guns at all costs, but as he led three million three hundred thousand more men to the charge he moved them forward more cautiously but they were again repulsed, Manley having a narrow escape from being shot down, under the galling fire, which made very large gaps in his lines.

Manley was puzzled. He did not know what to do. A number of times he had tried with the greatest energy to retake the cannon but on each time his men badly withered columns met fearful annihilating fire and were only driven back in a demoralized and frightfully confused condition. Yet were larger columns of troops arrived, during this section of the frightful carnage, and their officers rallied the divisions that were shattered and confused, and despite the increasing carnage general Manley now made a most furious effort to recapture the batteries, and down went scores of columns, and five hundred thousand men were simultaneously killed. Yet despite this tremendous slaughter and the deaths of so many generals the Glandelinians continued to press on, but again the Angelinians poured in that awful fire, mowing down hundreds of thousands in a few minutes, and Manley like Shoemans was unhorsed, and received a minie ball in the left shoulder. He was seriously wounded, but he retained his command, and seeing that his men were in danger of being repulsed he reformed his columns and continued to lead the furious charge, and in the most stupendous carnage general Gelya fell mortally wounded, and his smothering Glandelinians were driven back. But the rest of Manley's whole column, continued to surge on, and the whole field, before the battery was alive with gray coats who charged clear up to the front of the works, but were again driven back a considerable distance, with a terrible decimation of their columns. Three hours more of the bloody fighting for the possession of the battery followed, and again Manley made another charge, despite the his crowded losses, and despite the fury of the Christian masonry fire, Manley massed all his men together and swept upon general Vivian's line again, but was met by a most galling searching fire that mowed the gray coats down so fast that they appeared like grass cut by a scythe.

But amidst this dreadful carnage they pressed on. In the meantime general Calmann Shoemans brought up his whole force and also he and his officers reformed the shattered and broken lines of the other divisions, and again rushed forward. On pressed Shoemans lines in full force. One immense column was badly shattered by the terrific fire along the Christian line but Shoemans main line came on at a furious charge, but the Angelinians having reloaded all their firearms opened a thousand volleys at once and more fearful still was the losses in Shoemans lines.

At million shots per minute had been opened upon his troops, and hundreds after hundreds of thousands fell mangled torn and bleeding or riddled by bullets. The Christian line held its ground, and this stubborn conflict lasted for four hours, and yet the whole Christian line was hard pressed, and the enemy managed to take a double line of trenches. But the other Christian batteries which had been withdrawn during the recoil had now been put into new positions and also the advancing rebel columns came upon an abatis of logs manned by six thousand small galling guns which were trained upon them. Along the left the Christian cannon were in action again and the very ground was shaken by the tremendous artillery fire. Defending was the uproar again and by noon the fury of the battle had increased tremendously. The battle was now raging along the whole line and Shoemans columns made a simultaneous attack, on the whole Christian center where a heavier struggle ensued. Meeting the fearful artillery fire the gray columns advanced cautiously but still the Angelinians held their ground more stubbornly. On pressed the Glandelinians advancing in heavy masses.

And with awful and impetuosity they rushed against the Christian lines. Shoemans losses became more tremendous and never before had he observed such slaughter of his men. The air was clouded with the smoke of the powder, and the fire along the Christian center seemed to become intolerable but still on pressed Shoemans men and with terrific yells. In the meantime Manley's men having recovered from the shock they received during their own onsets gathered up their strength for a fiercer effort, than ever made before, to recapture the battery they had lost, and now again they came rushing forward with the most tremendous fury. The cannons allowed the advancing Glandelinian columns to come within easy range and when they were within three rods of the seemingly silent cannon, the artillery men suddenly opened fire while every infantry man poured upon the shattered gray columns a murderous volley and the surviving Glandelinian columns with their dead and wounded piled in windrows where they had fallen became panic-stricken, but as the others drew back they fought their pursuers with such stubborn fury and with such courage that they bore down everything that rushed upon them. The whole line of battle was red with gore and thickly covered with the bodies of the wounded or dead of both sides, but near the cannon in the hands of the Angelinians the gray coats lay in one ridge of fallen, while the trenches of the infantry were filled to overflowing with their own dead and dying.

The woods in which Manley's charging columns had passed through in the assault upon the battery looked as if a typhoon had struck it, for all the trees were badly torn and shattered, or splintered by hundreds of broadsides of grape and shells, and every tree near the infantry line was almost cut up to the appearance of history books. Shoemans and Manley were not daunted at though the whole Christian line seemed swept by wavering sheets of flame and rolling clouds, the Glandelinian columns quickly reformed and arranged in a line of battle ten miles long and this time twenty deep. Shoeman's front was about five miles in extent, and they swiftly emerged from the hazy smitten woods and rushed steadily and swiftly toward the Christian lines stationed behind the captured cannon. As the gray lines pressed on, not only the captured guns but all the Christian artillery opened as well and down went the gray columns seemingly at every moment. The destruction among Shoeman's line was something beyond beyond even conceiving, for scores of thousands of solid shot, hundreds of thousands of shells, and showers of chain shot, grape and canister tore clear through Manley's line and also fell with frightful effect among Manley's body guard. Every volley cut up scores of thousands of poor men, and hundreds of thousands of soldiers of the every sort of Glandelinians, and committed havoc beyond description. Along the center all the Christian batteries that could be brought to bear went into action, and the center of the Christian line was again ablaze, and the din became frightful. But as all the Christian batteries incurred the fire of the guns still in possession of the rebels the roar of artillery increased with redoubled din, and the very lines of both sides were riven by the hundreds of thousands of ear-splitting explosions.

On pressed the Glandelinian columns amid the frightful carnage, and as all the Angolinian artillery hushed away it seemed as if the rebel waves would be blown into the air. The Angolinian artillery fire even increased as more guns were brought into action, but though whole columns more of the Glandelinians melted away, the Glandelinian advance was not checked. The survivors came on, on and on pressed all of Manley's divisions and fierce grew the cannon fire. Hendon, Jenson, and Buster Keether were killed but the Glandelinians still advancing in thickly massed columns struck the telling blow a few minutes later. Despite the severe severity of this horrible Glandelinian Christian artillery fire, the Glandelinians still moved on, and as the whole host of attack came upon the left and center first all the Angolinians opened with every kind of firearm, the Glandelinian columns wavered and recoiled and started retreating but encountered the artillery fire of general George Davines battery.

The main body however pressed on with terrific fury and struck the other wing but the Abyssinkilians and Angolinians opened a general fire also. Yet these Glandelinians continued to advance and the battle became general all along the line. All the Christian batteries were pushed up and all at once a most more galling fire fell upon the decimated columns of Shoeman's army, and his men became terror stricken and broke into utter confusion. Shoeman was badly wounded three times, but he strove to retain his command, and made an effort to rally his men. Shoeman however was supported, and his divisions rallying rushed on and came in front of the captured battery, and to the defenders after keeping up a galling fire for fifteen minutes which tore hundreds of avenues in the gray lines, yielded and fell back to the rear, and the battery was retaken, the battle in inflamed Glandelinians pushing themselves over the works. Shoeman and his surviving officers had quickly rallied the columns who had been retreating, and reforming them, pushed on to follow the others, and as his men also swarmed over it seemed as if victory was already assured. The Glandelinians among the guns they had recaptured, and seemed to open seventy volleys per minute upon the retreating Christian lines but soon on one side of the works the dead and wounded Glandelinians lay three deep. Yet they held to the works despite the awful fire along the whole Christian line, and soon the struggle was at its most extreme fury. All long the line the Christians began to give way. Before it had been a most desperate hand to hand fight each man of the opposite sides being face to face and fighting like as many mad dragons. General Gervin's uniform was actually burned by a exploding grape shot. General Gervin was now left entirely alone with his forces for the divisions under the other officers which had been ordered to cover his flank had been driven from the field with the loss of six million men and sixty thousand prisoners. General Johnston Brown, whose duty it was to advance to Hanson's assistance had failed as it was said on account of general Logannias attack upon his forces whose right and left had been badly cut up. Yet it was believed he had double crossed Hanson the whole Christian line as the rebels pressed on was retiring in disorder, having suffered stupendous losses as well as the enemy. The total losses of the Glandelinians was not given, though in this story 12,493,223 had been known to be slain. The Christian loss in dead was probable 10,423,288. The losses of both sides in captured combined was fourteen millions. Still at some parts it was raging with unmitigated fury.

At the time when this battle was at its highest fury and when the whole Christian line was one whole undulating sheet of flame and ghastly slaughter, and while all their cannons were pouring shot, shell, and grape and canister like a storming hurricane of destruction, the divisions under general Hollington was singled out by the enemy for a fierce struggle as they charged, and as they had charged the national colors, the captain commanded the ninety ninth regiment of volunteers, to rush forward at the head of his men and make a jump for general Jack Evans and his division division who was also on the lookout for general Gervin's signal corps, and the man did so surrounding Evans army and calling out to him to surrender, or be massacred with his whole command to which Evans replied by note!!!

"Gorry but the Christians especially like I am do not know what surrender means." A rebel captain then rushed him during the heat of the conflict, but Evans seizing the rebel officer by the coat with his left hand, he flung him violently to the ground by tripping him up, and wrenched his sword from his grasp. Then Evans was seized from behind by an ambulance surgeon sergeant of the Glandelinian tree. Goodbye but Evans by a simple violent toss of his arm sent the rebel flying over the very branch of a tree, and as another rebel grabbed him he managed to put his knee into the middle of his back and flung him on the ground, but Evans quickly sprang to his feet and putting both sabres, his own and the rebel captain's into his left hand, he knocked the other rebel officer a blow that sent him flying into a small creek twenty yards away. Jack Evans then sprang forward, some six feet, and grasped with his right hand the flag staff of the Glandelinian regimental battle flag, which the color bear sergeant was holding and said to the color bearer:

"Give me that flag you skunk!" at the same time pulling the flag away from the sergeant, he then tore the flag from the flag staff, and flung the staff over the parapet putting the flag inside the breast of his waist. He then went to four Glandelinian privates who were advancing a few feet off, and commanded them to give up their muskets. Fearing him strong arms they obeyed. Taking the muskets he gave them to some of the Angolinians to carry off, and taking the equipments of the four privates he flung them into a puddle forty yards away, then going to the stunned Glandelinian captain he pulled him off the ground as if he was a piece of paper, and putting him together with the ambulance sergeant, and the four privates under a charge of several Abyssinkilian soldiers, sent them to a distant hill to be placed in custody under the provost guard.

Thus in the short space of five minutes during the height of the battle, general Jack Evans disarmed one captain, one ambulance sergeant, and four privates of the enemy, besides taking their color sergeant with his colors, and sending the whole of the whole of them seven in number under guard to the rear. For several hours during the meanwhile both sides had been still fighting, and Jack Evans subjected to a heavy fire from a battery captured by the Glandelinians went to join his regiments but as the enemy had attacked them, they were in confusion. General Jack Evans saw the Christians giving way at all points, as regular broadsides of the captured guns rang out and roared, pouring as it seemed a regular fire of hell, and he became alarmed. The tempest of shot and shell crumpled up the line like snow while on with increasing speed the enemy pressed. The enemy did not seem to heed the fire they met but straight on the rebels bore, riving columns and wavering lines they rose tore. Jack Evans knew it was impossible to rally the great retreat, as the enemy was pressing upon the Angolinians everywhere, their advancing cannons sending through them broadsides with who's shout and mere a scream, but he decided to learn where general Gervin was heading for, so that he could alarm general Williamberger Zimmerman or Constantin Aronburg as his right name was, who was at this time concentrating upon general Cannon as Cannon's great host of Glandelinians not far from Vivian's key near Virginia gun.

The deafening uproar of so many scattering shots seemed to come from everywhere, as the enemy pressed on driving all the Christian soldiers from their breastworks, and capturing many or nearly all the artillery abandoned in the hasty flight, but Jack Evans was not afraid of the distant inflame fire from the right and left.

CHAPTER FIVE..

THE EXPERIENCE OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS,
DURING THE ROUT OF THE CHRISTIAN ARMY, AND HOW THEY WERE
RETAKEN BY THE PERSUASION, CONTINUATION OF THE FRIGHTFUL STRUGGLE
AT JENNIE RICHES, BICKNELL TO THE RESCUE, WHAT OTHER THRILLING THINGS
VIOLET AND HER SISTERS WENT THROUGH, THE BATTLES OF CONCLUSION, AND MORE THRILLING ADVENTURE OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS.
CONTINUATION FOR A BRIEF PERIOD OF THE REMAINDER OF THE BATTLE ALONG HANSON'S FRONT, AND HOW HE WAS FINALLY BEATEN, AND HIS HORSE SEVERELY WOUNDED, VIOLET AND HER SISTERS ARE FIRED ON IN AMBUSH.

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS! who had unfortunately been seized from behind, found that it was only some playful boys, who not knowing who they were had wanted to play some jokes on them, but at this moment all had been startled by a rolling distant roar, and Violet and her sisters and the playful boy scouts noticing the enemy had recently set fire to a line of woods, and that the wounded soldiers lying in the fields yonder were in danger of being burned to death wished to rescue them, but relieving a full view from a high rise of ground saw something that at once told them considerably.

Whole swarms of purple up coats were retiring in the greatest disorder, and they saw more and more of the Christians appear, retreating in such disorder, that it seemed as if all the people living in the entire world was trying to flee from the angry Eye of God. Violet and her sisters never observed such a frightful panic before, or heard such a volume of sounds, and now occasionally they were stunned by great explosions far in the distance. One immense column was fleeing here, another there, and soon the whole scene became a sea of undulating panic stricken men. Thousands of panic stricken Angolians came rolling forward like a mighty river, and Violet and her sisters tried to single out amid the advancing throngs, the central portion of the army who was cutting his way through with frightful fury, and around whose undulating the seas of heads, and whose progress gave occasion to so mighty a commotion. But all was so wildly confused, with the waving of sabres and rifles, and the smoke and flash of advancing guns, and the shooting clouds of great explosions, that the little girl Frances could distinguish nothing. Violet herself turned her gaze in an opposite direction, and saw general Vivian advancing at the head of three hundred thousand horsemen at full spur in order to meet and turn back the advancing column of retreating Angolians and rally them, and in the apparent sea of explosions they believed he would be killed, and about screamed in horror and fear. From over where there arose loud, irregular, and strange outcries, of millions of voices pitched to high excitement, mingled with babbling confusion, of denouncing explosions, and firing of guns, and clatter of bayonets, sabres, and pistol hits. All the other columns were responding with a universal shout, then Violet and her sisters beheld other large divisions retreating in their own direction in mere terrified confusion under a mortal fire of the rebels advancing cannons, while to increase the indescribable tumult a large force of gray coated horsemen probably the Wheeler geygeons in the far distance were charging on seeking to penetrate through the masses to reach the lanes out of which it seemed the whole Christian center poured like a living and tempest tossed river, and such a scene of confusion and flight was never witnessed before in the war.

Some whole masses heaved bewildered and confused as to their whereabouts were literally in retrograde motion, and not wishing to be borne along with the human current, Violet and her sisters emerged on their horses and dashed away followed by the three boys. Ammunition and provision and other wagons were overthrown on all sides in the haste, and not a soul had then one avaricious thought at that moment of stopping to gather any of the provisions which the rushing hundreds of thousands trampled beneath their feet. The Angolian columns were flooding like chaff before the pursuing enemy. Along the right the scene was appalling as the Angolians had been pressed back from their works and overlapped on both sides. What with the rebel bayonets on two sides, and the advancing glandelinian artillery behind, the multitudes of Christians in the front of the retiring line facing the enemy, fearing destruction, or annihilation and not wishing to surrender themselves under any conditions whatever, trod upon one another, trampled each other underfoot and filled the air with profane curses, oaths, shrieks, and horrible outcries of mingled pain, rage and terror. Violet and her sisters seeing that they were in danger of being caught in the fearful current of human beings made the shortest cut for the Angoline river but here in a glen, as they started to cross the shells from a concealed rebel battery started to explode so frequently that they were demoralized. But to cross the river they must, and therefore they headed for Jennie's bridge, but as they got to within twenty rods of it, they found it also swept by shells and badly damaged and that portions of it was wrecked long ago.

"We cannot cross that broken bridge," said Angeline. "It's certain death."

"I know it is, but we got to avoid the human stream," answered Violet. "It's dangerous both ways, but that broken bridge is still more dangerous to cross." Violet was standing by the river for a moment watching the retreating Christian columns and drawing the curtains and looking at the broken bridge said to Jennie: "I believe despite this rout of the Christian columns, the enemy will be beaten in the end, but anyhow these retreating columns cannot be rallied and if those officers who command them had any sense they would withdraw them immediately to the rear. But I would like to go to Bicknell and tell them that that recently our Uncle Hanson had ordered him to abandon Jennie's place which he had intended to do anyhow before we were captured."

Violet and her sisters observed that the retreating Angolians were headed for the river, and were about to make a dash across it no matter how deep it was, when they observed by the disturbance in the water, that it was also swept by grape and canister, from some concealed rebel gun battery of some kind.

"But how are we going to do so?" asked Jennie. "It is awfully risky just now, the country of galvanina, near Vivian's place are overrun by battles everywhere and even now there are battles raging at Aurandicallio and Aurandishondia just directly in our path, and besides Bicknell is not concentrating at Jennie's place as Hanson our Uncle supposed for he has retreated."

"We will have to go just the same," said Violet most determinedly. "And right away too. We got to leave this field of horror at Jennie's place for the very same glandelinians at this battle line were some of those who committed the slaughter last year at Julio Callio section of Vivian's place, and a part of his battle line was stationed there."

"If we take the safest path and avoid those two carnage stricken cities and a battle at Calverine which is roaring worse than Mt. Calverine did when she was trying to dismember herself."

After a debate they set on down another road where everything seemed clear, and then turning off started off down another road leading toward Jennie's place. The shells were exploding along this road but they knew how to dodge the shells many of whom had poisonous vapors in them. As they were riding on listening to the heavy firing a small object fell through the air and glittered in the dusky atmosphere of the evening with a loud crash. It was like that of an exploded bomb the object fell in front of Violet's horse and a thin whisp of white whistling vapor rose from the spot where the object fell and ascended with lightning swift swiftness to a height of about eight feet above her horse. It assumed the shape of some ball about ten inches in diameter and changed to a greenish grayish hue giving off a how like some kind of phosphorus. Then with incredible rapidity it commenced to whirl as it lung suspended in the air for a brief second and from it there emanated a low unearthly moan which was unlike any sound that Violet and her sisters had ever heard. Suddenly it shot forward still whirling and moaning in a manner which made the blood of the little girls run cold. Straight for Jennie's head it sped. In a breath it was upon her face and spread out in a larger ball that completely covered her head, whirled about her face with a hellish whirling as of some demon in torment, and through the unearthly light of the greenish vapor Jennie's face showed as if she were being tortured by a score of fiends. Her eyes bulged, she clutched at her throat, gasping for breath. Her sisters never forgot the look of horror and torture upon Jennie's face as that unending death whirled about her. With never a sound she fell from her horse, the greenish light died out of the vapor, and before Jennie touched the ground the whirling ball scattered and vanished as quickly as it came. It was all over in less than twenty seconds. Jennie was not dead, but maimed and her brain was in a daze. Yet her sisters brought her to her senses, and when she was fully recovered, and they recovered from their scare they kept on their way but kept a closer lookout for those strange kind of a gas bomb.

"We are about to have some thrilling times," thought Violet to herself as she and her sisters rode on. "Amidst of Christians and glandelinians in bloody combats everywhere, and battles raging more than in ten places at once."

Suddenly Violet was startled by the sound of wildly galloping horses, and not knowing who the riders were, the little girl arched her sisters, and the seven went back or drew back and went to a dark spot of the battle torn woods and reached it before the approaching horsemen came into view.

"They are glandelinian Germanians," said Jennie as the horsemen appeared and quite a large division of them hove into view.

"I wonder what they are up to?" asked Angeline. "I also wonder if it is a flanking party that is coming?"

"Maybe," added Hattie. "And they seem to be coming, and coming."

"If they are we ought to give the warning," declared Jennie. "Violet you can climb a tree as good as the rest of us. Take this flag, and if they are flankers wave it frantically."

Violet took the flag and quickly climbed to the top of the highest tree, and from a branch surveyed the surroundings. Before her view was a seemingly endless stream of mounted graycoats all on horseback, and dressed in gray hoods and robes with the designs of wheels on the breast of their gold trobeis, it being the strangest column they had ever seen, and at their head was general Calvin Showmann.

"It is a flanking force of Gargoylian Wheelers and of Zimnammundans," said Violet to herself. "I must give the warning at any risk."

Quickly she unfurled the flag and waving it to the breeze, she found that the bullets from the distant battle lines were flying past in a furious concert, and by the time she had waved it twenty times and received a response a bullet had clipped off four locks of her curls, another had grazed her ear, and a third had glanced off her hand, leaving a bleeding wound while she could count forty bullet holes in the flag. In the meantime her sisters had climbed up other trees to be out of range of the heavy firing, that surely would ensue. For a moment the enemy continued on when all of a sudden there was a horrible roar, the distant woods seemed to become an undulating inferno and now backwards sent the flankers their line honeycombed with gaps, but the vivian girls could not remain upon the trees as they seemed to be the targets of thousands of bullets and down they went and reached the ground where storms of bullets were fairly cutting the grass, why they were not hit seemed or was mysterious, but just as they had mounted their horses they were discovered by hundreds of the retreating glandolinians who began firing at them with might and main.

"Quick," gasped Violet. "We are discovered, and will have the whole line after us if we don't hurry."

As swiftly as they could urge their horses on the little girls dashed away despite the shells still exploding near or about them, and the bullet whistling close to them, they could see thousand upon thousands of glandolinians retreating hastily but also could see their pursuers who a were after them at a breakneck speed.

"As they are the wheelers they will catch us I'm afraid," declared Jennie. "They are coming nearer. I wonder if we could escape them by climbing other trees!" "I doubt that," said Joice. "or by the time we had dismounted they would be upon us, and as it is certain death to be captured by these hooded Gargoylians we got to think of some other way."

As the uproar of the firing was increasing and Violet glancing back noticed that the glandolinians themselves were being pursued by Angolinians. But all their own pursuers were coming nearer as a swift as an approaching windstorm and Violet and her sisters did their best to increase the pace of their horses still more the glandolinian leader yelling himself horses for them to stop and fired wildly and cursed and swore worse than the devil himself could do. They already saw the woods to their left was alive with graycoats who fell by hundreds every second and fearing that they would be overtaken by their pursuers the little girls started firing as rapidly and incessantly bringing down the pursuers at every shot, and not missing one at that. The pursuing glandolinians though astonished, were not daunted, and the foremost of them returned a withering fire, and two bullets grazed Violet and Jennie and brought down their horses, but they were unhurt, and leaped onto the horses of their sisters, but seeing that the little girls were not outdistancing them the glandolinians continued their withering fire, but the hundreds of bullets flew wide, and Violet and her sisters dashed on again firing once more, and now only bringing down now and then with every shot and several leaders of the rebels themselves. Instant confusion reigned among the pursuers for never had they faced any fugitive who could or ever fired with such accuracy, and yet these were little girls, and never did Violet and her sisters hear such imprecations and swearing and also blasphemies and they were shocked.

"Blasphemers they certainly are," said Joice as she fired three shots in rapid succession and bringing down six men with the three shots. "They are worse than the Omurian Curdes in cursing and swearing or blaspheming and ought to be hanged as such as any one could mortify them. And as they made us witnesses to that horrible slaughter five or six days ago and almost made us share it, we would be in the right if we shot down every pursuer and killed him." And she and her sisters fired again, bringing down a score of men.

"Gurses on them children beautiful heads as they are," shouted the leader who was also wounded. "I will lead the foot men who locate them escape it us. Never mind O'm, after them recalcitrants, who ever they are, get them with your shots, and shoot straight and not like wild men."

The other Glandolinians came rushing after Violet and her sisters on the swiftest horses and seeing they were in danger of being immediately overtaken they started firing as quickly as they could bringing down a graycoat at every shot.

"It is probable a portion of general Mash-In-The-Head's men," said Violet. "but if he was here I know he would stop them right away. I see general Shoemann coming and as he may be one of our worst enemies he may make it hot for us now."

"Well I'm not afraid of him and he will not take us alive," declared Joice as she glanced back with a pugacious expression on her face. "He is a brute, and you could tell it to his face."

Violet and her sisters as they rode on were firing so constantly at the rebels, and bringing them down in such woeful numbers, that it attracted the attention of general Mash-In-The-Head, but he could do nothing to restrain the wicked men, and Shoemann himself shouted at the top of his voice (if he has any);

"Head them off with a body of your swiftest horsemen, surround them."

"I guess not," thought Violet and her sisters. "They will not surround us if we can help it."

As they dashed off again so quickly that the Glandolinians failed to head them off, and suffered heavy losses instead.

"What then?," howled Shoemann, while Mash-In-The-Head laughed until tears ran down his cheeks at the rebels' rage. "I never saw such slippery skeddaddles in all my life."

"But they have got to be captured or they will arouse Conventinian Armory who is stationed near Angolinia," declared another officer. "We must take them!" "Shut up you, please of Lamerger Chemo or I'll shoot you," roared Mash-In-The-Head, furiously. "You don't need to butt in on this affair."

"Chase those kids, and capture them and if they escape you will be discharged in disgrace," said Shoemann.

Despite their cleverness Violet and her sisters saw their increasing danger, for they were being headed in, and so therefore took to a side road. As they dashed on they observed two sisters approaching and the enemy rushing on behind, and Violet recognized, the tallest as their old friend sister Mary Angolinia. The two sisters saw the vivian girl Princess's approaching, and the enemy rushing on behind.

"Quick jump on the horse behind me or in front of me," said Violet to sister Mary Angolinia. "These are Wheeler Gargoylians and they will kill or disgrace you as you are of the religious kind."

For a moment fearing for the safety of such beautiful children the sisters hesitated, but as Jennie and her other sisters fired away at the enemy, Joice said:

"You are Holy sisters, and servant of God our Father and good people and though in rank we are your superiors, we must show respect to you, but you will have to obey Violet's command, or we'll let the enemy take us one or the other. We would rather see you safe than ourselves."

The two sisters knew that Joice meant what she said, and so each got on Violet's and Joice's horses, and away they dashed while a howl of rage came from the rebels.

"No, did you ever see such daring fools," shouted Shoemann as several of the glandolinians cheered the vivian girls. "Cheering enemies of Glandolinia. Stop that now and get after them. We have got to take them."

As Violet dashed on ahead of her sisters she saw a sort of cave on the side of the road, and instantly mentioned her discovery to her sisters. Before Shoemann or Mash-In-The-Head could realize what had happened, the two sisters and the little girls disappeared out of sight.

"Where have they gone to I wonder," cried the Glandolinian general as he and Mash-In-The-Head dashed up with the men. "They seem to have disappeared through the earth."

"They must have turned behind a bank," said another as hundreds of Glandolinians came rushing up under fire. Mash-In-The-Head, roared on passing the entrance of the cavern, and followed by his own men but Shoemann tried to see if anything was in the cave, but in vain his eyes could not penetrate the darkness, and he did not wish to venture inside for fear of being fired on in the dark recess of the cavern but he shouted from a place of shelter:

"Who is ever in there, come forth!"

but there was no answer and so he also went off. A few minutes later the woods was alive with Glandolinians who were running up from the pursuing Angolinians. About sixty of the hooded men made for the cave, to take refuge entering horses and all but in the darkness did not see the vivian girls or either the two sisters.

"We must scare them out somehow or they will discover us when their eyes get accustomed to the darkness," declared Violet.

"I can scream like a catamount," said Jennie. "shall I do it?"

"They might fire if they hear one," answered Joice. "We all can imitate demons, as we know how to make the sound well."

"We might as well do it," declared Violet. "And as I have some sulphur we can make our hands and faces glow so we look like small fiends."

Violet produced the sulphur wetting it on the damp floor of the cavern, and as the little girls also rubbed it on their clothes they shone with a very dull lurid light very uncanny in that crepuscular darkness and they were almost frightened at themselves.

"What in world is that light," gasped one of the refugees in apprehension. "It appeared suddenly."

All the Glandolinians noticed it and observing the strangely glowing forms became terrified. Then all of a sudden Violet and her sisters set up a universal screaming that filled the cavern with uncanny sound more like the scream of lost souls, mingling it with weird cries as of in intense agony and fear at the same time.

"Run boys quick," yelled a graycoat. "There be devils or lost souls in here after us."

Such a hasty scramble for any exit violet and her sisters had never seen before. They tripped each other in their haste, fought each other fiercely to be out first, cursed and swore and hollered and acted like crazed men, and some others screamed the rest of them outside by their warning. In a moment not a glandelinian was in or about the cavern although the words were still alive with them.

"I see some Angolinians coming," said violet. "My how they are firing!" The glandelinians were soon displaced by purple coats, and now violet and her sisters came out of their hiding place with the two sisters and waited until the purple lines had passed, but it seemed as if they would never stop coming.

"I wonder if this battle will ever be over!" asked violet. "And I wonder how many were killed or wounded. We could hear the terrible roar all the while during the four days we were trying to find papers christian army."

"I don't know but we may find out in the bulletin when we reach Jennie town or so on other places," answered Joice.

"We will have to reach that town here before tomorrow, and from there we may be able to telegraph to general concentinian Aronburg if the enemy had not destroyed the wires."

At last the line of christians had passed, and violet and her sisters went on their way slowly, the sisters following, and taking a path leading directly from the scene of battle, but it nevertheless seemed as if they would never leave the contending forces far behind, and over and over they would hear terrible gusts of firing that shook the ground. They even wondered sometimes if they were really within hearing of the other two battles, but they even feared they had passed between without seeing anything of them. They now came suddenly upon Jennie town it being nearer to them than they had expected, but all the wires were down, the city was in smoldering ruins, and they realized they had to either reach Gicknell or Concentinian Aronburg in person to tell them of general Hannon's victory command.

The question was, how they were going to reach either one with all this battle of confusion and horror going on round about.

"It is too bad," said violet. "We are in danger for Federals scouting parties may be lurking everywhere, and would ambush even their own relation not let alone a child who was on the opposing side."

"But we got to make it at any cost," declared Jennie. "And I believe this battle field of Jennie Joice has no end in its extent."

"Let's ride along the railroad," said Joice. "It is more longer but we will arrive there, as our father is still fifty miles away from Givian Wickey."

They all agreed, and reaching the railroad, violet thought she saw something suspicious behind a bush, and suddenly halting drew her revolver, and fired to the surprise and alarm of her sisters. There was a curse and a graycoat went sprawling into view to the amazement and fear of all the little girls. Then from behind the bushes there appeared scores of graycoats, who surged toward the little girls and sternly ordered them to dismount.

"I dare you to try and force us," declared Joice. "We are sharpshooters and can bring you men down in short order. Advance a step nearer and we will fire."

The graycoats did not seem to heed her words, and the spokesman said: "You may shoot us all down if you want to, but there are others coming up behind you, and you cannot escape."

"Oh is that so?" exclaimed violet with a smile. Then she whispered something to her sisters, and quickly the little girls dashed toward the foot men at break-neck speed, and fearing that they would be trodden down, the rebels scattered, cursing and swearing. Violet and her sisters then dashed on, violet taunting the glandelinians with a handkerchief. A member of the glandelinians started in pursuit, but they could not gain on these little girls as they were footmen or infantry.

"I thought they said we could not escape!" said Angeline. "We did though and more quickly than they thought we would."

They now rode on quite a distance and soon came to a portion of country side which looked very familiar to violet and her sisters despite the sea of havoc caused by the battle of Jennie Joice.

"I believe I know that old ruined house yonder," said Joice. "It must be where some of you of my sisters were taken away by Sister Angeline after a certain miracle, and others of us too."

"Let's go and take a look at it," said violet.

"It is too dangerous," exclaimed Angeline. "With all those shells exploding out there, and if I am not mistaken I think I see somebody moving toward us in gray uniforms, and I hear something like thunder to or in our rear."

"Go do it," declared Jennie excitedly. "It must be Federals line of advance, you know his line of battle extends for four miles and"—

"I wonder what makes a ll that thundering sound in the rear of us," exclaimed violet. Joice and the others noticed or heard it too and glanced to it the rear, and saw far away where a line of low ridges stood a wall of cloud as if every emulmination there were volcanoes starting into action, and realized that christian batteries were firing upon these advancing rebellions. It literally sounded like a far away drum drum fire of many thousands of heavy cannons, and the ground literally shook under their very feet. As they looked to their front again they beheld an appalling wave of glandelinian troops which undulated with the storm of exploding shells.

"It is a battle line approaching toward us," said Joice in alarm. "These glandelinian columns under general Raymond Johardson Federal are the most dangerous of all the glandelinians, and it is a funny thing we did not notice this advance before."

"It looks like the convulsed whitest old clouds of Mount Calverine but that is probably the christian cannon for fire," said Jennie. "And my how swiftly those long lines in gray are coming."

The glandelinian columns with green and gray uniforms and with hats as black as ink, and expanding their lines had not passed the hiding places of the little girls, fifteen minutes passed of horrible thundering of cannons, and then the low moaning of the yelling of the approaching Angolinians, who were coming on at a counter charge could be distinctly heard.

"Go and get out in the open," said Jennie in fright. "We will be killed sure."

"Make for the highest trees," said Joice, as the funny meaning changed to a screaming, roaring tumult of voices, and mingled with crashes of musketry. "Go backwards surge is coming awfully fast, and it's our only chance."

They quickly made for the trees, and reached them just in time as there was a shrieking roar as of millions of demons, the long streams of men seemed tossed like the waves of the sea, and in a few minutes later all was in total whiteness with smoke while there came a roar as of many drums rolling, and violet and her sisters thought themselves lost for sure this time. Instead of coming from the rear, as the givian girls had expected, the surge of purple coats came from their left, and fierce explosions began anew which tore away thousands of trees, and in many times the trees violet and her sisters were hiding in, were narrowly missed by the explosives. The opposing lines surged back and forth, and seemingly in all directions in mighty throes, and the defending crash of firearms, the ring of steel on steel, and the yelling of the combatants. For about fifteen minutes this slaughter at close quarters continued, and so fearful was the storm of bullets exchanged that it plowed the opposing lines and even the grass of the meadows like a thrashing machine, and then all of a sudden there was a mighty crash under them, and violet and her sisters found themselves with the tree and all crashing to the ground, where they were almost stunned.

Yet violet and her sisters had sense enough left, to hide under the foliage of the trees now crashing down everywhere and the ear splitting crash of mighty explosions, which was increasing with redoubled fury. The smoke of powder had settled into such thickness, that objects a hundred feet could not be seen but still it continued to increase, and sometimes such a thick whiff of smoke would pass them that the little girls could not see each other, and they felt almost suffocated. The combatants shrieked and howled, and so cursed, like millions of demons, in misery, rage, and ferocity and it indeed seemed as if the world itself had turned into a regular hell, as it could not be formed by the thickness of the smoke and deafening tumult roaring and crashing.

With all their might violet and her sisters prayed, for indeed how they did wish that this great surge of battle would be passed beyond. They were even terrified out of their wits by the horrible unearthly shrieking of the wounded and dying, and of the almost supernatural fury and violence of the battle which continued steadily without change, while from the strange sounds, violet and her sisters knew that the glandelinian soldiers were winning. And violet and her sisters feared that every shell that exploded near the tree would reach them, and someone did land squarely on the mark, and violet and her sisters found themselves precipitated tree and all into a ravine with some violence, and though badly bruised and slightly mangled, they were not seriously hurt after all. Another tree was hurled into the air like a spin wheel by the force of another shell explosion and then came down with every branch and leaf gone, for an hour this surge of battle continued with unabated fury the smoke not getting thinner in the least. Thousands of sticks and stones at many intervals were precipitated into the swirling air on top of violet and her sisters by other shell bursts but they had hoped it would soon be over as it was now at its height. But it did not.

It continued with unabated fury but finally it for them receded to another quarter the glandelinians pressing on entirely victorious and crushing the christian line to atoms. This battle surge did not seem so fierce as they thought it was but it had raged with unceasing fury at this very location for two hours and had killed the little girls beyond numbering and it was an hour before they discovered that their horses had been killed.

All around as far as eye could see were multitudes of dead dying, and wounded.

"It is a god thing that we did not bring our own horses," said Joise as she looked the dead ones over, "for it would be a sad thing if it had happened to them."
"Well now are we going to get to general picknells or Conventini n Aronburgs lines?" asked Catherine. "The enemys worst firing lines are between us and then it seems as if we will have to risk death by passing through their lines, or back out as so wards."
"I will pass through at any cost," declared Joise while her sisters decided the same thing. "I am not afraid of Federal Grouch or ra scals though he is. If he does us any insult he will die for it."
They now advanced toward the house they had seen but they did not see it now or anything else either but windrows upon windrows or of wreckage, mangled human forms and broken fragments of guns and other wreckage of battle which were scattered all about.

"The house must have been blown away by the shells," said Violet. "There is nothing that could stand such a shell storm."
They thought they were further away from the enemys lines than it had seemed but before they were aware of it a great surge of glandelinians suddenly appeared, it being nother column going to the aid of those pressing down upon the christian far in the distance, and before violet and her sisters knew it they were surrounded. They did not resist the glandelinians who searched them, and took away their pistols and other weapons that they had carried with them.

"Well general Federal will be glad to see you," said the leader of the captors. "He knows what great spies you girls are, and so he will make it hot for you."

The little girls were not led away by the glandelinians who abused them greatly, the rest of the glandelinians continuing on.
Picknell having concentrated his entire force at Angeline Riches in the early morning had posted his headquarters in one of general Hannons mansions and from there through his eye glasses at half past two that afternoon of the fourth day of the battle of Jennie Riches he could see great signs of activity along general Federals entire line and as he heard the horrible roar of battle from that distance he realized that general Double Day Federal was being worsted, and in danger of being driven from the hills. Picknell summoned all of his officers, and they took in the situation at glance.

"The Vivian Girls have been captured," said one of the officers riding up. "And the glandelinians are storming with fury upon Double Day Federal lines, and he is severely wounded."

Picknell strained his glasses toward the commotion or toward the point where it was at its worse, and saw that the very Vivian Girls were right in the heart of the battle field and before general Federal who was this abusing them terribly and enraged general Federal said to his officers:
"See that all the batteries are in position and arouse the men to get them to advance and sweep upon general Federal center. I'll make him understand whos friends he is abusing."

While the batteries were being put into position and the christian forces broke camp and formed for the advance to Jennie Riches, picknell gave orders for the troops to advance against Federal glandelinian center. This advancing wave of men was seventeen miles long and fourteen deep and the glandelinians who were assaulting Double Day Federal line so furiously gave way before the arrival of so many christian reinforcements. Forward was Picknells word which were carried out all along the line, and now not only Picknells but Double Day Federal went forward, the christian batteries advancing and opening fire with renewed vigor, and the front line of Federal center which had been assaulting the christian center of Double Day Federal line was forced to withdraw. The struggle along the right grand division of the center was appalling and the columns of glandelinians under general Accountants not able to stand the onset of picknell fell back across the tracks, but Accountants as he retired across the region of such appalling slaughter which appalled him, received twomillion five hundred thousand more men and therefore rallied his panic stricken lines, and now Accountants recrossed the tracks with the whole force, consisting of one quarter of Federal center, while the greater part of picknell line were retiring. And the firing ceased altogether. Picknell was angered when he observed that Federal center had rallied to repel his attacking columns, and seeing that they outnumbered his assaulting forces six to one, he ordered forward two million seven hundred thousand more, and moved on in advance to storm the enemys line.

In grand array he advanced against Federal center and for some cause during the death struggle Accountants divisions once more retired, across Haddon line much against his will. Yet the whole center held its ground and encouraged by this Accountants advanced one therefore, to help repel the christians, but again they fell back under heavy firing. Haddon line had heavy masses of christian christian seemed to be fairly torn to pieces by the rebel fire and as they now withdrew, Accountants advanced again with his own columns and assailed Vivianias disordered troops with such great vehemence that the whole christian force was driven back in confusion.

But as they poured in fearful broadsides of shells, Picknell checked the stampede and the rebel advance was met by the most frightful cannonading and the most severe resistance and the most severe musketry fire he had ever met in his life.

A most fearful struggle now ensued but the glandelinians under general Accountants gave way and retreated very slowly, every man fighting with the obstinacy of demons. Yet the more purple coated soldiers they moved down the more pressed on after them, and soon general Federal had to send heavy columns to check the headlong advance of the christians. Several large divisions were rallied against general laderses columns and as the long christian line pressed on, they held fast and began delivering a most destructive withering fire, along their own whole line point blank, but nevertheless the christian onslaught was doubly terrific, the hundreds of thousands of Angelinians in the rear having suddenly halted, then lay down and started firing themselves, and the others still continuing on the ground being covered with regular windrows of so many of the dead and dying soldiers of both sides who were piled on top of one another on little hills and ridges.

The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion.

The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion.

The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion.

The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion.

The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion.

The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion.

The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion.

The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion.

The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion.

The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion. The christian forces were now pressing forward with great vigor, and the glandelinians were being driven back in confusion.

It was awful but still the struggle continued to rage with unabated fury, and soon the whole center was hurled upon the repelling christian line which again closely gave way. The glandelinians yelling like demons swept onward toward the retreating christian lines while general Federal prepared three million five hundred thousand of his fifteen million men to storm the rest of the christian lines. The Angolinian forces who had stormed the glandelinian center were also being driven back with frightfulness by the long line in gray which was pressing on with the greatest energy. The glandelinians came on like enraged mobs and though several of the mangled glandelinian columns began to retreat, recall the greater part stood despite the destructive christian fire and began firing themselves until general Federal sent forward reinforcements. Several divisions of glandelinians were pressed back by general Vivian's Angolinians who made a furious counter charge, but federal's whole center was advancing in full array, and vivian encountering an annihilating fire was forced to withdraw once more.

The fire along Federal's center was something terrific and the storm continued down the grass even like the lava moner. Vivian's whole line of one million three hundred and sixty five thousand men torn and tangled into scores of fragments and which were being rapidly reduced still more were becoming demoralized and in panic stricken, while in picknell's whole line gaps appeared as fast as they were closed and the whole column became confused, as their dead and wounded lay all along the line.

Explosions hurling clouds of wreckage thousands of feet into the air stunned thousands of the survivors for life, and some it seemed to be a mile in size of their flashes. Federal seeing the gathering confusion along the whole of Bicknell's line, pressed forward his whole force which soon crashed upon the shattered lines in a more vehement attack, but picknell had received the rest of his divisions, and falling back toward his own work poured in a ravaging fire.

Bicknell in the meantime rallied the other divisions, and prepared his whole line to meet the charge of the enemy, and when it came the Angolinians received it with the fury of demons decimating the enemy columns at every step, but this charge was so vehement that despite the serious resistance general Vivian's shattered divisions were driven back a mile in the worse confusion. The sanguinary struggle now extended into the stronger portions of picknell's line and seeing that he was failing in carrying the center, Federal threw his right against the christian left, and more more frightful still was the carnage. The glandelinians attacked the christians in the most frightful numbers and the struggle continued to rage in a fury beyond anything known, the glandelinian losses being tremendous during this onset, but a portion of the christian line along the left was pressed back, and clear out of their position, but they filled the abandoned works with dead and dying rebel soldiers.

The glandelinians had been moved down by hundreds of thousands all along the line and now the firing grew so heavy that thousands of trees were cut down by shells, bullets and canister. Seeing that the divisions under general Henryson's Chamerons were giving way general Callien Cannon brought up his artillery and rained upon the advancing glandelinians terrible torrents of canister which tore whole columns to mere bits of fragments. Blood was everywhere and the explosions or shells were more constant and still more appalling most of the survivors hailing and falling back, but the rest still advanced with irresistible fury upon the retreating christians and general Chamerons fell mortally wounded. But soon general Chamerons' divisions were heavily reinforced by picknell, and as the enemy still pressed forward with the most frightful fury they poured in a murderous murderous fire that again and again decimated the glandelinian columns by the hundreds.

It certainly was becoming frightful but despite the horrible carnage many divisions of the glandelinians still pressed on, and the firing grew still fiercer. Two thousand two hundred cannon were now in action along picknell's line and as the frightful roar of musketry continued to increase the din became more deafening, again hundreds of thousands more of the poor glandelinians being moved down as well as the Angolinians, but though they in the christian lines were filled up by reinforcements, and soon the enemy lines began to flow back, it being a gradual withdrawal of the whole glandelinian center, as well as the withdrawal of the left.

General Francis Bernakintona advanced with all his men against the retreating glandelinians, but Federal's batteries soon met them with a withering fire. Division after division of the Angolinians advanced upon the retreating glandelinians but the Angolinians were losing one quarter of each division, and were compelled to fall back. Bicknell was obstinate however and led hundreds of thousands after hundreds of thousands against the gray lines, and the struggle became more bloodier.

Bicknell's first frightful charges were repelled with greater slaughter but Bicknell though forced to withdraw with every division who charged, shattered into a few fragments, he only sent others forward, and so the struggle kept on without intermission. A column after column swept on toward Federal's lines but met a murderous fire of cannon that decimated every column that came within range. Even several divisions of the glandelinians made frightful counter charges, that swept back the assaulting christians with great loss, but each time the rebels met a fire from Bicknell's cannon that cut their own divisions to pieces and forced them to withdraw to their own line of defense. The losses on both sides were becoming more stupendous than you could even imagine. Bicknell realized that he could not carry the position though it was already near three o'clock so he withdrew his men to his own works, and from here the Angolinians kept up a most incessant scathing fire upon the yelling glandelinians who were pressing forward again. The carnage now became frightfully awful.

The glandelinian officers went down by the score, the ground was almost obscured by the bodies of the dead and wounded, and many hundreds of thousands of trees along the line began to in other battles to resemble brush or hickory brooms. Federal pushed on his columns despite the fire that the christians was pouring upon his men which thinned his whole assaulting line in so frightful a manner.

As the gray columns came on the firing grew more and more fiercer still heaping up the masses of dead and wounded, but on came the survivors, and rushed clear up to the christian works. Back drew the christians leaving the works covered with their own dead and wounded. The works consisting of wooden barricade barricades was so badly backed and riddled that they gave way at some places. Hundreds of thousands of the fresh dead and wounded were strewn everywhere on top of the old, and the advancing columns were more so badly cut up and mangled by the storm of canister and mines that they were shivered into small fragments. Thousands more were badly riddled by bullets and canister and torn to pieces intestines and all, and their very aspect was frightful, as many had their necks, arms, or legs so badly riddled that they were almost off. The firing of cannons and muskets had grown frightfully intense and now general Henry Techmay seeing that the Angolinians were giving way sent forward with all his command, and joined in the terrific firing against the glandelinians. General Techmay brought up all his guns and opened fire with double charges of grape and canister increasing the frightful massacre in such a manner that the glandelinians were staggered, but they recovered and despite the raking fire rushed on, but again their front dissolved almost to the last man. Hundreds of the best Angolinians served at these machine guns until they were all shot down, but other gunners took their places as quick as they fell, and as more Angolinians and batteries under Techmay's brother arrived and were put into action, the artillery and musketry fire became so deadly, that the glandelinians with hundreds of divisions frightfully decimated were again forced to withdraw slowly but kept up their own firing without intermission.

Federal seeing this occurrence decided he must check it or retreat, and therefore put three million more men into the action. Yet ever every onset was repelled or driven back with the most heaviest losses ever believed, and meeting such bloody repulses as this, general Federal became enraged, and redoubled his energy, and led charge after charge himself, but again and again met with frightful decimations. Federal had also thrown his left against the christian right again, and here also as fast as his columns dissolved before the christian fire the more came on, and soon a veritable sea of dead and wounded lay on this portion of the field of battle a sea. But with a yell of fury the large surviving columns of glandelinians swept forward with the violence of an avalanche, and again came well within range of the very christian musketry.

Already the Angolinian cavalry was in the rear of the glandelinian army, and cavalry of other Angolinians which had been sent to burn a bridge at Herascan, could not arrive in time to hold the glandelinian column in check, and the Angolinians had to abandon their works in front of the main line, while a portion of the glandelinian cavalry pressed in the rear, and on the right, but were cut off and captured. Among the killed of the christian generals were Frank Rarkersons, now Rarkson Rickson, and Franklin Mic-Cann. Seventeen times Federal's divisions charged against the christian center and also moved against other portions of the line held by generals M-a Mic-Cantler, Ganton Splanner, and Callien Toon, and though the christians counter charged again they met with annihilating losses, and Callien and Mic-Cantler Jensen were killed.

The enemy had broken against this new christian line at all points, and the glandelinian losses were over four million one hundred thousand in the thirty hours assault. General Vivian had toward late evening relieved a good portion of his crushed and mangled commands, and learning that the reports about Hanson Vivian his uncle being captured was only a false rumor decimated once more upon the enemy in a fierce attack, but general Mic-Holleston Bicknell's army was overlapped by a glandelinian counter charge and annihilated with their general killed, and this for the christians made a loss of three million in two quarters of an hour. Bicknell's son Manley or Manlet had also abounded a goodly portion of his army to save himself from annihilation, while general Manley threw his whole force upon general Vivian's flank and defeated the whole line with the loss of six million more in slain and wounded and two million in prisoners, and general Vivian himself was dangerously wounded. During the fierce concentration that afternoon at four o'clock on picknell's line at Jennie's place, the vivian girls had once again escaped the enemy by a clever ruse and from a safe hiding place Joice was surveying the enemy off activities and said to Violet with a shudder as she pointed to the central wings of Sherman's army:

"Federal is killing Sherman, and is placing all kinds of batteries to sweep all approaches from him to the Christian line, and though I dread no one else I loathe him. I can't help shivering when I see him. I'm thankful with all my heart to God that we escaped him as easily as we did after being captured."

Violet stood gazing fascinated by the bright gray clouds of smoke from the long lines of concentrating cannon, and many a thrilling tale she or her sisters had heard of famous spies, and their encounters with Butcher Federal, but never before had she felt so much fear of him as before. Joice, who was looking intently from Violet to Federal's surging lines.

"I believe Jennie," he said with a shudder turning to her small sister. "That in saying to me the enemy I would rather favor the other side than Aronburg Raymond Richardson Federal, and what is more I find no fault of our dread in him because we to them who fall into his hands are enemies."

Violet's eyes shone only for a moment. Joice did not know what a brave one she was, or she would never have talked like that. How could she herself ever be afraid of Federal, when she was so heavily armed. Some children most of them were even afraid of the dark, but she feared no one, more than the spider does the fly.

"I would prove that if I was in his lines that I'm not afraid of Federal if he knew me as well as Sherman does," said Catherine. "I for one fear no one but God." From Joice's heart went up a prayer, that her sisters should be true. A minute later an orderly came galloping up and said:

"General Vivian sent me to ask you if you would for his sake mind seizing a certain plan which General Federal had provided for General Manley that is General Johnston Jackson Manley who is moving on toward Big Beppo. It is a very dangerous mission and it is also known that every approach to his lines is watched, but General Vivian could only depend upon you little girls to do it. I wanted to go myself but he shook his head and sternly refused. It's altogether a very dangerous journey for you little girls, for the battle is still raging, and if the plans are not captured the forces of Vivian will be annihilated for the battle is already a complete glandolinian victory. I am fearing it will be all of with you little girls this time, but this time your brother will take no measures, and if you refuse, he wounded as he is, will go himself, and you do not want him to do that do you?"

"On no, indeed we would not even let him whether we refused or not," cried Jennie. "And I would rather go than let him run into the preternatural dangers. I'll go and so will my sisters."

"All right," declared the orderly as he wheeled his horse. "But before I go off I have some directions to give you. Remember for safety when you are to avoid all open grounds and roads, which are shell and snorter except if possible. If anything happens that you don't get back before this battle ends, General Vivian will send a large force to look for you, and if he finds any one of you killed we be to General Federal, and one thing more. Watch for their native batteries and the columns moving forward during the horrible onslaughts, for the glandolinians are swarming everywhere in their raging fury for their lust of blood. If any of the glandolinians should come upon you before they notice you, you be sure to hide behind trees or in dark places." He concluded as he threw them a salute.

"All right, we won't forget," said Joice as he galloped away. The poor man gave this message at the risk of his life. He and the horse suddenly dropped being killed by four shots. "Bessie!" A loud cannon shot sounded in the distance and a shell just missed a tree near Violet, and exploded in a hole throwing a cloud of dirt all over Violet and her sisters.

"Run!" cried Joice as the bullets whistled close. "The enemy may have a better range in their firing now and some of their ruder shells are reaching us."

Her sisters turned their horses quickly, and headed for a stone wall just as a score of distant cannon blazed forth, going that the sharpshooters were getting to the range dangerously accurate, the little girl Princess went over to the other side, dismounted, sent the horses off to a safer distance, and set to work with their pistols, and hearing the shots several Angelinians came to their rescue and drove the glandolinians into the adjacent works in all directions, shooting a number down. The same canons still sounded faintly in the distance, and as Violet and her sisters went toward their horses a shell exploded just where they had taken their post of defense a few minutes before, tearing a breach in the wall.

"Queer," mused Violet after a while. "It's queer we were discovered by such a distance. I guess we had better wear a disguise, and spy on Butcher Federal, and have it done with."

"Yes that is right," said Joice solemnly. "But we must be cautious."

And turning about she mounted her horse and was off for a creek, her sisters following immediately. Jennie was the first to be made dirty and she stared around helplessly.

She felt that this mighty battle was to be fought still longer and she feared for some reason that it was certainly going to be a lost fight, though her brother's army was two to one of Manleys.

When her sisters kept out of the muddy creek Jennie asked:

"Why whatever shall we do to avoid the scouting parties? I don't worry about others, but it's the Gargantuan Kards that I wish to avoid."

Her sisters began to think it over.

"I know," cried Violet at length. "We can pretend we are stupid country boys except sister Joice who is dressed like a girl who always rumps in dirt with us and who is a roughneck and a scold. She can pretend to be our sister, and as she can imitate a voice good she is to be our spokes girl. It's our only chance."

Joice agreed, and so did her sister Angelina but the other little girls including Jennie were different in their opinions.

"No I fear it would none like telling a lie," said Jennie, "and what's more we cannot fool any kind of Gargantuan. They are too foxy and clever and can read disguises like so can a first reader. We must avoid them at all costs, for they can recognize us anywhere."

"Aren't scared are you?" asked Joice.

"No indeed," answered Jennie bravely, "but I'm not reckless. But there is no getting away from General Raymond Jackson Richardson Federal if once discovered or caught, and you remember what occurred to us five days ago with the slaughter of all two those children don't you, don't you, don't you?"

Joice remembered this, and had a hard fight to keep back the tears as Jennie made this unvarying remark. But Joice knew of her brother's threat to go himself if they did not do so, so they started on their way toward the enemy's blazing lines, and stood into a woods where the firing was not so heavy. Jennie looked base curiously at it her sisters, whose guns were drawn in signs of any glandolinians were observed, a so violet and her sisters went on ahead, while yet they also kept on a look out while Jennie thought to herself:

"Oh dear sisters I'm awfully afraid of Federal's butchers as they may come upon us all of a sudden. I would rather die in a battle than be murdered, but I'm trying to be brave like you."

gradually the sun began to disappear behind clouds and a few minutes gloomy black masses began to overspread the sky.

"Oh!" shuddered Joice. "It's getting dreadfully dark, and we will not be able to see anything if it becomes so. I wonder why they don't come to be around. Maybe the battle is over and they have moved then away."

But she tried to keep up her spirits by going all over a all her prayer prayers and the other things she knew. Darker and darker it grew. Then a thunder clap or wind sounded like one rent the air while suddenly a big rain drip spashed on Jennie's face now, then another. "Bang!" Joice started as she saw it a rifle flash.

"Oh goodness!" cried Jennie. "I'm hit sisters. Hide in the bushes or behind some trees. It's some of those glandolinian bushmackers or snipers."

"Lie down," whispered Violet. "Or you will get hit again."

"But I can't lie down. I can't lie down. The ground in front of me is covered with thorns," said Jennie. "I just can't," she wailed.

Violet and her other sisters straining their ears for sounds of approaching footsteps but it was in vain. The rain drops were coming in earnest now. Jennie rose resolutely to her feet, when Joice tripped her down, and just in time for a hundred flashes broke the darkness and mingled with the flashes came as many reports of rifles and the sweet music of bullets.

"Jennie Vivian," said Joice in a whisper but warningly. "You're too rash. You'll get up or those bushmackers or snipers will hit you. If you are killed we will become rash too."

"To-o-o-o," said Jennie. "But I did not think they were there yet. We can't see in this darkness. We must move forward cautiously on our hands and knees and investigate the conditions of this a thing."

"But we must be careful not to make any noise," said Joice. "It is true, we cannot see in this darkness and they may not upon us without warning."

With a prayer for strength, Violet and her sisters crawled slowly to toward where they had seen the flashes, and fumbled round in the darkness. After crawling a dozen feet, they faltered, but again the flashes came which frightened them more than the bullets. But the little girls persisted, and by the time they were w, or crawled seventy five feet the flashes came again with a rattle and crash that almost stunned them.

Again the little girls paused and as they hid behind a thick row of trees a flash of lightning revealed the glandolinians who were crouching among the twinkling and creaking trunks. As soon as the lightning died out the little girls grouped their way toward the men. It was a moment's work to draw their own guns, and as the flashes came again their own pistols sputtered with a din that sounded like seven cannon through the still woods, and seven glandolinians started to drop while the others started to run but another lightning flash revealed them and the little girls fired with renewed vigor bringing them down also. Then as it grew lighter Violet noticed a slip of paper on the ground and picked it up her sisters then noticing it also.

"Oh it's the plans," cried Joice who had picked up.
 "Let me see it," cried Violet.
 Joice handed the piece of paper to her sister, who looked it over. But she was sadly disappointed.
 "It's only an order but we will keep it just the same," Ned declared Violet.
 By the help of the gathering brightness Joice saw the orange lines in the far distance, and noticed it was Federal's address right grand division.
 "Oh that house yonder must be his headquarters," said Jennie pointing to a mansion a daily seen in the past caused by the heavily falling rain. They soon reached it and got in by the cellar. Then reaching a flight of stairs they clambered up and entered a grand hall. A score of general officers were standing in a group and they saw Federal and Shogren in the center. What an ugly brute Federal made resemble King Frodo in some ways, but had nothing handsome about him. About his whiskered face and mouth was a sinister expression and his dark gray eyes glared wickedly and furiously while all the time a fierce pugmugmugmug glared at all of his faces. And he was speaking about the victim girls and this is what they heard:
 "I was surprised to find these holes empty. Their escape was mysterious for there was no one about to rescue them, and they could not have gotten away. I thought I had found a funny deception or deception near one of the holes making it look like two orators close together. My opinion is that probably shells did it."
 "I believe you are right," said Manley. "But when I saw my room, I'm going to look over my plans before sending them to general Shogren or Jochen Manley near Big Beppo. He is to see if they are all right, and if so to transport it back to me at Bepco's Courthouse next week."
 The officers followed him into a room, and when they saw their chance, Violet and her sisters slipped in and hid in a closet.
 "Well the plans is this," they heard general Federal say. "We are to during the rest of this big battle going on to overlap the Christian Union skill mapping their ground and carry all before us. I'll show you what I mean. Look at this map of the town of Jennie. (Joice and the Christian Union for instance).....
 He was interrupted by a private who came in all excited.
 "The trap door was found again," he exclaimed after shouting. "Some spies have entered for I have found some papers that was captured from one of our wounded men not far away from the woods."
 In an instant Federal and Manley were on their feet.
 "Show me the papers," he commanded sternly.
 The private handed him the papers, and Federal glanced over them carefully.
 "It's an order I had issued to Colonel True," he explained turning to general Manley. "One about I discover has blood stains on it. There is a spy somewhere, and who ever he or she is, is in this very house. Some of you boys," he added turning to the other officers, "search the house and round the alarm. Damn the spies anyway."
 The officers went out with drawn sabres, and Federal followed swearing like a madman and forgetting to take the plans which Manley left on the table. As soon as he and the others had disappeared, Violet slipped from her hiding place, grabbed the plans, and went back, closing the door, and looking it with a key she had, which fitted the lock. Fifteen minutes later, Federal came back, and the officers were with him. They were all excited.
 "It's funny," said Federal as he strode toward the table. "No one in sight. I--"
 As he looked he saw the table was swept clear. He almost fainted.
 "It must be those victim girls," Manley shouted stamping his foot in a rage. "They are hiding somewhere." And he said words that I would blush with shame to even think.
 He searched everywhere, and then noticed the key of the closet was missing.
 "Break down that door," he ordered.
 In the meantime Violet and her sisters had escaped through a skylight in the closet, and Federal suddenly spied them running across a meadow.
 "There they are," he cried frantically. "After them."
 At once he and the officers leaped out of the window which was not far from the ground, but to the amusement of his officers Federal turned a somersault. He sprang to his feet, glared at the men and said angrily:
 "What in tarnation are ye laughing at you laughing jackasses. Go after those victim girls. Hell hounds, and laugh after you get them, or I'll make you wish you never was born. Don't laugh at me now because my officers do. They are escaping, and you are wasting time. Are you men fools?"
 The men then realized the peril of the missing plans and immediately leaped on their horses and set off. Federal decided to lead the pursuit, and leaped on his own, and outriding them came upon the victim girls in the woods. But suddenly there came a mighty roar, and Federal's horse and he himself were precipitated into a hole by a mighty shellburst. The glandulins thinking now only of safety, scampered away, and Violet and her sisters were left entirely alone at the mercy of the dropping shells. They were not harmed however and had ridden only a short distance, when several more glandulins appeared round a bend in the road, and seeing the little girls at once gave chase yelling like demons. They were only two rebels but they were Zimmermanians and dangerous enough to overthrow sixty men against them.

Violet and her sisters saw them coming, and wheeling their horses urging them on at a full gallop, the two glandulins galloping up a hill about, and pursuing swiftly, firing two shots.
 "The hit," cried Violet and was about to reel, when Joice pulled alongside of her and steadied her. Her wound was only a slight laceration but painful, the bullet having missed the other little girls, but the two glandulins were drawing nearer every moment. When all of a sudden out of the bushes in the rear of Violet and her sisters sprang a hundred rebels looking glandulins led by Federal, who opened a withering fire, but the bullets flew wild. The little girls realizing they had been betrayed their former pursuers at first were bewildered, but they changed the direction of their flight and on after them dashed the glandulins, but Violet saw the Christian Union not far distant and rode headlong for it followed by her sisters.
 "If you speak to me stop it, I'll riddle you with bullets and by the way of it I'll give you a lesson in marksmanship," he roared. "We are bound to capture you and by the way of it I'll give you a lesson in marksmanship." Violet and her sisters paid no heed, and urged on their horses all the faster.
 "But these fool Angolins girl heretics," cried Federal, and he whipped out his pistol. "What you little rebels or I'll fire."
 Seeing that they continued to dash on Federal fired, cursing and swearing at the same time, but the bullets missed. The glandulins following along side of Federal were too closely cramped to fire and as the little girls returned Federal's fire, they emptied seven shells. The glandulins all with rage and fury leaped their horses unmercifully to make them go faster, but the little girls reached an old house and dimmed it dimming, quickly went in, bolting the doors, and using their pistols with terrific effect, the glandulins, three hundred in number dimming and charging recklessly toward the house. Seven of them were shot down and then fourteen more, but the rest rammed it surrounded it, and some tried to batter down the door, with the butts of their muskets, but in three seconds the door was also shot down and the survivors appealed to run.
 "Get down a wall there," he roared. "We will show you these pretty boys something."
 This was done and a large branch was cut off. Then a score lifted it and rushed toward the door and banged away at it, but a scathing fire scoured upon the glandulins, and the survivors were compelled to drop the heavy log, and run for their lives. But this did not serve the glandulins, and a fresh score of rebels took up the heavy battering ram, and made a desperate assault at the door. The last knelt down a considerable distance from the house and began firing heavy volleys. In the meantime the three battering away at the door were again forced to drop the log and run under the constant shots poured upon them from the crack and loopholes. The log rolled over three of the glandulins who tripped and fell and crumpled them under its weight. Violet and her sisters fired as rapidly as they could fire and so reloaded every time an assault was made at the door, and the floor was littered with the used up cartridges and cartridges that had already been exploded. Federal was frantic with rage.
 "Run I reward a number of you men and grant your guns into as many of the loop holes as you can," he ordered.
 The glandulins rushed forward but every loop hole darted its tongue of flame, and one glandulin after another hit the dust. The other glandulins keeping at a safe distance poured volley after volley at the house, and again the battering ram was put into play and at last the door gave way with a resounding crash, and in bounded a number of fierce pirates and glandulins. But the victim girls had again escaped through the cellar.
 "They are gone and general Federal will be mad," he cried. "You surround the house and we'll get them."
 But Violet and her sisters had already found their way to their horses, and mounting them they wheeled round like lin lightning and went scurrying up a single road the glandulins again in hot pursuit. Federal whipped out his pistol and fired, the shot carrying away Joice's hair band. As they galloped on the little girls suddenly observed a number of mounted glandulins riding frantically from an opposite direction to intercept them but the little girls were past before the rebels could reach them. Crack, crack, crack. Three shots were discharged simultaneously, and the bullets went flying about the heads of three of the girls, Violet, Jennie, and Joice. Suddenly a score of glandulins came galloping up in front of them to cut off their retreat, but the little girls turned swiftly to one side, and made for Jennie's clothes. Run urging their horses straight for the water, and leaping in with tremendous splashes came suddenly upon a large body of mounted Angolins, who put Federal's men to rout, and secured the victim girls to themselves. An hour afterwards they were standing before general Federal. He was not at all amazed, but he never had believed they would have come back so soon. Violet invited him the plans and after he glanced over it he said:
 "You little girls are a wonder. It's still evening, and you are back here again. I had a feeling you would never be caught and that is the reason I send you but not expecting you so soon do not know what to make of it. You have had an exciting time in getting away."

"We did," said John, "a Federal led the party," but she gave him a graphic description of her appearance and that of her sisters.
"I am too of you are mounted," said general "John," "down over to my headquarters and I will fix them up for you."

"We don't worry about them," said Violet, "the wounds are nothing."
But as he persisted Violet and Jennie allowed him to have their wounds dressed, and when the men learned of their daring they were killed as heretics, and passed through the camp on the shoulders of men.

In the meantime the battle was raging with interminable fury and it was because the Christian forces under general G. J. Davidson had come up to help against them. General Davidson's whole army however had been compelled to retire in confusion, the whole being crushed into one great mass of fragments. General Davidson had also made his final attack upon Johnston, and though hundreds more of his soldiers had been frightfully killed, or even mangled, or died out in the long run, and the whole of his line reduced to fragments, with countless numbers of men slain he finally won his ground completely forcing back the right of Johnston's army with the loss of general Allen's corps a Christian commander, who was killed. Davidson did not also charge the disordered line of Christians with such fury that for a time the struggle was redoubled, but all the glandulins batteries again threw the Christians into confusion, opening an annihilating fire, and the whole Christian line under Johnston was now in a disordered retreat, the glandulins capturing 2,700 pieces of artillery, besides one hundred and seventy eight big heavy guns, 4,450,700 rounds, three hundred provision wagons, and thirty gun carriages, while the whole Christian losses amounted now to 12,345,243 killed and wounded. The glandulins lost in extra of the four days battle was 22,567,777 in killed and wounded and 2,000,000 in prisoners.

It was not long again that evening when through some blunder Violet and her sisters were again captured by the enemy under general Federal and were led outside by some of the men themselves and the great confusion that some of the Christian generals had observed when Johnston had failed in his attack was now accumulating upon Violet and her sisters were in the center of a frenzied multitude of glandulins.

"Take them to the fight," cried and they were up to their necks in earth, "gripped one of the officers," they in dangerous places and must get rid of them."

Several of the glandulins immediately at the little girls and ordered them to go and follow the rest, and led them away to a small field, and just when the firing of general Johnston's army recommenced had burst them up to their necks in earth. The glandulins seemed to catch them to see them in their coming again, while as the sound of heavy firing increased, there came a swift clatter of horses hoofs and the glandulins turned instantly to face the new comers, and a few minutes a dusky horseman came galloping up too exhausted for a moment to speak. One of the glandulins he, helped him to dismount, and grasping him by the hand leaned forward to catch his words. The next minute he turned slightly pale turned a slightly pale face to the glandulins standing about Violet and her sisters.

"The Angelins!" his voice was hoarse and loud to hear. "John Angelins have attacked our center which is in danger of being carried. We will have to return." The glandulins then left, and allowed the victim girls freedom to battle with the dazzling heat of the sun and ground alone, and soon the wounding thirs tore through their veins like boiling liquid. Then came the long wall for water that kept up for an hour and the horrid protruding tongues, he attack in the meantime made mad men of the glandulins and during the struggle which was described thousands were killed. By the explosion of a shell close to her, Jennie was dug free, and she raced round for a charred water hole and found it dry. But at last she secured some water from some provision wagons, and not a drop of the precious water would she drink until her sisters had tasted of it first. And her sisters being freed actually struggled to make each other drink it first. The last thing Jennie did was to clasp the lock of her hair and press it to her swollen lips. An hour later they had left the burning sands of this field and they saw the fighting and saw the glandulins columns fighting the Angelins hand to hand. And fighting hard also to hold the purple coats at bay. As they were watching they observed a glandulin leader who was a captain and his regiment of men forced back step by step, and ambulances began to struggle by the hundred bearing the living toll of a horrible war.

A few minutes later new evidences of the horrors of war came within sight, and at last a large woodland in front of them was swarming with a retreating mass of graycoats pushing frantically southward toward Federal's main lines, then they saw more dense columns advancing to hold back the large force of Angelins, and make the Christians fight desperately for every line of works and pay a premium of blood for every advantage, and three divisions of Angelins within the sight of the little girls, had been decimated.

After wandering around for an hour they managed to reach an Angelin courier and they told him of general Johnston's orders and asked him to convey it to general Johnston before it was too late. He realized it was the best thing to do, and so back he went. It was not long after when the little girls reached the vicinity of the strong position where general Johnston had infiltrated his assistants and here they observed a great battle scene indeed. General Johnston had sent a large force to the right of the position with the help of general John Quincy Wilson's divisions of ninth corps, and Wilson had been supported by six dozen of field guns and sixty antitank guns. Here the victim girls had seen the enemy press into the breach and by the heavy fire from the numerous ascending one of the battalions of glandulins commander on the victim girls had seen had learned the tactics adopted by the glandulins and of the Angelins and as had before mentioned with the appearance, and their caution had seen them fight. The Angelins had not been able to hold their line of works and beyond Johnston and had caught the mouth of a small hill called a koppe by the Boers, and held it until the glandulins drove them down from it at the point of the bayonet. Then Angelins had fled to another point of vantage and for a time held the summit of a higher hill against hundreds of thousands of besiegers. The glandulins had then tried out the strength of a large party of Angelins occupying the hill by drawing the fire of the Christians through a constant firing ceased, but instead of charging however, the glandulins dropped at the critical moment, revealing the firing line of the Christians. If the fire would have been slight, the enemy would have fired bayonets and charged without delay, but the volley firing was heavy, and they advanced cautiously. This manner of maneuver had not been successful for the glandulins had not carried the hill at the very first on onset and this tactic was watched by the Angelins who moved themselves on a single promontory, while the infantry scattered in a great circle, while the cavalry was on a retreating slope out of sight, and ten hundred pieces of small artillery had been pushed, so as to take the enemy the instant they were forced into full retreat.

Though their glasses Violet and her sisters saw the glandulins forming in a long solid line that would take three sides of the hill and become denser as it ascended. They were at least aware of one of the Angelins. A large detachment was sent forward as usual to draw the fire and gauge the strength of the Angelins. There was but a scattered and weak response to this invitation, then the angle still came to fix bayonets, and the line began to advance in a determined double quick. Violet and her sisters saw this advance was going to turn into a terrible slaughter. The enemy seemed the hillside each man having for to escape the deadly fire that seemed sure to come and gripping firmly his gun which he had been accustomed to fire on as in the face of the Christian force, before plunging with the bayonets. There was not a sound however save the crushing of feet, and the jingle of scabbards. The glandulins were plainly nervous over the ghost lines of the Christian reception, and began to lose their confidence. But still they advanced until their leaders nearly crunched upon or trod upon the ground up Angelins. Then the Christian leaders gave the command to fire and retreat to the gully on the right. At the very instant of the deadly fire, the enemy was obliged to pause for a moment. All was confusion among the very line, which wavered, stunned.

In the propitious moment the entire force of Angelins placed on the hill as occurred as last as they could into a gully and then bore up a steep path that gave them a position of firing vantage on the enemy's unengaged flank. In the meantime general Joseph John and his Angelins saw the advancing column of glandulins the contents of their ugly carbines, and then drew their sabres and rode into the glandulins. There was little doubt that they would have killed had not the infantry began to pump a steady fire into the ranks of the supporting flank which was obliged to fall back, when they were most needed to push forward. Soon the entire force was fleeing down the hill side suffering great loss as they went. Half the way down the incline the cavalry turned back just as the glandulins cavalry was sent forward. The troopers came abreast of their ill-fated comrades just as the artillery boomed forth. The very guns had been trained on the exact spot where they were most needed. The lieutenant colonel in command of the glandulins had been severely wounded, and his place was now taken by a young major.

The enemy had been too sure and were intent on capturing the Angelins in this very onslaught that had been their undoing. As a stroke of fate the glandulins were reinforced by several divisions who began to advance with exasperating fury but slowly until unexpectedly they began to run forward up the hill again and discharge their rifles as they did so.

The Angelins cast all their desperation to the wind and began to fire blindly, and the besiegers would have won a complete victory then and there, had not the Angelins played their "Trump Card" well. Sixty miles had been planted in a line scarcely five hundred yards from the firing line, and in the moment of their exultation, it seemed as if the glandulins ranks were blown high into the air in a consuming cloud of smoke and earth. When the din of the terrific explosions had reverberated away among the hills, the Angelins were again pumping lead into a retreating foe. The young major was frantic. He beat the men with the back of his sabre, and dashed his sabre into their blind retreat. Finally after desperate efforts they were turned from their panic, and the glandulins stood their ground and stended their positions and firing in squads, while their own cannons began singing their songs of death. The Angelins then, were driven from one trench to another and at the very catastrophe one of their own big guns burst killing and wounding fourteen men within range, while the earthworks themselves were partly built up of bodies.

The sides of the hills were strewn with the bodies of the gray and purple together. General John Joseph Talbot had been wounded all right and left, his body blackened face being streaked crimson with blood. One of his whole lines was left in the trenches. The Angellians retreated up the precipitous sides of the hill and began pouring a terrific fire down upon the glandelinians who saw it was impossible for them to proceed any further or to endure the losses they were suffering, and gave up the attack along this point, when they were on the point to retreat at other points of the line. A major general glandelinian the enemy had been successful as written before and violet and her sisters arrived to that point in time to see the frightful carnage, and just at the time when the glandelinians began to move from every direction, in a general crash. General Bicknell had at this time thrown his entire right into an action against glandelinian left. Now the problem of Federal was how to cut off a portion of the Angellians but also to exterminate his left along from the main precarious position, this occurring at the time the assaulting line in gray ran into that do deadly infiltration. In other words the superior numbers of the Angellians were aiming to execute the same maneuver against the army of Federal, that the glandelinian army had been ordered to execute against the Angellians. The enemy continued to advance steadily but more cautiously. They now feared by the sudden disappearance of the Christians that these stone walls and wooden or boarded fences and rock piles, or lodges of rocks and tree barricades held the unseen Christian army. When once the shock, as all these Christian defenses became ablaze with the flame of a great inferno, columns after columns of glandelinians went down smothered and bleeding, but the survivors executed the Christians with the fury of avengers of damnation for several minutes these glandelinians carried everything before them from wall to fence, rocky lodges and tree barricades, but the main Christian divisions did not give way and having forced assaults opened a fearful inflicting fire with all their ranks, and the whole assaulting line all torn to pieces and mingled, with their dead wounded and dying lying in the long a longest wilderness at every trench, they started again started to retreat, but the others behind forced them on and on as they came yelling with a fury that would beat the shrieks and yells of the army of demons themselves. On once the glandelinians, laughing, yelling and shouting and even singing songs as they returned the fire, and Federal thinking by the blackening fire along the Christian line that they were giving way once ordered a retreat but all at once the remaining lines seemed undisturbed by clouds of flame there was a roar as if the whole world was blowing up and the whole gray line almost withered before this most in immediate fire. Then this really forced Christian position was a regular hornet hornet nest, but carry it they would at all costs. Hundreds of thousands had been moved down all along the whole gray line but the survivors did not give way but continued to press on yelling fire fiercely. Federal's horse had been ridden by bullets and hereafter two bullet wounds in the right shoulder and one in the foot. Yelling like a thrillion demons suddenly let loose and in cascade, the surviving glandelinians continued to press on more furiously and Federal noticing that he was wounded was in for winning now for keeps, and therefore retained his command despite it all and sent other officers to order his whole army forward. Some shattered Christian divisions retired to safer places among the barricades of trees and reformed while the whole purple line made preparations to meet the attack with redoubled fury which had now lasted fully fifteen minutes. The glandelinians who were continually pressing forward continued to receive the same merciless fire from all along the whole Christian line but the survivors continued on gallantly, and it was pitiful to see how many of the gray coats fell. Yet they continued on in seemingly endless numbers and the Christians in the first positions were compelled to fall back to those behind. General Bicknell however still retained many of his works and fought off all the attempts of the glandelinians to force them, and the conflict raged here with frightful fury. As fast as they surged forward long lines of glandelinians were mowed down by the awful Christian fire but countless numbers of the survivors rushed on over the works and though their line was again withered the rebels managed to drive glandelinians from all of his first line of stone walls and fences and kept up a continuous withering fire to beat the Christians back but Bicknell made some deadly destructive assaults in quick succession but failed to regain possession of the works. However glandelinians from a small hole in one of the walls saw indeed that the glandelinians were advancing with irresistible force but with great caution and observed that the nearest columns came within easy musket shot range of the second line of barricades and stone walls and fences, and therefore he leaped upon to the top of the stone wall and just as he cried "Fire boys" he pitched down into the works frightfully wounded and badly mangled. But his fall failed to confuse the Angellians. The second line of works were enveloped in the smoke as the Angellians poured in heavy and most destructive volleys, but as fast as the surges of rebels went to pieces more appeared, and the Christians finally gave way, the glandelinians finally surging over the wall.

"Don't retreat!" yelled glandelinian, but in vain.

Several regiments of the Christians tried to rally but met annihilation, and General Bicknell was forced to hurry off from the field, fearing that the enemy was continually rushing forward. The Angellians behind the remaining trenches kept the north stretching from the left flank of their murderous column, and yet no more numbers of the glandelinians fell, the more appeared, and the persistent and avenging Christian fire could not check these hundreds of thousands of the Christians who were already fleeing but the men in line still held out the whole column of the different positions flashed fire and smoke but the surviving divisions of glandelinians stormed these positions with dare devil recklessness and yet again went down like an execution, the tops of the works being covered with fallen purple coats. Every rank, and even columns and even divisions that had pressed over the works had been mowed down completely, officers and all and even fearful gaps were made in the whole of the whole line, which showed that there was no one who could be trifled with any of the glandelinians either under torn do Federal's command consisting of Quarles, Quarles Guards, Gargoylian Kurds, Ebermanns, Min-Hallentins and Gargoylian and Gargoylian and Gargoylian besides the other sections. Every column charging forward to retake the captured works only met with annihilation which proved that the gallant general Federal though in some ways no child butcher was in reality a human tornado, and that he of the glandelinians if he killed it was never without officers on both sides were falling by the score, and Bicknell strove with all his might to make the Angellians withstand the furious onslaught. Accompanied with himself assisted by the Christians and general glandelinian, and here the struggle was again very fearful. Yet everywhere general Federal was sweeping on completely victorious the Christian columns dissolved into dead and wounded and at times the glandelinians made such appalling counter charges that the Christians were compelled to give way. In the meantime Manley had tried once more to force back Hanson's railroad line which was pressing upon his Angellians having recaptured all the abandoned Christian cannon. Manley however saw a way out of the whole trouble, and this he accomplished by making a turning movement then ending the conflict along this line with a complete glandelinian victory. Bicknell with his frontal efforts managed to rally his foremost divisions and led them through a gap and though countless numbers fell in this battle the survivors rushed up to the works but the rebel over overwhelmed with excitement were so eager to meet the Christians as to meet some loved one, and cut down all the Angellians who survived over the battle. In influenced works. The center rallied also despite the awful loss and with frightful fury swept forward to regain the works the opposing forces again meeting with a roar of yells and again glandelinians with his forces rushed and crashed was compelled to fall back, and though severely wounded twice had a narrow escape from being killed by bullets from the first fire of the yelling horde as they poured over the captured works once more to make a counter charge. But the center did not even reach the glandelinian works. For three hours they had stormed the Christian positions, or what was once the Christian works but we saw only masonry, and now glandelinians were badly demoralized by the heavy fire of artillery and musketry the enemy turned upon them, but accountants though he made the demonstration did not charge then after all as glandelinians columns formed into a triangle and fallback slowly but pouring a perfect hurricane of bullets upon the glandelinians who were following slowly and with fierce pandemonium of yells and wailed blasphemies. From the main Christian batteries which had retreated to a new position a perfect rain of missiles was poured upon the glandelinians following glandelinians, but his lines crashed twice was worse off than the artillery men, and again had taken post behind a line of stone and wooden fences unscathed by the enemy through the thick curtain of smoke, but he was to be forced from this position also for Federal showed himself to be a man not to be beaten. He pressed the rebels. Then all of a sudden a mighty sheet of flame quivering back and forth seemed to sweep the whole Christian line, and again the whole rebel front withered before that merciless fire which made a crashing roar that seemed to shake the earth, and the survivors drew back in a panic, the main divisions behind hesitating at the sight of this horrible slaughter. But their leaders ordered them forward and confident that they could carry the new line of works, they rushed on, and reached them but again the whole gray line withered before the same terrific Christian fire and recoiled dismayed, and forelorn over it all. Federal now thought that if he threw his whole center on the Christian center he could inspire his right wing, and this was accomplished forward. The frontal divisions were confused however by a severe fire that raked their lines like a comb would a man hair and broke and fell back their leader general Bicknell being killed by a bursting shell as he vainly strove to check their retreat. Bicknell now seeing that the glandelinian divisions were in a demoralized condition made a fierce counter charge with six million men driving the shattered and tangled gray lines back with frightful force but encountered an annihilating fire from Federal's main cannon the glandelinian general himself striving with all his might to rally his panic stricken soldiers.

But as the Angolins pressed on and yolk-like legions of angels, Federal main divisions also recoiled but unfortunately also million hooded in a gray uniform all gladderlinas G. Gorgolins Scoollers charged in one tremendous line and over-lapped Bicknell's whole flank, the Angolins being driven into a demoralized condition with the deaths of generals Illinois Quay, Clara Bicknell, Johnson, Thomas Colan, and Frank Association, while general Bawrie Hamilton, Henryson John was wounded with general Bawrie Hamilton, Benedict Aro-alina, Langlafoto and Caline Glesamington. This gave Federal a good opportunity to rally his center and at the same time he sent for reserves. As he saw the christian lines again give way he strove desperately to rally his divisions which had been first driven into a panic and who were mixed up in a pandemonium of conglomerate confusion. Bicknell's artillery was pouring volleys upon the flankers who were shrieking like fiends, but the fresh divisions of gladderlinas now arrived to Federal's assistance, and Bicknell's army was again driven back to its own last position. Federal's divisions were now rallied and the fresh divisions under general Physician moved on against the christians, while Federal's rallied divisions forward upon his left wing again engaged in annihilating the christian right, the battle again resuming. Also another of Federal's divisions had been rallied and they were marching against gladderlinas' red line and pushed against the works bare, and now the slaughter became more terrific than the whole battle before. Thicker than grass cut down from a whole field lay the gladderlinas dead wounded and dying, while on the other side heaps of dead, wounded and dying christians lay. General James Bonilligan Counterattacked and several divisions were moved down and they themselves killed and all their staff officers were either killed wounded or without horses. General Bicknell and gladderlinas had thirteen horses shot under them, and nine of Bicknell's staff had been killed being generals Pe Fred Marshall, Frederick Garsonia, Randonia Marshall, Rodney Sebenia, L. O. Konlish Haxton, Klondike Francis, Chinia Hinda, Laonia gladderlinas, and standard Steanna. Thirty were wounded being as follows: General Colonel was mortally wounded, Orleans Jack, another and Cathadreullie was the last, the others plainly wounded were Henry Guelio, George Gabriel, James Abraham, Belsa se Turner, Ephraim, C. A. Charles Flanders, Perperus, Felicity, Henryson, Patrick Archangolins, Benedict Dunn, Sweden-ginder, Isturina, Ladger, Bawwacene, John Captistram, Little Hittlin, Valerius, Francis Paulia, Richard Chel vester, Isidore Bawwacene, Herman Joseph, Benedict his brother, Good Example, Vigilance, Innocence, and Anicetus.

Federal was dismayed when he saw how the Angolins repelled every assault. In vain he ordered his officers to move forward to the attack again but the generals thought it useless as Bicknell's Angolins were swarming forward to follow up the retreating columns. On pressed the furious Angolins, and as Federal sent his reserves to repel them they found an open plain fairly alive with the purple coats who were yelling like infuriated cannibals as they advanced, and acted very much like human men. On through the shell-wrecked plain swept the Angolins despite the mud fire that galled their whole front. Ad fortune would have it Federal managed to have four thousand cannon trained upon the advancing columns these opening a fearful drum drum fire upon the christians but a number became so hot from frequent use that they blew to pieces. Simultaneously the whole gray line opened a withering fire mowing the Angolins down by scores of columns, and a part of the main line drew back in confusion but the rest continued on the survivors swarming over the works, but before this Federal had ordered up three million battalions and these arrived just at the right moment and poured in a fire that nothing human could withstand, and back went what was left of the purple columns few pieces indeed, but some of the Angolins brigades though receiving the full force of the gladderlinas' fire stood fast, but they met annihilation just like the big fools they were. Horrified at the terrific havoc in their lines the main column withdrew but in order. Again the gray line swept on this time with irresistible force, the Angolins fools retiring to their own works and the brave and gallant gladderlinas charged up after them in fearful numbers and successfully poured over the works over every everywhere and mingled like furious demons among the Angolins destroying and being destroyed, the whole christian line being crushed to fragments and bended into various shapes by the pressure of the impact, the rebels struggling fiercely, using bayonets, sabres and even throwing rocks and stones.

General gladderlinas sent more men to Bicknell's aid however but it was of no avail, and he was severely wounded the christian line being doubled backwards once more despite the reinforcements and driven back over the works. With the fury of demons gladderlinas men made furious attempts to retake their works and press the enemy back against the gladderlinas' pressure increased and increased, and after both opposing forces surged back and forth nine times amid terrific slaughter a goodly part of gladderlinas men was overlapped and forced to give way in confusion, while at the same time the captured christian guns were swarmed swung round, and moved down the battle along this point was at white heat though hearing its final conclusion.

Millions of the Angolins made the fiercest attack now of the battle but the gladderlinas stuck to their positions like titans and fought off all the attempts of the christians to carry the works as the foolish Angolins seemed bound to retake what they would never get back again, the assault being kept up with merciless fury but every time their columns met annihilation. The attack was the fiercest along the center, as the chief object of the Angolins was to recapture the line of artillery which raked their biggest columns to pieces, so toward the cannon they swarmed in fearful numbers, but they could not get any nearer than before. Bicknell then opened a fierce onset with his main center but his whole line encountered a fire which crushed it to atoms. But on toward the rebel lines rushed the survivors. It was a massacre not a battle now. All the gathering guns were trained upon the Angolins and sent columns of christians millions strong to flying fragments and again forced the rest to recoil in horror. Yet on continued the surviving columns the guns were also trained upon them and a tr tempest of grape and canister added to the shellfire of five thousand cannon, several other columns millions strong were broken into fragments, and melted away, and the survivors of the other columns began to fall back but dropped like stacks of corn, and the surviving lines that followed met the same dazzling sheet of flame and horror which again melted away two whole columns equally as strong, and the survivors swarmed over the works but were crushed. It was madness.

The whole rebel line seemed to be on fire their whole length as Bicknell and Vivian massed six million six hundred thousand of the remainder of the forces and threw the threatening phalanx forward toward the rebellines, and again down went thousands of ranks, squadron after squadron of the most immense cavalry forces swinging upon Federal's flank were annihilated, but still the christian kept up the attack and swarmed up to the works, when again and again the whole rebel line was split by sheets of flame and time and again the long christian line withered before the tempest of bullets which shrieked like a thousand furies, the survivors finally not able to stand it any more gave way, the gladderlinas counter charged, and crushed and tore all before them. The battle of four days duration ended. The christians had been each succeeding day of the battle been driven ten miles back from their works, had rallied each day behind new positions and fought doggedly until they finally had lost over four hundred miles of ground and suffered over twenty thirty seven million men in killed and forty in wounded during the whole battle out of one hundred million men. The rebel loss was in total fifty three million two hundred thousand. It was one of the most glorious gladderlinas victories ever known yet, gladderlinas having been totally beaten because he had received no supports whatever and therefore could hold no ground at any point. Outside of Jennie Vivian or Sunbeam creek it was the second bloodiest battle of the war. The rebel loss in killed and wounded outside of those being made prisoners was 44,555,636.

At other sections of the war stricken country of Calverinia other vast armies of glandelinians and angelinians and so on were confronting each other. Near the large town of Jennings the glandelinians had been hard at work in making and placing an immense mine with the intention of blowing up the whole village and havoc the christianian line that was close to it. It was the intention of the glandelinian commander general picknell to stop the christianian tide of advance at this section of the theatre of war at all costs, and not to stop at anything no matter what it be. Not to stop even for any number of plengiglamenean creatures that happened to be in the location. When the work had been well under way for several weeks, and the two immense opposing armies under picknell, (glandelinian and the christians under general jimmie vivian, a number of christianian scouts had discovered the work and seeing that the actions of the foe was very suspicious had went a little nearer and discovered at once the very intention of the work. They saw that the enemy were digging a large tunnel under the village of Jennings, and that carloads were pulled up to the region by steam engines filled with all kinds of explosives, many of which had already been placed in the further end of the tunnel. To stop the enemy from doing this work was utterly too late, for it would precipitate a gigantic battle out of place in this location, and probably involve more loss of lives than was wished for. So they decided to warn general vivian of the work and intentions of general picknell. Melodonia Dion picknell and have the endangered christianian forces withdrawn before it was too late. They scoured in every direction to see who could be the first ones to reach the christianian lines and so give the warning. The first comers were hardly there when the others came and jimmie vivian got the news about a score of miles before he had time enough to think of action.

The town had been deserted at the approach of the enemy and so jimmie vivian decided to play the game himself. It was his purpose to not stop the enemy but to withdraw his army from the region, pretend to start a battle which would draw a considerable part of picknell's army forward, and then he would open fire on the town with his batteries and so cause the explosion himself and hurl all those glandelinians to eternity.

So the next day undercover a of a forest fire which he himself made the angelinians who had been in the town and close to it quickly withdrew, and the next day after they had all withdrawn, jimmie vivian made diversions toward general picknell's center which made the glandelinian general suspicious, and so the trick immediately worked as jimmie vivian expected only more. Picknell had operations on the mine stopped, and a large force of glandelinians was sent to stop the christianian concentration toward his very seriously handicapped center.

The movement however was greater than jimmie vivian expected, and resulted in a frightful onslaught which lasted four hours, but nevertheless the foe was repulsed and driven back toward the town while jimmie vivian opened with all his batteries a dreadful artillery fire and the crashing din of shell explosions tore the region to pieces, shattered the woods, like a series of tornadoes, and destroyed all nature as it seemed. The ammunition coaches of the enemy was blown up, and then the fires started by the bombardment effected the materials made for the mine, and within another moment it seemed as if a gigantic volcanic eruption had broken out in the town, and the wreckage of houses was scattered for miles. The explosion was so terrific that the heavens had seemed seared with a sheet of flames for miles, and the cloud of smoke extended to a height of over fifteen thousand feet. The whole town had been blown to atoms and all the glandelinians retreating through it, or around had been completely annihilated. It was a terrible disaster to the enemy, and not a all but all their artillery had been silenced by the drum-drum fire of christianian artillery which rolled like a million drums for three days with an unceasing roar heard for one thousand miles, and finally the enemy horrified at the horrible explosion, and of their own losses in this terrific battle, and of the slaughter of twenty eight generals finally retreated in confusion, leaving jimmie vivian to do as he pleased with the whole country in his possession.

Indeed the whole Abyscandian country, nay the whole world was startled, and shocked over the news of this frightful disaster to the enemy and saw that general jimmie vivian General Robert vivian's son was a fierce Angelinian commander, and that it was dangerous for any other kind of glandelinian general to step in his way or to dare any trick in opposition to him. jimmie vivian followed the enemy closely and did all in his power to overtake picknell, burning down every bridge in his advance, sacking villages formerly in possession of the enemy and laying waste to everything but picknell picknell by maneuvers and threatening more serious engagements managed to elude his wild pursuer and for a time jimmie vivian was forced to remain inactive.....

In the Eastern part part of Calverinia a dreadful destructive storm of war and devastation occurred the havoc about thirteen great Calverinian cities within a space of less than two weeks, a destruction and storm of death and slaughter that was unparalleled in the history of any eastern theatre of the great war and nearly next to that of the Glorinda disaster that soon followed, and a property loss even exceeding that of the great Catherine Decie, and Madge Evans-Jennie Turner disaster, which traveled with a terrific tornado of devastation caused by invading glandelinians who carried all before them, mowing a wide and most grievous path through the whole region despite daily opposition. The storm of war at this location had threatened with these disasters but nevertheless came without warning for after the series of battles in the west in which the enemy had been so constantly victorious, their victories had in the twinkling of an eye developed into a driving hurricane storm of fires set by the enemy, batteries storming retreating christianian armies, and abandoned towns and cities, and followed by a devastating monster of annihilation. Hundreds of thousands of dead were carried to morgues by the retreating hosts, wounded moaned and screamed from blazing wreckage and the yellow skies glowed with the scarmin reflection of hundreds of burning towns, and it was recalled that glandelinia glandelinia was a monster in the most shocking form, worse than the worse dragons of destruction ever written. The extensive battles and disasters which had raged before at this location unknown to all at first had prevailed as told before over the whole of eastern Calverinia during the whole season with glandelinian victories, and after several giant battles had raged during the Kintergarden massacres a more gigantic battle had occurred as previously written in long detail, as a manifestation of the fury of the glandelinian soldiery. The series of armies of glandelinian demons came careering over all the regions from place to place driving all before them finally crossing the Mc-Sterner river in this location and wrecking their increased fury on the town of Council Bluffs and tearing down twenty eight long bridges on the Calverinian Central rail railroad lines. In their wake the glandelinians left a death list of their own losses during the past battles too high to be retold, having killed over 115,000 men belonging to christianian farmers and cowboys, and wrecked nearly two hundred towns, devastated two thousand ranches, with a total loss of $8,997,655 in the whole region within a weeks time.

Before and after blazing their horrid trails through eastern Calverinia the roaring armies of human fiends reaped series of harvests of lives and property in the outlying states of Eastern Calverinia, but it was in the northern part of Eastern Calverinia that their awful power was felt more keenly before large Abyscandian and Abyscandian armies finally poured like a torrent from the north and checked them. The huge fashionable cities and larger towns of West parnas State suffered alike with the simple villages and towns of St Annus States, and the substantial towns of Bendis Park State, and the northern state of Omburrian. Great industries saw their buildings collapse before explosions like cardboard creations of children, all traffic companies, railroads and so on saw their systems tied up completely for the whole time of the enemies invasion with the ruin of tracks and lines and bridges, all fire and police departments were made to complete humiliating helplessness, and all the Abyscandian troops and the Danobian National guard called into service in this most incomprehensible disaster found themselves all too few.

Large armies of Abyscandians followed the path of the storm of devastation to the state of Leavenworth, and had tried to strike upon the rear of the ravaging glandelinian armies but no sooner had they done so when the struggles that ensued developed into a dreadful series of massacres. The first idea of the damage that had been done came with the dull carbon spots of fire which broke out in the wreckage of towns one after another all over the horis horizon along the wake.

During the bloody battle of Poppleston a general of the christians his face streaming with blood, his horse having been annihilated came galloping down the pike astride a badly winded horse which was unsaddled. He stopped at the ungaged christianian forces at Concordia and ordered them to advance and stop the enemy at all cost. Over the turmoil of the rain of exploding shells, musketry, and cannon firing came the echoes of the half crazed demon yell of the glandelinians. Another christianian general giving hysterical commands was wounded in the dreadful carnage in which thousands of men fell every second and was compelled to drag himself into his headquarters a few minutes later and merely point through the driving hell storm of battle to a glow which was spelling ruin and defeat for the christianian army. He was the only main commander not seriously wounded and had lost everything of his troops all having been annihilated by the enemies fire.

He could not say how he escaped the enemy's fire himself. During the battle general Krieders headquarters were shelled and the general and his staff were veritably blown out of it and all fatally wounded by the fragments of the dreadful shell hurricane. A long path of devastation telegraph and telephone poles along the railroad lines were down, and the complete network of wires and burning debris made retreat for defeated christian armies almost impossible in these local locations. Town after town had burst into flames, and twenty minutes after the first wave of disaster had passed any one could have counted easily seventeen different towns afire beside the complete conflagration of forests and grassy plains, and of great floods let loose with the bursting of great dams by the glandelinians.

Shrieks and cries and moans came from every direction from the wounded soldiers belonging to the Angoli in Angolinian army under Sanders who lay strewn in every direction along the Calverinian Abbeisania, and Angolinian railroad lines, to the devastated town of Leavenworth the result of the battle of Poppleton, but rescue work was almost impossible. Hysterical men were responsible for much of this awful clamor, and seemed to be unable to tell what they wished done or to express the slightest desire for aid. All stations and towns not ruined by the foe had been turned into emergency relief stations, and were crowded with hundreds of thousands of wounded. The army doctors applied such first aid as they could supply and efforts were made to secure relief trains from the railroads but the fact that all lines had been paralyzed made this impossible.

All the army ambulances even could not reach this badly smitten districts because of the fallen poles and network of wires, and many of the wounded had to be abandoned when the enemy drew too near.

Between the town of Poppleton and Leavenworth there was long streams of the big chest trees in eastern Calverinia, and here during that terrific conflict had been crushed a half a dozen breastworks pounded to earth by shell fire, and the wreck of these two towns was so complete that it looked as if a gigantic tornado had razed them repeatedly for several several days, and the fires of many towns which burned night and day after the battle seemed from a distance like a sort of magnificent decorative scene made by the glandelinians themselves. The flames of these towns had ate rapidly into the forests themselves which burned for several weeks. In the wreckage of these towns every article of every house was exposed to view. Thousands of splinters torn from sides of houses had been driven into trees and the ground, and into the sides of freight cars standing on sidings by the force of explosions and so compactly that the strongest man could not remove them. All this section of the country where the battle had raged was almost completely ruined and wrecked by the seething storm of war.

What few towns and large villages had not been smashed by the human twister of war were burned by the long series of fires which ensued. Many hundreds of thousands were killed in this small battle. General L. F. Stovorton commander of a large army of Abyssinikilians had been at general's conference at Western Calverinia during this long wintergarden horror, and he returned to the region to find that his army had completely disappeared, and all the army provisions and ammunition in the hands of the foe. The army was later found north of Hayden almost scattered, dejected, discouraged, and disconcerted, although it had been forced to retreat without fighting a single engagement having been utterly demoralized without their head commander and so had refused to stand before the advance of the foe. A similar occurrence happened elsewhere. General C. E. Walsh was advancing his army north of Hayden when struck on the flank by a large force of the glandelinians under general Reiter. His three wings were rolled and driven back, and forced to retreat for nearly three score of miles without hardly offering a single slight engagement the flank having been panic stricken at the first appearance of the enemy and having fled before they fired a single shot. The general found his army twenty eight miles north of the town of Lander thirty nine miles west of Ward Hayden. He managed to rally it and then resumed a more orderly retreat. At a small battle occurring at Habberry general John Hanson of the glandelinian was killed in the wreck of his headquarters and the body of his aiding chief George Handon was found in the burned ruins. In this conflict the foe were overthrown and scattered by an overwhelming force of christians with untold losses in men and provisions.

At the same battle general John Fredrickson on the foe's side with his own chief aiding general and three others were buried in their own headquarters on the glandelinian right wing when the shell fire blew up creating around it. General Irwin a three ser year service general was badly hurt, but the main commander was taken from the mass of splinters unhurt.

At Forty Eight Junction and McHollister Sendonin the battle was still more particularly violent and the damage very severe. Twelve divisions of glandelinians were totally destroyed, with all the houses and barns barracks in which they used as fortresses, first wrecked by the christian shell and gun fire, and then consumed with most of their contents by fires started by the explosives. Eight regiments in general flood headquarters yards were killed annihilated outright, and a score of other regiments injured and disabled more or less seriously. The christian storming attacked missed the other section of the glandelinian position but the artillery of the christians blew the headquarters of the two glandelinian generals to kingdom. Kingdon came, and annihilated all the defenders in this location. Eight horses in one of the blast blasted barns near the destroyed headquarters were rescued from the debris by the victorious christians with much difficulty. Two large chimneys on the third headquarters were toppled over by the concussion of a shell exploding in the air three hundred feet above the house and crashed through the roof of the structure. At another portion a train of coaches with the engine which a glandelinian engineer tried to run out of the shell swept region was turned over by the concussion. When the engineer saw the air full of bursting shells, and saw the tornado of advancing christians coming a tearing to assault the glandelinian position just directly in his own way he tried to run it into a cut across another railroad line but a number of shells struck the train however before he could do so, and he was painfully wounded by the flying fragments, and debris. Thousands of soldiers were killed or wounded on this train when they fought furiously and refused to surrender when the train was surrounded by the christians. General Charles Clavier was directing a portion of his lines when a perfect wave of christian soldiers struck his lines, and his army was as badly as a house blown down about his ears when the christians poured over the works with fixed bayonets, and though he escaped with bad bruises, all his under officers were killed, and his army scattered to the four winds. The other glandelinian divisions which were not hardly touched by the christians did all in their power to relieve those attacked but the work of advance was so slow because of the absence of all telephonic communication, and on account of wreckage they themselves had caused in their destructive advance.

As far as can be ascertained the Wintergarden massacre as this is called started its career of horror and damnation somewhere in the state of Casey in the city of Catherine Decle, after the glandelinians under Federal and Turnerline had been sniped upon by citizens and slaughtered by the withering fire for three days when pursued by enraged citizens and soldiers. The glandelinians massacred hundreds of towns of people after this wiping out the large town of Gertrude Nathan and then striking through the state of Waterloo, and Halston. At first the six-six course of the glandelinian advance was so baffling that the people were terrorized beyond beyond describing, and many towns in a few weeks since the Catherine Decle trouble reported losses which indicated that the main glandelinian army had constantly divided smaller smaller but strong armies which acted and added as flankers with the deadly intention of making a clean sweep over all the outlying tort torrit ories in their path. The great city of Protna was captured and sacked by the enemy after the christian forces there had fallen back without without offering resistance, and also the city of Union McHollister and Gerlin pondia felt the effects of the enemy's invasion, but the chief disaster lay in the path of the bigger glandelinian armies under the chief commanders which razed every town and forest and every village they could in their headlong advance.

The eastern boundary of this great death strown course at this state seemed to be the section where the town of Podge stood where there were many poor farms and orphan asylums. Although this section with the town and all its inmates was happily spared on account of the resistance of christian armies for three months, all of the other smaller towns and outvillages of various sorts in the near location was swept clean by the glandelinian ravagers who applied the torch to everything, and massacred all the women and children they found. General Melfort who had his large Angolinian army stationed near the Turner Run river saw this work of devastation in progress and tried to stop it but could not though he engaged the enemy in scores of desperate battles and skirmishes of small size and duration. The western boundary of devastation lay along the Angolinian and Abyssinikilian central railroad lines: until the State of St Peters was reached when the glandelinian armies seemed to stop in their advance to the northeast, stopping the christian army back from Farmer Run after a three days battle and scattering scattering it. This battle extended for five miles and in the towns in this vicinity nothing but ruin was left within their confines. The river called Forty First Hundred, and another called Thirty Eight Hundred seemed the point of demarkation.

But another army of glandelinians was detached from the main one in going over this region and swept the farms for several miles with destruction down the drive along the Evangeline St. Clare line toward the town of Walnut. Luckily there were few towns along this path but but comparatively small damage was done, the little army reuniting with the main one before the densely populated town of Walnut was reached. The train of the devastation struck the town of Farmington about fourteenth miles and ran northeast through the Benda State districts just east of the Peop Farm and town there which on account of the resistance of the christians there was untouched.

The big railway yards was the first total wreck with debris of turned and broken coaches and freight cars, all derailed and tracks torn up and buildings and freight stations in ruins and still smoking. West of this region few towns were touched and as far as the neighborhood of St. Cecilia which was practically untouched by the enemy fine towns were wrecked by the enemy further around including Samers, Barnes, and LaLaughe. Along the thirty ninth branch of the Mc-Holleston river there was stream trees which had been cut down, the region was full of wrecked houses and towns, from the city of Farmington to the city of Joslyns, all the buildings which had stones knocked out, all the windows wrecked, roofs off and other buildings badly wrecked. The town of Saunders had a grand lot of houses and buildings which were annihilated and the wreck was terrible. The wooden town of Baxter, though the village of yards close by escaped unscathed, were piles of kindling. Houses were even cut in two as if struck by a tornado with beds exposed in the upper stories and debris dumped high in the streets.

The trail of the glandelinian storm of devastation crossed Cumming river, and while the town of Gertrude was not touched the town two miles east of it called Ashton was razed to the ground. Line 1, Lincolnia was struck by the foe, Presher was devastated and in this region there was a total wreck of towns clear out of the whole state district. On Hawthorne Run the glandelinians sacked the town of Case, knocking out all the windows of the main public buildings, and devastating the main expensive capitol and the headquarters of the committee, but the fury of the glandelinian devastation leveled the towns north of this region especially the city of Irgyle where much damage was done. Lafayette Run was untouched the glandelinian hordes following the valley. Then the hordes moved to the straight north. Advancing almost directly northward along the Mc-Whirther Run river where towns stood which had as known galvanine best property the glandelinians despoiled the christians there without much fighting and left that beautiful section an awe-inspiring conglomeration of wreckage and dead bodies. At this point the path of destruction was two hundred miles wide, and proceeded directly northward to the town of Burdette, where many lives were lost in a battle there.

In crossing Sherman the path of destruction extended from the state of Binney on the west of Eastern Calvernia, to Emmet on the northeast a long stretch indeed and so scarce scarcely anything was left intact. Striking over the whole region like serious storm of tornadoes the glandelinians in seeking the town of Carter devastated a large roundhouse, and wrecked their fury on all the rolling stock, destroyed towns and cottages along the shores of Lake Fannie obliterated all the railroad lines and tree trestles and scores of railway stations and trains of cars on sidings of all these towns and villages. At this point the width of devastation was said to have been nearly half a thousand miles long. Crossing the river the glandelinians struck the town of Pluffs and set it afire and then one army seemed to turn southward, and that this being the case was evident from the damage done in the city of Violette which reports that the glandelinians came from the north. At the same time another glandelinian army was crossing the river in St. John's State hitting up the Mosquito Run through the region of Lake Saunders and scattering small christian armies and armies thereabouts. Another glandelinian army was noted advancing on toward Manawarner but was checked before it had any chance to commit any destruction.....

When the belated news of the disaster in eastern Calvernia reached general Hanson and Vivian larger christian armies drawn from those inactive in Angolinia were immediately rushed to the stricken region but for many months they could not do much and were almost annihilated before the battle of Randall and others finally turned the tide and drove the foe back the way they came. Fighting for the ending of child slavery the Angolinians had received a terrific blow in the devastation of Calvernia but it made it harder for glandelinia in the end.

During this great winter garden, massacre there were some marvelous explosions that would make greater history than the great war in Europe. General Charles Gomer occupied his headquarters near the town of a power which all the efforts of the enemy to take only met disaster upon disaster. Horror upon horror a thousand fold. On the Sunday afternoon of a severe threat of fighting upon returning from a scouting tour with his staff officers and men also their horses were left standing on the north side of the landscape house and mansion. The general hearing that spies had been in his house while he was away had went down into the cellar to look for them with some of his men with guns drawn when the whole house was blown away by an ear-splitting explosion of some mysterious cause and a heavy grating wagon belonging to the christian lines from an army construction camp nearly a block away was hurled with many others through the air by another explosion and one of them landed in the cellar within a few feet of the corner in which general Gomer had crouched in expectation of something new to happen. His horse, and those of the others had been blown to atoms, and several cannons which had been placed in position near by were comfortably lodged in the cellar of another headquarters of the general and with the exception of one wheel apparently none the worse for the freakish move. The army grading camp of general W.G. Gonderia had been blown entirely away by the force of the other explosion, and grading machinery and wagons had been shattered to fragments and scattered about adjacent to territory. One officer was killed, one fatally injured, and two more were seriously injured. There were about twenty generals inspecting the camp at the time. Fifty five miles and twenty six horses were killed, but seventy other horses in the camp were unhurt. The explosion hung general Gomer's horse and carriage in a high tree whose branches had been shattered by the concussion, and it was some time before both could be freed.

7-126A

Immediately after the enemy in this location had been quickly checked and before half of the invaded country was even aware of the fact that a tornado of ruin had visited the eastern part, three armies of the Angolinian army signal corps from port stern under the command of general Harbarn Johnson were called to help keep the enemy back and hold them at bay until further reinforcements could be brought to drive them off altogether. Even local forest fire fighters, police and firemen of all kinds and other armies with reserves of all branches was also called to the scene of the overwhelming disaster besides Red Cross nurses and physicians and doctors. Telegraph and telephone services being prostrated for scores of hundreds of miles, and train service also being paralyzed, the first news of the disaster and catastrophes to the outside country of Angolinia and Abbeinnia was rushed by H.J. Porter a newspaper correspondent reporter at Abbeinnia from the wireless station at Fort Stanley to Port Palmer, where the news was telegraphed all over the world besides Angolinia, Abyssinika, and Abbeinnia. When shortly after midnight on a Sunday night after some communication was established with the city of Randall, governor general Morehead Hanson called out more militia in protecting other persons and property of the unfortunate in the bolt of the war storm, and came to Randall in person on a Special train which took the only railroad still open and not destroyed by the enemy. Military aid and force was established over the entire wide eastern section of Calvernia. Under the direction of major general Daniels the war storm a zone of eastern Calvernia was divided into seventy relief districts, the work of directly supervising the work of aiding the millions of sufferers being placed under the responsible commanders of various christian armies who were not then needed to watch the movements of the foe armies. All kinds of headquarters of relief committees in charge of active work were established where contributions of immense sums of money, clothing, provisions, groceries, furniture, medicines, bandages, and offers to house the victims of the war bitter thrall were received. Millions of coats and blankets were sent to all sections by a auto, where general in Chief F.G. Stritz of the Abyssinika armies who aided at Jennie Turner after the disaster there, was in charge, and immense throngs of people sleep in the open nightly. Cooking stoves were erected at many places, and immense supplies of all necessities were provided, so that the gigantic multitudes of the war victims might be fed and sheltered in the days and nights of the severe weather which followed the war storm. Thousands of women taken there in hardly enough clothing to look or be respectable went to provided homes with arms laden with underwear and bedding, not only for themselves, but for unfortunate neighbors who were not even able to make the trip to the supply stations which were established in each one of the relief stations or districts.

The Abbeinnian authorities gave out a statement regarding loss of life and damage to property in the war tornado in the Eastern section of Calvernia.

This was done in order to ally the apprehension among relatives and friends of the remaining citizens of Eastern Calverinia and to put before the world the actual facts, to take the place of the first meager reports that went out through various chum channels. The statement by the Abbeismian committee was as follows:

"The enemy in raging their tornado of devastation in eastern Calverinia passed their arms through nearly all sections of that region of the country traversing the wealthier section as well as those occupied by those in comfortable circumstances, and the poorer classes. The path of the devastation caused by the enemy before they were checked by final efforts of the reinforcements was of a width averaging a quarter of a thousand miles wide, and five or six thousand miles long. Fire broke out in the wreckage of scores of towns and in spite of the difficulties confronting the christian armies who opposed the furious invaders especially in striking from one blow to scores, all of the glandelinian invaders were ousted from the northern section within a few months. All injured and homeless persons were taken from the ruins and attended to immediately. The number of injured citizens is considered as 1,332,456. Those killed number 139,899. Those have all been taken from the ruins with the possible exception of nine others who are missing and have been attended to. This includes the western part of Eastern Calverinia as well as Calverinia proper. Immediately following the disaster under the direction of Major general Hanson yivian the chief commander of all the christian armies operating against the warring glandelinian nation and operating through the police and fire departments of various cities and towns assistance was given wherever needed, and larger armies sent to stop the ravaging advance of the glandelinian mobs of hell. Before any disorder or any looting could be attempted by any other glandelinian arm the federal troops from Angolinia Agat in under general We Wianston were in charge of the situation which was completely under control before daybreak on the last day of the scene of horror. Adjutant general Phili Jorder arrived with his army and took charge of the local militia who patrolled the southern portions of the devastated country, while regular armies covered the northern northern half. General Moorhead Hansonia also had arrived in the region with his armies and reported back to the state legislature of Angolinia in session that the situation was admirably handled and that generals yivian and others besides Nero and Hansonia and so on had clashed with the enemy in a succession of terrible battles in which the foe were slaughtered frightfully and driven back in endless numbers of disastrous defeats. One was the bloody battle of McWhirther run. The whole situation is now under perfect control. The census shows a total of 1663 towns and villages damaged of which 645 were totally destroyed, besides the wrecking of many cities making scores of millions of people homeless. Those have been either quartered in the fortified sections of Abyssinkile or Angolinia and are being taken care of. It is stated that the property loss would exceed over eighty million of dollars."

Thus in this section of the war the long storm of wars devastation called the great Kintergarden massacre was the worse situation at the present time that ever effected the whole of Calverinia. This was caused by the sniping of the inhabitants in the small city of Catherine peeds, which could have been easily prevented if those foolish act had not been committed as so many of the better glandelinian commanders were so strongly opposed to it that they could have won their say by media meditations with the other commanders. But when the sniping was committed then nothing could restrain not only the wicked commanders but their men themselves.

The main thing that broke up the great horror was the christian victory at the frightful battle of Randall. During the time that general yivian had been checking the enemy in the east that great christian general as reported had the most trying time of his life while out scouting with several of his officers. He and his soldiers were attacked by a squadron of glandelinian cavalry. Five of the glandelinian horsemen were brought down during the swift chase and sixteen were wounded. One of the wounded glandelinians who was a huge fellow and after he had been shot through the back yet seemed to retain all his vigor and flew onto the general who happily finished him with a good aimed pistol shot.

THE TOLL OF THE KINTERGARDEN MASSACRE IN EASTERN CALVERINIA.
THE TERRIBLE TALE OF CALVERINIA'S FIRST WORSE DISASTER.
EASTERN PART OF NATION AND EUROPE.

	INJURED?	PROPERTY LOSS
PANDORA.....?	48,000,000.
BLUFFS COUNCILTON.....	!! DEAD AND INJURED TWO,000	PROPERTY LOSS EC
RALSTONIA.

Other cities were not given for the reason that the Calverinian nation did not wish the world to know as yet the full extent of the frightful disaster.

One of the most tremendous disasters that have probably ever happened in the war happened at the town of Spencer. Here was engaged a large christian army under general J.B. Hillins Jennings. The glandelinian army was under general germania yivian. The christian army was ten to one of the enemy, and yet despite all efforts Bryan could not get this wily and clever glandelinian general to meet in an actual battle though skirmishes and duels with artillery were occasionally severe between hammers and retreats. The glandelinian army were all mostly made up of the fierce hooded Omarians and Gargolians Germanians fiercest fighters in the national guards of glandelinia.

After having tried to force general germania yivian into an engagement without avail general William Bryan decided to outwile him by a trick. If he had only known the true nature of germania yivian he would have been utterly careful. This great glandelinian general knew all the tricks that would be attempted upon his glandelinian army, and so when his spies learned of the christian intention they reported it to their generals who conveyed the news to general germania yivian. Germania had fallen back south of Spencer after destroying all the depots and railroad line, and devastating the woods and farms in the immediate vicinity. He decided to bag the christian general in his own game and so placed all his artillery in the region of the shattered wood making a long line of guns extending for nearly thirty miles. This he knew would make a formidable appearance but nevertheless he also knew that this or all the display of all his infantry could not daunt the christian generals and so he decided to lure the Angelinians into making an attack and blow their divisions to kingdom come before they even reached the infantry. Within three quarters of a mile in front of the batteries of artillery, and long lines of breastworks held by his infantry there was placed a long line of frightful mines, one of which could destroy a whole section of houses at one blast. Upon these mines he had planned to lure the christian forces which would dare to try and capture his batteries. This plan was so well made that the christian commanders did not have any idea of it at all and so ran their armies into the most disastrous jaws of destruction that any one could conceive. Germania planned to make a fierce attack with the covering fire of the long line of artillery and this was done. After all the work had been finished and the ten thousand mines had been set and carefully placed, general germania started his demonstrations, and general yivian seeing this movement was suspicious and had his own heavy batteries placed into position for action. It took two days more to start things real, but on the morning of the third the region in front of the christian position was torn to pieces by the hell storm of artillery fire which continued without abatement for four hours, and then ceased to the astonishment of the christians, who had wisely held their own artillery fire, and had not replied a single shot but drew their own artillery out of range of the glandelinian artillery storm. Nevertheless general yivian feared an attack and so placing his field pieces into position, and also the machine guns he awaited developments.

A long line of glandelinians three hours afterwards was seen moving forward slowly. The men were far apart, and as the line drew nearer it became disordered in appearance lost its shape and became like the movement of a long surging mob. This unwarmed the Angollian commander and so he did what Germania vivilian had not expected. He let loose a fearful withering fire of cannons and rifles that tore that surge to pieces, and forced the remainder to seek safety in flight. This surprised Germania vivilian and he realized that any movement of this kind would be really only opposed, and not man over the Christians in advancing and so he pretended to be retreating but left the men who behind to perform their duty at the many lines of mines in case the Christian forces should surgo. The Christian forces did advance after the fleeing armies under Germania vivilian, and the day following it was shocking for general vivilian to receive the roll call of only 100,000 of his remaining men the fragment of the 10,000,000 which had been left after the explosions of the mines which had been set off at the right moment. The explosions had fairly tore the earth up but the air all around and those who not killed outright by the blast were buried in tons of falling earth and died of suffocation. The enemy had captured all of the munitions and artillery belonging to the almost destroyed Christian army, besides all the provisions trains and baggage wagons of the Christians and also cut off their retreat toward the north and south, so that the small force had to seek to the mountains for refuge until they could find means to escape so persistent a pursuer. Germania was happy over his dastard deed being so successful and when he learned that a new army was advancing to help the smaller force he made all efforts to bar their way, but was finally compelled to fall back as it happened to be the part of Germania's great army and to oppose him with such an inferior force was complete suicide. But never did the Angollians ever forget this great disaster. It was at that time one of the worst disasters that had ever happened to any of the Christian armies, and only was second to the great disaster to vivilian's army at Aronburg's run.

The explosions of these mines made horrible vents in the ground and made a scene that too the surviving witnesses, and to the enemy also as if ten thousand volcanoes had broken into secondary eruption right from the ground.

A report of the disaster had run as follows;

A

"I had seen a large part of the main Christian army under vivilian pursuing what seemed to me the retreating forces of glandelinian marians and Gargolians under that villi vivilian Germania vivilian when they had reached a certain section of ground their lines then deployed for about the length of thirty miles. It had expected to see some resistance of the enemy when all of a sudden the ground shook so violently that I was fairly thrown on my head and back with great force as to almost strike me, and simultaneously the air was riven what seemed to be a storm of thunder crashes that seemed like the roar of a hundred trillion cannon exploding the very insides of hell and creation into the atmosphere all at once, and I also saw great clouds of smoke and earth rise to a stupendous height. I remembered nothing after wards until I found myself on recovering my senses lying in a bed in a hospital at Glorinda and told by my doctor suffering from the effects of shell shock. It can be imagined then the force of the explosions when I was on a high hill three miles away from the scene. The doctors told me when I was picked up by a party of glandelinians I had been covered with dirt almost buried to my ears. It is heartrending to realize the dreadful annihilation of that vast Christian army, and it is apparent that it will only arouse the nation further against that butcher who not only butchers children but also soldiers in the most frightful manner. I'm only a citizen, and have been too old to be accepted in the army but nevertheless I had seen the explosions when returning to my home. When I had recovered enough to receive leave, I had went to the scene of the blast and every vent made by the explosions are about seven hundred feet deep and as wide as great craters of Mt. Calverline. It was a sight that made my blood almost run cold, and I do indeed wonder how in so short a time Germania's army engineers had been able to place such quantities of explosives as to tear up the ground worse than the explosions of a volcanic eruption could have done to the most mountain crater floors. I had learned that out of that army of ten million men only one hundred thousand men had survived and they had been so shaken by the experience that it will be doubtful if they will regain courage to find fight in another battle. I'm certainly shocked at the scene.

All the main Christian generals who have heard of this greatest of disasters to the Christian armies will I hope see to it that all the wicked glandelinian armies are crushed, and whipped out of Calverline as soon as possible. I'm surprised indeed that general Jennings allowed this disaster to happen to vivilian's army. And that Jennings was cut off from aiding his remnant when the glandelinians committed the deed. But I'm hoping before God that never again will happen such a disaster."

Indeed all of the highest Christian commanders had heard of the great disaster and also poor Violet and her sisters who were so frequently with Jack Evans. As soon as they had heard of the disaster to the Christian armies under vivilian they felt sure that now nothing could be done and many times they feared that the same would happen yet to the other Christian armies also and probably to their own also and that probably general vivilian or Hanson and others like those of their two other brothers would meet a similar disaster. Though the clashes with vivilian's armies had been successful against the enemy nevertheless general vivilian was not trustful and kept his scouts on the constant watch for there was no telling what the fierce glandelinians would yet do. General vivilian was advancing with fresh armies and it was reported that the enemy was committing serious devastation south of their own locations ruining towns and farms and villages almost as severely as the enemy were reported to be doing in the west and south of the great country of Calverline. Violet and her sisters Violet and her sisters had never experienced such times before and they indeed wondered when the war would have its speedy terminations.

As the enemy had for a time halted in the retreat Violet and her sisters with their boy friends decided to go out and see what the enemy was doing and also to view if possible the full extent of the damage done during the enemy's retreat. It was as usual a very hazardous undertaking for to be seen by the enemy now would result very fatally. But nevertheless Violet and her sisters were not daunted and went off under cover of the darkness of the night and also were glad to see that a good lively thunderstorm was approaching which would undoubtedly put out the fires which they could see burning in every direction and along the far distance. However as far as could be ascertained there was nothing like a forest fire as yet burning in this region though big ones were reported moving northward from the south from the direction of Cedornia and other sections of the country....

As they neared the scenes of devastations they could see whole hay stacks aflame and smoking like a volcano, houses and farm buildings were smoldering ruins, corn and wheat was ruined, and all kinds of farm growing products ruined and damaged. Many cows they saw lying dead in the pastures, and places where horses had been held but which was no; also smoldering and the horses gone besides all other material which the enemy had carried off. All the time during their working toward the enemy's lines they could see all this ruin and devastation, and also saw the burning towns far in the distance, the ruins of fruit trees which had been ruthlessly cut down and the derailing of freight cars, and the destruction of telegraphing and so on as far as anything could be damaged. Violet and her sisters finally entered the enemy's lines unseen and then seeing some generals approaching decided to take them by surprise and making them tell the strength of the army tie them up and place them where they could not be found quick enough to raise a hue and cry and cause them to be pursued too soon. So Violet and her sisters spoke of their plans to Starring, and as soon as the officers came within reach of their hiding place all of the children sprang upon them like wild catamounts and bore them to the ground binding and gagging them before they could utter a sound. Then Violet removed the gag of the chief officer and pointing a gun to his head said;

"If you make another of any kind I'll shoot you as you lie there. Tell us quickly if you value your lives how many men is in this army and how much of this work of devastation has been going on and how much more there will be."

At first the glandelinian general was silent but then he knew what Violet and her sisters were and decided that it was the wisest thing to do what the little girl commanded.

The general spoke hastily when he told Violet and her sisters all he knew and also about the work of devastation.

"Well done," said Violet. "I suppose you had no idea that us little Centopodas as you call us would be within your lines did you general. Well, sir Centopodas are pretty quick in their movements, and also you know general there are certain kind of Centopodas that are dangerous when tackled, and you know really who they are. So if you value your life, you'll keep still until we finish our job. There shall we hide these men starring!" She said turning to him.

"Oh dump them in the river and be done with them," said starring. "You are taking chances with leaving them afloat."

"I know but then we don't believe in killing the poor boobies in cold blood," said Violet. "We will hide them somewhere we where they will not be discovered too soon and cause us to be pursued before we think of our being discovered."

A good suitable place was found readily enough, and here the children dragged the three officers, and placed large bankets and tarpaulin pieces over them so that no one would observe them. Then Violet wrote down on a sheet of paper:

"Said officer declares that glandelinian army is very strong stronger than general Evans army though he will not give the exact number of men the Hanley's have. Nevertheless I presume the glandelinian armies are still up to the number of one hundred million men and are able to give us much more trouble if armies are not kept on guard and in good train. And also he states that if possible Hanley would devastate the whole country side and ruin everything possible in his path."

Realizing that they were in the heart of the enemy's lines they then decided to raid general Hanley's headquarters and see what they could obtain for the good of the Christian cause there. They entered the building by a side door and saw all of the highest glandelinian generals sitting around a table holding a conference. The boys at once rushed the glandelinian generals with pistols drawn, tumbled a number over the chairs, set the table over on its side with a resounding crash, and while Violet and her sisters grasped the important plans, held the glandelinian generals at bay with a good lively volley of pistol shots, though fort unluckily there was no one hurt on both sides. Then when Violet and her sisters were safely through the rear door the boys followed by all windows possible and were gone before the surprised glandelinian generals could recover to raise the alarm.

"Well if they are not the most pesky spies that was ever known," cried Hanley. "And they not spied on us, but attacked us also."

All attempts were made by these surprised glandelinian generals to have the desperate spies captured, but the little girls could not be found in the darkness though the whole camp in that section was searched thoroughly and not a tent or any point was left without a perfect investigation. While this search was on general Tamarline and Federal were having the time of their lives. The children had entered their headquarters, and not only overturned everything and surprised the generals, but also set the building on fire, drove off all the horses belonging to the generals and shot down sixteen glandelinian soldiers who started in pursuit, and then as successfully eluded the other pursuers by dashing in into the most darkest points of the ground that could be possibly be found and when in danger of being discovered showed such resistance that none of the glandelinians who had discovered their hiding place dared so much as go near it. They tried to surround it but of no use, and so the children successfully escaped to the Christian lines after making two of the most liveliest raids they had ever succeeded on the enemy generals. The next day they entered the enemy's lines once again in disguise, and seized three flags right in the very face of general Hanley and made off with them without injury though shots flew about the little girls like hail and shells tore the air above them, and soared and tore the ground around about them making for the daring child spies a perfect inferno to run through. Nevertheless the children were not daunted and succeeded in committing other depredation on the enemy in one day, such as running off with six of their supply trains, blowing up their ammunition dumps, and even capturing three of Hanley's best generals. They also set thousands of tents on fire, blew up a number of batteries, before they could be seized, and shot down three of their general pursuers before anything could be done to cover them from the gun fire of the children.

The vivian girls were alone responsible for the loss of sixteen great locomotives of the enemy when they succeeded in running off with, and also by their trickery prevented the enemy from blowing up a bridge by surprising them with their vigorous gun fire, and also succeeded in running a captured ammunition train full of explosive explosives across a burning bridge, and with a trail load of glandelinians in full pursuit, and fire firing volleys at them wildly. Six times that one they they raided general Hanley's headquarters, and once made off with his most expensive army coat with all its costly decorations, his gold scabbard, and gold handled sabre, and a brace of gold butted pistols, besides his Nino slaped hat, and his pocket book of money which he had left on the table. General Tamarline was raided three times that day and when he almost had them on the last time one of the little girls shot him in the shoulder and severely wounded him besides shooting down three of his under officers, and causing the wildest confusion among his men and guards, and again setting his headquarters on fire, which burned to the ground this time. Violet and her sisters even made off with over 10,000 horses, and when pursued led the enemy through a farmland and seeing a line of bee hives waited until the enemy were almost upon them and then fired at the hives thus arousing the bees which in the quickest time that it takes to tell routed the glandelinians to the four winds while the children laughed until the tears ran down their eyes. Finally the children had to cease their exciting raids as the enemy guards became so watchful that there was no hopes of entering the lines any more without meeting a fatal volley. Nevertheless they astonished Evans with all their successful raids, and proved to him that they could make out of themselves little "Devils" as the glandelinians called them when they wished to do so and probably worse.

It was not long after this that Violet and her sisters had a trying experience with the glandelinians. They had decided to go with one of their general friends to another portion of the great Christian army when they saw what appeared to be a large force of mounted girls approaching down the road. At first they did not know what to do for they realized immediately that they were the Finckle-Hollands! He-Hollands! but nevertheless to allow themselves to be captured by these blood thirsty glandelinians was certain destruction, and so off they went the general taking to their rear. The glandelinians at first did not see the fugitives but their leader happened to spy them and suddenly there was a loud hue and cry behind them, and a fierce volley was fired with a resounding crash and every one of their horses fell throwing their riders while one of the shots hit Violet clear in the breast as she attempted to arise. Immediately as five of her sisters opened fire with fury to prevent the enemy from coming too near the others at once opened her own outside waist which the bullet had penetrated expecting that she was mortally wounded and saw to their astonishment that she was not even injured or scratched. The shot had entered a portfolio, pierced several letters, her gaudulars, papers and cards, then halted at a picture of the sacred Heart of Jesus and also at another picture which looked very much like the Holy Christ of Lempina, both of which were only slightly scratched on the face. Violet indeed was astonished at her escape and as soon as she recovered from the shock they all took to the woods, and dived down into a deep ravine and waited for the Blue coated Zimmermannians to come on. They decided as they had been unhorsed not to run but to resist the enemy all they could and not to give up at all. The glandelinians seeing where the little girls with their fugitive general had gone hesitated to press on because they knew that the little girls were dangerous dangerous adversaries when aroused. But their leader was furious over their escaping him despite the good aim of the volley and ordered the men forward.

"Charge then boys!" he roared. "Why are you hesitating for. They must be captured!"

A party of men rushed forward on foot, but a withering fire was poured upon them from the edge of the ravine and all of these thirteen glandelinians went down dead or wounded. The glandelinian leader was surprised at this indeed, and did not know what to do. The fugitives were more dangerous to him and his men than he had expected them to be. To rush the ravine would be like committing suicide, and so he decided to not upon a ruse and compel them to come from their shelter. He produced a white flag or something on a long stick and then started forward with some of his under officers.

Violet and her sisters saw them coming but were too wise to be fool ed this way and immediately opened fire, not hes however with the intention of shooting down the officers, but nevertheless the flag was shot out of his hand, and feared that something worse would happen they hurried back to their respective command.

This officer had not experienced the ways of the vivian girls as yet and was indeed surprised at their behavior. And also seeing a large party of Angelinians who had heard the firing a preaching he decided it best to leave the fugitives be, and ordered his men to retreat which they did. As Violet and her sisters were watching the men retreating, and saw the Angelinians coming, they were about to give a rousing cheer, and taunt the Angelinians when they saw a pretty little girl suddenly appear as if from the bushes, or what appeared to be the head of a pretty child, and were about to advance toward it when all of a sudden there was a flourish of wings, and confronting the little girl was a young Robboman.

Violet and her sisters who had very rarely seen any of these freakish, goblin-like creatures did not know what to make of its appearance, and were at first a little apprehensive, but the creature appeared so friendly they finally overcame their fears, and when the Angelinians came up Violet and her sisters discovered that the woods were full of these kind of goblin-like creatures. They like the Angelinians had heard the firing and had appeared from their abodes to see what was wrong. Violet and her sisters had done most of the firing, and this had astonished the creatures as well as the Angelinians.

Violet Violet and her sisters told of what had happened and how they had encountered the Glandelinians, and how they had realized them successfully and shot the thirteen down who had first strove to get them while they were sheltered in the ravine. The wounded Glandelinians were taken into the camp by the Angelinians and the dead ones buried. Some of the small, long-limbed ones on sorcerers followed some distance, and then retraced their way back to the woods. Thus at this time at least Violet and her sisters had had some thrilling adventures and also had once more seen a large number of goblin-like creatures which they can be proud of. By these series of experiences the Angelinians declared that Violet and her sisters were the bravest children that they had ever seen in their lives, and many of them indeed wished that the vivian girls were their own.....

Indeed it was a terrible war. The enemy were still working their storm of devastation as much as possible and it was only with difficulties that any of the Christian armies which were victorious could advance at all. The whole world was a surprise at the fury of the war, and also over the terrible destruction committed by the enemy in every part of Galverinia. Instead of the east alone. Most of the war itself had raged in Galverinia. As far as now at least only a small portion of the war had been staged in the country of Angelinia, and hardly any just now in any other parts of Angelinia and many Christian armies which had been mobilized by draft and in onslaughts were inactive and impatiently waiting for their turn or time to go in and fight some of the mighty thrilling battles. Angelinia felt entirely secure, while all the people in Galverinia were terrified and feared that the end of the very world was coming. Most of the Glandelinian armies that were in Galverinia had not come up through Angelinia for after the growing Crowley massacre and battles this was impossible as the southern boundary line of Angelinia was too strongly guarded, and chains of batteries with millions of cannon to guard the border besides all the armies that were not needed in the broadside actions. The Glandelinians came into Galverinia through the coasts of western Galverinia especially the wharf her and Vivian wharf, which were in the possession of the Glandelinian forces were throughout the whole country of Galverinia, and also elsewhere. Just at this time there were no Glandelinians in Angelinia for they had directed most of their intentions at this critical time in the Galverinian revolution alone. This was their most important point. Many conflicts which child slaves had fought in their rebellion were also torn by greater battles in this mighty war and also other points had been so severely devastated by the enemy that the scene indeed was a great wide spread storm of desolation complete. When, oh when would the wicked Glandelinian invaders be driven out of Galverinia!!!!

Well we will see. There is many days more to come yet before the main issue can be decided.....

During this time general Jack Evans was elsewhere sitting in the lower room of his headquarters and a stranger was sitting beside him on a chair. Evans did not like the looks of the man and was going to ask him something about his business there when the man who was reading an Angelinian news paper said:

"You have that seven beautiful children known as the Vivian girls were terribly injured not long ago in an explosion last evening. They must have felt dreadfully cut up about it-----tee--tee."

"No that's no joke either." Said A Evans bringing his fist so furiously down upon the man's head as to force him down flat with legs flying high into the air and breaking the chair under him knocking him senseless and then out he went leaving him lie there.

IN THE MIC) MIC-HOLLESTER DOLERINE FORTIFICATIONS.....

On the northwest side of Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale which were so frequently threatened by the Glandelinians during the great war of Angelinia, as we all know at stands the noty northern section of the Mic-Holleston or Dolerine fortifications. On one side of the fortifications there was a long line of outer works which extended for seven miles and which were thirteen feet high and which just touched the boundary line that separates Galverinia from Angelinia, but on the outer portions south of it the fortifications touched the state line of Ozma. The garrison of these fortifications however were strong in numbers and any one who ever came within view of these fortifications rarely could stand off and look at them and know very little about them, for about a third distance off from the outerworks, the places are so strongly guarded for so strong a force dare pass was near, and if any Glandelinians were within the walls of the fortifications as prisoners the main Glandelinians were not aware of the facts. Yet within the interior of this region where stands also the defense mobilization camps of Ozma town were many Glandelinians held as prisoners. Within full view appeared to be also large low hills scattered here and there. In command of the defense garrison defending all approaches to the Angelinian National capital was a wise old soldier general Andonia Ozma who was one of the best fighters ever known.

However at this time it was seen that Angelinia Agathia had been threatened by the enemy so frequently that it was feared if something wise was not done the city would some day be captured. So Robert Angell vivian, who rules everyone in the Angelinian countries had made a degressive decree that no one no matter how or she she was should be allowed to go within the dominions of Angelinia Agathia or her outlying towns except the main authorities of the Angelinian and Abilemian governments, or the vivian girls, and his brother and other generals, and when general Robert vivian sent this royal war command to the commanders of the garrisons of the Mic-Holleston Dolerine fortifications by means of a strongly guarded messenger and swift train also guarded the main commander fearing something also would happen if the plans and everything was captured by enemy spies at once withdrew all his maps and everything was captured by enemy spies and at once stopped drawing pictures, and beyond plans of the fortresses. He destroyed many of his most important letters, and everything else he was afraid spies may get hold of, and obeyed every order he was commanded to do. He had never seen the Vivian girls or the main generals of the National Armies, but he knew they were even his rulers though children, and must also be obeyed.

There however was only one thing that grieved and made him scared. He had discovered a new and secret method of how to transform the strength of the Mic-Holleston Fortifications aroundy around Angelinia Agathia, that was unknown to any Angelinian general, or the Angelinian governments, and unknown to the secret service agents of the rebels. General Manley or his aides did not know it, nor did the Tamerlins, the other Manleys, nor any one else, or the secret enemies of Angelinia who dealt in the wicked cause of the rebellion. It was the generals very own secret. By its means should he follow it out, with workers and engineers it would be the simplest thing in the world to transform the outer works of Angelinia Agathia's defense into the strongest works in the world. The general had at this time in secret many things. He of course himself would not dare to write down the plans of this very great general if I thought my readers might study them too carefully as as to be able to warn Manley in case they were favoring his cause and his nations, but it is a fact that no one else in the world except the general (up to the time of this story) been able to form such an important plan, and so I do not even think it would be ever safe to give it to my own mother.

It may also be well for me however in writing this story to be careful not to think of the plans the general had in mind in the proper way because I, also may make a mistake and reveal it to the enemy, and so I must do anything possible to avoid all danger of his secret plans being known to the insurgent generals who therefore would be able to work all kinds of mischief. This great general who commanded all the places around Angolinia again in and her outlying places and fortifications and the internal internment camps having made and discovered the secret of the way of transformation for the outer works of the defenses of Polorine Mis-Hollister, was reluctant to have such a wonderful disc every, entirely in danger of being known by the rebels. As the enemy had been too near Angolinia Agathia and as it had been attacked and besieged several times the general fearing something would come sooner or later, decided not to use it too quick, but he reflected that general Manley was not alto gether too close for his cause and may some time change his mind and with draw his armies from the region of Zoe Callen run, and then when no rebel armies were near he would proceed to do as he planned. After giving the matter some very careful thought, he decided to write down the plans he had, and how it should be accomplished in a secret place, so that he could find it after many days, but where no one else could ever find it. That seemed to be a very clever idea, but what bothered the old general, was to find an most secret place. He had wandered all over the interior of his fortifications for many days, but found no place in which to secretly write down his plans and place it where others might not likely to stumble upon it. So finally he decided it must be written somewhere in his own headquarters. General Andons had with his command at this time a man whom he did not like. A man who had enlisted into the Angolinian service there, was noted as being very cross and extremely disagreeable to every one, he was not happy with his surroundings, because it appeared he wanted to go to Dorothy Gale to see things there but that as it was not safe the general would not let him. He one however paid any attention to the stranger for from his ways he did not seem to amount to anything anyhow. Where ever he was the man seemed sullen. The man really was a Zimorranian spy and no one seemed to know it or did not. One day after he had been left alone to guard the general's room, seeing all was clear the rebel spy decided to enter the general's private room, where he or any one else was forbidden to go, and see if he could find any plans, or maps of Angolinia Agathia and her fortifications, or some means to learn the strength of the fortified works around Betsy Bobbin, Trot, and Dorothy Gale, and of the big mobilization camps. As he went into the room the spy stubbed his toe on a rotten floor board and while he was sprawling. He cursed and swore to himself as he got to his feet and then proceeded to search everywhere, but found no trace of anything he wished to secure. He saw through some means that all had either been sent away to the government or into the custody of the main generals, or had been destroyed. It was most likely so that the important documents had been given to the Vivian girls. If so it would be impossible to gain them, as to raid the place of Violet and her sisters no matter where they had been was like raiding a den of a number of tigers without weapons to defend yourself. Much disappointed, and believing his mission unsuccessful he started to go out again when he suddenly stubbed his toe on the same floor board and fell flat on his face striking his nose with such force as to draw blood. He finally recovered himself, and after stopping the blood started thinking. When he examined the board as closely as possibly possible possible possible and found that it had been recently pried up, and nailed down again in such a manner that it was much higher than the other boards. But who had taken up that board? And why was the board taken up? Had the general or some one hidden some of the most important plans, papers or maps, underneath the floor? The spy whose name for good reasons I will not mention got his dragger out, and after some difficulty pried up the board, but found nothing under it. He was just about to replace the board as he had found it, when he slipped on some grass and fell accidentally flying the board down to the floor with a bang, and as it fell the board turned over on the other side, and as the spy arose to his feet, he saw a slip of paper. Examining it close he saw something written on the paper. The light was rather dim as it was drawing on to night time, so he took the board to the window, and examined it with great care, and found that the writing described exactly exactly about the new form of works the general was planning, their strength, and everything else I did not like to speak out. Not at first the spy did not realize what a most wonderful secret of the Angolinians he had discovered, but he thought the discovery might be of some use to him or to Manley at least, and so that he would not be discovered he took another piece of paper and made on it an exact copy of the plans. When looking carefully to see that no one was watching him he folded the paper carefully and put it in his pocket, and replaced the board into the floor the way he had found it, so that no one would suspect it had been removed. After this the spy went into the outer sections of the Polorine Mis-Hollister fortifications, and watching that no one was around sat under a redan and made a careful study of the paper. He had been here for three weeks and all that time had always wanted to get away from Polorine, and visit Dorothy Gale-----not especially the big mobilization camps of those places previously mentioned, and the idea now came to him that if he could get out of the region of Angolinia Agathia without being discovered he could assume the appearance of a privileged Angolinian war correspondent and go to any place he wished to go, and come back any time he pleased to. It was necessary for safe keeping however, to learn by heart what he had written down because it would not be safe for him to carry any papers with him, and if the papers were once discovered on his person he might as well say his last prayers. He knew what happens to spies so he studied it a long time, repeating it many hundreds of times in his mind, until he was sure he would not forget it. By this time it was getting late in the day and the spy wished to get out of the region of Angolinia Agathia before the general returned or before he could be prevented from getting out. So going up to a commissioner officer he said:

"I wish to go out to the outer works to see a personal friend of mine who wishes to give me information about Manley's intentions. I'll be back again before dark." Not suspecting anything the officer allowed him to go out and within another half an hour he was within sight of the outer works. Then he laughed half aloud, and said to himself:

"I suppose they all think I'm a National as themselves. But I wonder if I could secure a horse strong enough to carry me a couple of miles toward Mambi without becoming jaded." For he had decided to make his first trip to the country region outside of Angolinia Agathia and her fortresses and find general Manley or some other Glandolinian general. He had stolen the secret of the great Christian general, and he had disobeyed the laws of Angolinia by deserting the camps after instilling by pretending to be an Angolinian soldier and was therefore guilty of treason as well as being a spy. Perhaps if he was not careful general Robert Vivian whose armies now were near Mambi would discover him, or even Hanson, Vivian, and cause his capture, so it would be a good policy to keep away from the region of Mambi all together. And he must not be seen by the Vivian, Iris, or their scouts either. And the main thing he must do is to avoid Jennie Urner, or Gertrude Angelina, who could discover a spy as easily as a puma discovers his prey..... Slowly the spy strode out of the lines at dark by a secret way where no one would see him go. Finally he secured a horse he saw near a tree tied to a stake and rode off until just before the moon started to rise and flood the landscape with light reached a high hilly region. From this height he could see far across the many fortresses of Angolinia Agathia and the big mobilization camps and so on, another region that seemed to be pleasant to explore, so and so he headed that way and urging his horse began his flight.

Even a spy has to come in order to put his distance between himself and the Christian camp as far as possible. So swiftly did he urge the horse to go that from the fierce riding he himself felt sick and faint, by the time he had covered several miles. But as he halted the fresh air restored him and he stopped at a broad table a table land called Hilland junction. Just beyond it was a small valley known as the Leland and these two countries he discovered were in possession of two vast Abilominian armies. He stood beside his horse near Gingorb road man creek, near Chick The Chorus river. The spy merely stopped his horse long enough to rest his jaded horse, and then he rode north, and passed over a fine territory called the Vryland State. Then following the curve of the Chorus river he turned northwestward, and halted under a tree top near the region of the well famed "No man's land."

Both the spy and his horse were really tired by this time, and the moon was now high in the sky, and so he decided to remain here until morning. From here he could see a solid solitary house near by, which looked to be very comfortable. He saw a man milking a cow in the yard, and a woman who looked very pleasant faced him to the door and called to the man to come in and to bed. That made the spy wonder what sort of food these Calvinian Calvinian peasants eat. He felt hungry, but did not know what to eat here or how to get it. As also he thought a bed would be more careful than sleeping on the ground underneath a tree so he led his horse and strode toward the house. He therefore paused and knocked on the door, and as the man appeared asked for something to eat and a lodging for the night.

"Who are you?" asked the man who seemed to own the house.
"I'm a messenger from general Conventinian Atonburg's army sent to general Vivian with an important message." Replied the spy.
"Then you are surely welcome indeed." Said the man. "The good man." The spy was therefore given a good supper, and also a good bed, and though he was a Calvinian Calvinian he behaved very well, although he refused to answer all the questions the people of this region asked him. Having escaped from the army at Angelina Agathia, the young spy was no longer scared or unhappy, and so he was no longer nervous or disagreeable. The people indeed did not know who he really was, and thought him a very respectable person, and gave him a good breakfast in the morning and took good care of his horse, after which he started on his way, feeling quite contented.

Having rode on for an hour or two through the pretty Angelinian country, he saw not far away a Christian army under general King Bud, and not wishing to take any chances in going far further than that way decided to could travel better if he got into Calvinia itself itself. He soon came upon a great fortress called Fort Nole and saw the long lines of earthworks teeming with gunnery, and many other army places of interest. Then he rode westward till he came to the region of the creek near the state of Ev. Every place he visited he thought was more pleasant and he decided that when finally the Calvinian authorities have caused the downfall of Angelina and her states he would settle somewhere in Angelina, and enjoy his future life to the utmost. In the state of Ev he went on more slowly and was very careful for the cities and villages of strange Christian mobilization camps were a loser together and he felt sure he was drawing near to a Dorothy lake or the town of Bee Betsy bobbin. Toward evening he came to a good inn in charge of some winkle soldiers, and asked one of the officers if he could have food and lodgings.

"You can have if you can furnish proof that you are an Angelinian soldier." Said the officer. "Otherwise as we do not know you you must go elsewhere." This surprised the spy, for he suspected that his escape had been forwarded through out the country by means of signal stations and that all strangers were being looked upon with suspicion. He had no money to buy anything, so he turned away to seek hospitable elsewhere. Looking through an open window into one of the rooms of the inn, as he passed along on his horse, he saw an officer looking over an important letter. It must be something important he reflex reflected so he rode quickly up to the window, pointed a gun at the officers head, caught up the letter, folded it with one hand and put it into his pocket, and rode away again before the officer could interfere or yell for help. Indeed the poor officer who was robbed was quite helpless, for he dared not leave his room just then for important reasons to chase the spy, and before he could raise the alarm and get a bunch of soldiers to pursue the robber spy was out of sight, and to seek him at night would be folly. The spy rode to a thick group of trees, and dropping to the ground leaped to the ground, and then looked over the paper he had stolen.

"Hold you are my prisoner." A small voice just near him.
"And you will be sorry for this when you are brought into the lines." The spy looked around and saw a little girl sitting on a horse dressed as a boy scout, and she had leveled a small pistol at him.

"Sorry for what?" He demanded.
"Oh I and my friend saw the whole thing." Asserted the little girl. "I saw you from here look in the window, at the officer and his note, and then an hour afterwards ride up to him and rob the poor officer, and then I saw you hold for here and rode hereto intercept you. That's stealing, and though you're in a wicked and unlawful on this occasion, you stole a general's letter, and that is a still greater crime. You are to come with me."

"Oh yes indeed I will not." Replied the spy calling and before she knew what he was up to he had suddenly drew his own gun, and firing at her leaped upon his horse and dashed away. Her horse was killed under her and before she could get up on her feet the spy was out of sight.

"Gosh I did not know I was being watched by one of the darn Calvinians." Said the spy to himself. "But if I wish I'm glad of it, he I showed her her place that time. So she thought she had me a prisoner. Ha. Ha. I hate the one Vivian girl. I've always wanted to shoot one of them, but I didn't know I would have the chance until now. I bet there is one gone now at least." "Haw, haw, haw," laughed some one riding up behind him in a big voice. "That's the proper spirit spirit my lad. I'm glad I have met you, shake hands." The spy turned around and saw a queerly dressed Calvinian on a horse near. He was formidable looking, had a big round face, with bushy white whiskers, and thin hair that looked as if it never had been combed in a lifetime. He wore dull gray clothes, (not a uniform) the clothing seeming to be tight fitting, and his pockets of his coat seemed all bulged out as if stuffed full of something.

"I did not know you were anywhere here." Said the spy looking at the stranger curiously.
"I did not know until after you got here." Said the queer old Calvinian.

"Who are you?" Asked the spy.
"My name is James Hupfede. I used to be in the Angelinian army, but I left the army for some good reasons, and now now I'm looking for the Calvinian army."

"But why you leave the Christian army?" Inquired the Calvinian.
"Well it is the fashion to leave the Christian armies suddenly now a days. I was a pretty good soldier---to myself, but the one dreadful Vivian girl would not let me alone whatever. So I had to leave. But let us talk about something more pleasant. Who are you and where did you come from?"

"I do not care to reveal my name just now. I used to be in the fortifications near the Angelinian Capital, but now I am for a while just wandering around."

The stranger gave the spy a very shrewd look.
"I heard that girl say when you tried to shoot down that you stole something from an officer in an open window. Is that true?" The spy hesitated, but saw no reason now to deny it. He felt that it would make him appear more important, and he felt also that the man may also be another spy in disguise.

"Well---yes." He said.
"He you are a fugitive spy?"
"No I did not suffer from pursuit yet." He admitted.

"Well that was a pretty good trick anyhow," declared the old man. "I used to be a vovary and buy myself, but my enemies are scouring the whole world for me. What are you going to do?"

"I'm going to some other place to get some supper and a bed," said the young spy.

"I have you money to pay for, I'd lodgings?" asked the old Calverinian.

"I have two good places which will secure for me what I want."

"And the letter you stole. Very good. And you are glad that you are so wicked. Better for me yet. I like you young man, and I'll go to the place you head for with you if you promise not to say anything suspicious to any one."

"Do you think the people around here are as dangerous as the soldiers?" asked the young spy.

"I'm afraid of every one around here who may be christian dogs, they are all dangerous and may not you," said the old Calverinian with a sulk.

"All right," agreed the young spy. "I won't say anything that people may hear!"

"I'll come along," said the old Calverinian.

After a short ride they came to a very small camp, and when they came within reach of the first sentinal the guard scowled at them both and said:

"I'm not old not to follow any one in unless he knows me a pass."

The young spy who had a pass showed it to him.

"And how about you?" asked the sentinal, turning to the old Calverinian. "Have you a pass?"

"I've something better," answered the old man, and taking a package of paper from his pocket he handed it to the sentry.

The sentinal was very polite to the strangers after that and allowed them into the small encampment. He served them an excellent supper, and while they ate it in a tent all by themselves, the spy asked his companion:

"Where did you get that large package?"

"I'll tell you," answered the old man. "When the vivian girls caused me a much trouble that I had to flee from the christian camps I managed to secure the papers from general vivian's headquarters."

They are papers which allow any one to go where he likes as long as he carries them and he will never be suspected."

"Are they better than the passports I have?" asked the younger spy.

"The package is worth my life."

"Don't talk so loud," begged the young spy, uneasily. "Some one else might hear what you are saying."

After supper they took a short walk together, and the old Calverinian said:

"Do you know the great vivian generals, and some sentinal Gronburg, and the vivian girls, and Gertrude Ange line, and Jennie Maer, and Angelina Rio bee, and all the other dangerous persons of our enemies?"

"No," replied the spy. "I have never been further away from Angelina Agathia than this."

"Then you have never been in the many christian armies where the vivian girls are known to be?"

"Never!"

"Well," said the old Calverinian. "I know all of these people, and you can guess I and the whole of the glandelinian nation and the soldiers do not love them. All during my own efforts to learn situations of the cause I have brooded on how I can be revenged on those little vivian girls. Now that I have met you I can see a way to get within the christian lines, spy on them, notify Maer and with his help conquer Angelina and secure the vivian girls as my own prisoners to do with them as I please."

"How can you do that?" inquired the young spy wonderingly, knowing how almost impossible it was to capture the vivian girls.

"Never mind how. In the first place I'll make a bargain with you with you. Tell me the secret of how to get into the dominions of Dorothy Gale and I will give you a pocket full of money, the biggest amount that I possess."

"No," said the younger spy who realized that to share his secrets with another would be dangerous to both.

"I'll give you two pocket fulls of money all glandelinian silver dollars," said the old Calverinian.

"No," answered the young spy.

"I'll give you every cent I possess."

"No, no, no," said the young spy, who was beginning to be frightened.

"Then," said the old spy with a wicked look at his younger conspirator. "I'll tell these Angelinians in this small camp that you stole that letter from the officer at the army inn and he will have to hang as a spy."

The young spy laughed at the threat.

"Before he can do that," said he. "I will shoot down all who try to capture me, and if I then fail to escape as I wish, I'll shoot even myself."

"Would you really do such a desperate thing?" asked the older spy, looking at his young companion seriously.

"Of course," declared the spy. "I could even shoot you with out mercy, even if you did draw a gun on me, for then we would both die together."

The wicked old man shivered a little when he heard that, but it made him long more than ever to possess a secret to get into formidable Dorothy Gale. After a while he said:

"I'll tell you what I'll do. If you will help me to get into Dorothy Gale and to find out the plans of the generals there or the strength of the mobilization camps, by telling me your secret, I'll agree to have Maer make you a general, and I will be your assistant and see that your orders are obeyed."

"I'll help do that," said the younger spy, "but for the safety of unbold I won't tell you the secret."

The old Calverinian was so furious at this refusal that he fairly jumped up and down with rage, and spluttered and choked for a long time, before he could control his passion. But his younger spy companion was not at all frightened. He laughed at the wicked old Calverinian, which made him more furious than ever.

"Let's give up the idea," he proposed, when the old man had quite quieted down somewhat. "I don't know the vivian girls or their companions you mention, and so though they are Angelinians, and even the princesses of Angelina they are not my enemies. If they or their friends have kicked you out of the army, that is your affair not mine."

"Would you not like to discover who the vivian girls are and frustrate the magnificent in their plans?" asked the old man.

"Yes I would," replied the younger spy, "but you want to capture the vivian girls yourself yourself, and we surely would quarrel over them."

"No," said the old man trying to deceive the young man. "I don't care to have the vivian girls in my possession, I only want to think it over. I don't even care to have them in my presence, even near me. What I want first is revenge. If we can capture by our spying work to be successful, the city of Angelina Agathia and outskirts to be conquered, I'll get enough means to conquer the other places, and then I'll go back to a general Maer's lines, which are more home like than being in the christian lines. So here is my proposition. Help me in my spying work so Maer can easily use the work of Dorothy Gale and Angelina Agathia, and help me to get revenge on the vivian girls, and help me to get the two vivian generals out of the way, and I'll get you a commission as a general in Maer's army."

"I'll think it over," answered the young spy, and that was all he would say that evening. In the night when all in the camps were asleep except the guards, and himself the old Calverinian, rose softly from his bunk and went through the clothes of his younger spy and scoured everywhere for what he wished to find, the secret papers concerning the entrance way to Dorothy Gale. Of course the boy had no such papers, and although the old Calverinian searched in all the boys' pockets, he found not even the secret papers of general Aldous plans whatever. So he went back to his own bunk and began to doubt that the young spy knew of any means to get into Dorothy Gale without being discovered.

"Next morning he said:

"Which way do you travel to day boy?"

"The only way will be to visit Ozma in the Rose Hill Kingdom of Angolinia," answered the boy.
"That is a long and most dangerous journey," declared the old Calverinian.
"We can use our horses," said the younger spy, "and so ride to the point in an hour or so."

"Then wait until I get my horse and I'll go with you," suggested the old man.
"In that case let us ride together to the city of Dorothy Gale, and see at least what it looks like."
The younger spy thought it over. Strange and interesting and important as were the territories he had visited, he heard everywhere that the city of Dorothy Gale was the main source of the supplies of the Angolinians, and if there were any possibilities of his ever being captured he must know something about its strongholds.

While the young spy thought, the old Calverinian was also thinking. This boy, a spy of Glandelinian possession, a certain important secret, and although very simple in many ways, he carefully determined not to part with it. However if the old man could get him to transport him to Dorothy Gale, which he could reach in no other way, he might then utilize the boy to follow any advice that he may give him and into the plot for revenge on the pretty Vivian girls, which he had already planned in his wicked heart.

"There are numerous scouts and the key persons in the camps and army barracks and the like on the outskirts of Dorothy Gale," remarked the boy after a time. "They might find out us, in spite of our disguises."
"Not if we are absolutely careful," the old Calverinian assured him. "The main general there had big cavalry forces but on a continual scouting tour every minute of the day and night, in which he could learn everything unusual going on, but these cavalry scouting parties will know nothing of our going to Dorothy Gale, and if we are careful we will not meet any of those and have them not usually demand of us where we are going, or what we are doing. General Hanson once lost a great book of records through some spy but he recovered it. He has everything strictly guarded at all costs at Angolinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale."

"Then," said the young spy, "there is no use in our attempting to get into Dorothy Gale for the scouts would see all our approaches, and as they are much cleverer than we and we would be sure they would capture us and soon put a stop to our plans."

"We would not need to both bother about Dorothy Gale," retorted the old Calverinian. "The scouts all around Dorothy Gale does not make records of what Glandelinian scouting parties do. They are on the look out that no suspicious characters succeed in getting into Dorothy Gale, or Angolinia Agathia, or if we go toward the center part Ozma town for instance, the Angolinian scouting parties won't know anything about our plans."

"But is two fellows could not get into any of those places without proper proper disguises," asserted the boy scornfully.

"No, that's true," admitted the Glandelinian or Calverinian spy, and then he rubbed his forehead, and stroke his beard and thought some more.

"All now I have the idea," he suddenly declared. "I suppose you know all the roadways toward Ozma town?"

"Of course," answered the boy.
"Anybody can make your way there without being surprised by Angolinian scouting parties," said the boy.

"Of course," said the boy.
"I see, I see," said the old man nodding his head. "That fits in with my idea, exactly. Now listen and I'll explain to you my plan. We'll ride to Ozma as two refugees and settle ourselves in one of the big mobilization camps in the Glikin Abyssinilian armies. Here you can tell their officers that we were refugees from the enemy and as the Nationals don't hardly keep track of the doings of the refugees but just shelter them, we can get on with out being discovered."
"But how can two men fool such a wily army as the Abyssinilians?" inquired the boy.

"That's easy if you know how. But if we are not trusted we need not go in among the armies of Abyssinilians. We would probably be discovered. And while we are in the town of Ozma you and I could never appear as our former kind until we have found means to capture or kill the Vivian girls, or made up plots to help Manley capture Angolinian capital and win the rebellion, and also to destroy the two main armies under Hanson and Robert Vivian and so have nothing more to fear from them."

"It is impossible to destroy the Angolinian armies, they are too large," declared the young Glandelinian spy.

"It is not necessary to destroy the big Angolinian armies," rejoined the old Calverinian.

"I'm afraid I don't understand you at all," objected the Glandelinian boy spy. "What will happen to the main Angolinian armies, and what sort of an army of secret spies could we get together, except strangers?"

"I'll tell you. Manley's lines are full of all kinds of spies. Most of them are savage and cruel, and would gladly follow any leader as savage as themselves. They have always troubled the many various Angolinian armies by their work of spying and vandalism. Because they have so many great leaders upon them, but we can go to Manley's lines near Zoo Callen where he defeated the Christian armies, find many of the spies and tell them to help us find out the strength of the position around Angolinia Agathia and elsewhere, and as a reward we will see to it that they all shall have high commissions. What is a splendid idea you must admit, and it is so easy we won't have no trouble at all to carry it through to success."

"Will the spies consent to such a desperate plan, do you think?" asked the boy spy.

"To be sure they will. We can get every spy to do it, except those boys Gerald Barrigan, Fredrick Burger and his companion, and they won't count."

The young Glandelinian spy however did not know much about the Angolinian spies of Ozma or Dorothy Gale, and did not know much about the Angolinian mobilization camps and the main Angolinian armies who were near that location by Zoo Callen Run, but the old Calverinian plan seemed to him to be quite reasonable indeed. He however had a faint suspicion that the old man wanted all the honor himself, and that he meant to get the best of him in some way, and therefore he decided or resolved to keep a very close watch upon his fellow conspirator. As long as he kept hidden the secret plans he had secured from the fortress at Angolinia Agathia, and as he also was a well known Glandelinian spy of the highest rank, the old Calverinian traitor would not dare to harm him, and he promised himself that as soon as they had secured the strength of the knowledge of the strength of the many camps and positions, and had caused Manley to overcome and capture Angolinia Agathia and her surrounding towns, he would desert his old companion and go elsewhere.

The old man on his own part decided that he also could by careful watching and listening, surprise the boy into giving out his secret, and when he had got the better of the Glandelinian boy spy he would desert and reveal everything to Manley himself. This is I suppose always the way with wicked people. They never can be trusted even by one another. Haggado thought he was following the young Glandelinian spy, and the young spy thought he was fooling the old Calverinian, so both were pleased.

"It's a long way to Dorothy Gale or even Ozma," remarked the boy spy, "and the Angolinians have millions of scouts out, and have batteries which dominate all approaches to both places. Let us wait until evening, and then right across the open plains, when it will be much safer."

The old Calverinian agreed to this, and so the two Glandelinians spent the rest of the day in talking over their plans. When evening came they left the camp they were in in a secret manner and walked out to a little grove of trees, where they stood their horses.

"Remain here for a few moments and I'll soon be back," said the younger spy, and walking wittily away, he left the old Calverinian standing in the small grove. The old man wondered where he had gone, but stood quite quietly in his place until all of a sudden, there came a cry like that from an eagle. At once the eagle cry was answered from beyond the grove, and two hooded men on horse back suddenly came riding up, and the old Calverinian knowing the signals well realized they were two of the Angolinian scouts and hid until they rode out of sight. Then came the lad and he declared that all was clear and that they were ready for the start. The old man felt that somehow or other the Angolinian scouts may outwit them, but the boy was too shrewd for that and had made a reconnaissance to show the coast lay. As the two spies rode forward across an open plain the old man said:

"Why first became a spy I had many ways of making changes so as to fool Angolinian scouting parties that I thought was good, but I could not compare with your own ways. I had to have certain kind of papers to copy and study study upon before I could accomplish anything."

"What became of your important papers?" Inquired the boy spy.

"I was one day chased and captured by Gertrude Angeline and her girl spies, and though I finally escaped from them they had nevertheless secured the papers from me-- especially that horrid girl Jennie Warner, and those Terrible Vivian girls, the Princesses of Angolinia--at the time they and some of their boy and girl scouts chased me for hundreds of miles."

"Why did you let them do that?" Asked the Glandelinian boy spy.

"Well," said the old Calverinian spy, "I could not help it. They were too many for me and I was alone and they shot down my horse from under me, and all threatened to shoot me also."

"Are those Vivian girls as dangerous as all that?"

"Yes, but not only them but their whole regiment of boy and girl scouts. The one girl spies are the only persons among the Angolinians that I am afraid of."

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS
SEARCH FOR THE SPIES!

In this country there is really no other country region so beautiful and yet so strongly defended as the dominions of Angolinia Agathia, which have outposts and cities with almost exactly the same names as certain famous persons known in the books of Oz. There are no stronger fortifications in even that world out side of those of Vivian, so massive and prolonged and as well garrisoned as the Polorino, Mic-Hollero, Mic-Hollero and Mic-Hollero Polorinia Fortifications. They have all the ammunition they desire, Angolinia Agathia, Dorothy Gale, Trot, and Betty goblins are great centres of the manufacture of ammunitions and so on, and the whole nation admires the beautiful and powerfully guarded and well defended mobilization camps, especially the one of Ozma town, and here the hundreds of millions of soldiers, and marines and troopers mix military work as well as play so justly that both are very delightful and satisfying, and no one in the army not even the officers have any reason to complain.

Very often however many things happened to disturb the happiness and safety of the people of all these places, either for a brief time or for months, for Angolinia Agathia is considered the main goal of the rebels, and therefore not only did many Glandelinian spies, generals and Glandelinian government authorities treacherously plot to conquer Angolinia Agathia and her outposts and cities, but many fierce sieges had been directed, and Angolinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale were subjected to the attacks of the biggest Glandelinian armies in the war so far. Up to this time when this cruel and crafty old Calverinian spy, who conspired with the young Glandelinian spy, all such attempts have disastrously failed and twice John Mailey had been seriously wounded for his attempts. For all the war up to now the people of these cities feared the approach of such dangers.

In the centre of the city of Dorothy Gale, the capital of the state of Angolinia was a vast and lengthy munitions works, well built with many works of its own, and in the centre of Angolinia Agathia stood the Governor General Concontinian Aronburg's own home, and the homes of the Angolinian rulers the most splendid buildings ever constructed.

From the scores of hundreds of strongly fortified towers of Fortresses Polorino, Mic-Hollero floated the banners of Angolinia, and the garrisons of that line of fortifications were of Angolinians Abbieannians, royal Calverinians, and which included the Ozmaes, Munchkin, Gilikin, Winkie, and Quadling Abyssinians and Abbieannians, the fiercest fighting soldiers the Angolinians have. The millions of banners decorating the tops of the fortress were of many colors, but the colors of the main general had a white centre, and divided into four quarters, colored purple, green, red and yellow, indicating that Angolinia Agathia had the National Governments protecting the whole world against Glandelinia in general. Angolinia Agathia was more strongly defended than any place else in the world, and was the main support of the carrying on the war for she and her sister cities had the largest munition factories and other war places for making material in the world, and had scores of hundreds of them.

These fortifications were so big however, that all of them is yet not known to the main Christian generals, and it was said that in some parts of the region in forests, and slight Angolinian jungles, and mountain fastnesses, in hidden valleys unknown to the enemy were many armies stationed there to head off all hostile approaches to Angelina Agatha from the east. Still these hidden armies unknown to the Mainlys or his other rebel ministers are not nearly so strong or numerous as the main garrisons of Angelina Agatha, who occupy not only all the fortresses of Dorothy Dorothy Gale and Angelina Agatha, but also the outer works near the Betsey Gobbin and Ozma. Indeed I'm sure that if the many christian cavalry forces are not more careful than they usually are it would not be long until all parts of the well guarded cities would be explored by rebels and their spies, and their places made known to the rebel generals, for in Mainlys armies there are greater and more daring spies than the Angelinians ever have even better ones than the vivid girls themselves who are so daring, curious and reckless that they are constantly discovering new and extraordinary points to be assaulted. It was not of very frequent occurrence however that Violet and her sisters had ever been near or in Angelina Agatha in or Dorothy Gale, who is Angelina's dearest friends, and when not in their work for the armies, or when in shelter during great campaigns lives in luxurious rooms of the main generals well selected headquarters. Violet and her sisters indeed are Princesses of Angelina the whole of Angelina and all her states, but because of their sufferings and discouragements and other trials during the war, and for their being the greatest of the Angelinian spies they don't like to be called a Prince or Princess, and because they are simple, and sweet, and brave and do not pretend to be anything but ordinary little girls they are just called the "vivid girls" by everybody and are the most popular persons next to general Hannon and his brother in all the lands of Angelina.

One morning after the spy had escaped and escaped from one of the fortifications at Angelina Agatha, Violet and her sisters had been at the time in the town of Betsey Gobbin and being in one of the buildings had learned of the spy's escape and of the important plan he had stolen at once. That morning after they had heard of the news Violet crossed the hall of the building and her sisters had occupied and knocked on the door where her friend Jennie Turner was in another room. When Violet entered Violet found that Jennie Turner had company it being Gertrude Angelina. She and Jennie Turner had on some occasions accompanied Violet and her sisters on some of their most daring expeditions and was their oldest and most faithful comrade and friend. Violet and her sisters even liked Gertrude Angelina and Jennie Turner, and Angelina had too, and after Violet had greeted Jennie Turner, she said to Gertrude:

"You know that the spy had secured the plan belonging to the general in command of the fortifications at Angelina Agatha, and I've been wondering, what I and my sisters could do in an effort to regain the secret plan, or cause the capture of the spy. The Angelinian government have been so good to us that we certainly ought to do what we can."

"That's true," agreed Jennie Turner who also knew of the theft. "I've been wondering too, what we could do to catch him or recover the plans. It's pretty hard to decide, and you see it has been a long time before he was missed, and the general discovered that the board had been tampered with. Also he has a good start in his flight, and probably has got all the help he wants, and as he is a spy and knows a lot about the country here, he could satisfy any wish to elude any pursuers or pursuers whatever."

"I know," retorted Violet, "but that surely is not the point." It is not exactly that we want to get the plan for the general still in his own possession, but the spy knows about it too, and can tell it to general Mainly, and frustrate our cause. It will please us greatly to see that he is stopped before he reaches any of the Angelinian armies."

"But what shall we do to catch him?" demanded Gertrude Angelina. Jennie Turner shook her head in despair.

"I've tried to think and I can't," she declared.

"It's the same with me," said Violet.

"I know one thing that we could do to intercept him," remarked Gertrude Angelina suddenly, turning her pretty head toward the other two girls and staring at them with her big wide blue eyes wide open.

"What is it Gertrude dear?"

"It is a way to telegraph to every town or village in the possession of the Angelinians the description of the spy, and then to have him followed," said she. "It's a pretty good way to get him. But I have heard it is a strange kind of a spy. He could in a day if he knew he was followed change his disguises to all sorts of ways and colors, one after another. One minute he would resemble a Galverinian peasant, and then disguise himself as a pretty woman, and next an Abyssinian soldier or a-a-a"

"Akklebbianant!" said Violet helping her.

"That's it, and next like an Angelinian soldier, and through all the range of disguises any one may know how to perform. Just as soon as he assumes one aspect and is recognized in that, he would gain some distance on those shadowing him, and appear in a different sort of a disguise."

"He's a wonderful spy then," exclaimed Violet. "I think the authorities of the government of Angelina Agatha should know that."

"But where is the nearest signal station, and how quick can we get to it?" asked Jennie Turner.

"I don't know exactly," slowly replied Gertrude. "Angelina had told me about the location of one only yesterday, and said one signal station was in some lonely place up at the northeast of here. But it would not do us any good. We ought to go to a telegraph station. Angelina goes traveling around the country, you know at any risk, and she sees and finds out a lot of things that no one else does, not even ourselves."

"That's true," said Violet, thoughtfully. "The signal station if it is northeast of here must be near Dorothy Gale and perhaps a good way off, so let's ask Angelina to tell us how to get to a telegraph station."

So the three girl heroines went out into the street of the town of Betsey Gobbin and after some time spent in searching, found Angelina Pichee lying on a bed in a small house all alone by herself, fast asleep.

Angelina Pichee was one of the most curious girl heroines in all the story. She was jolly, always danced like a sunbeam, and yet did things that made many Angelinians totally afraid of her. She did a lot of traveling, secretly, and publicly and discovered many many things that no one would ever think of.

She is an astonishing little girl had the bravery of a lioness, and her speech was so clear that you could understand a single word, but she was prompt and would never under any conditions recede a sentence twice. She had a heart as soft, and yet as brave as the vivid girls nevertheless, was nearly as pretty as Violet and a little taller than Jennie Turner. She was very bright and clever, quick and graceful in her motions, could beat any one, even the vivid girls at horseback riding, was quick at the gun shot and had a fiery temper when aroused though appearing jolly at many occasions. But aside from all this, the little girl was good mannered, very righteous as possible and had a honest way about her that was really beautiful. For to be met by the enemy however she was the most dangerous of the lot.

"Oh Pichee dear, wake up," said Gertrude and Angelina. "We want to talk to you."

Slowly the child arose from the bed, got upon her feet, gave a fierce yawn, and then looked at the three who stood before her.

"Why do you wish to disturb me?" she asked pretending to be peevish. "You three girls ought to be ashamed of yourselves." And then she laughed and taking Violet by the hand drew her to the bed.

"Never mind joking now," begged Violet. "Do you remember telling me yesterday of the whereabouts of the telegraph station in this town?"

"Do you think you could find it if I told you. And of course I remember," said the girls.

"Well where can we find it?"

"You can't find it. It's gone," said Angelina piteously.

"How can that be?" said Violet. "We must have caught the capture of the spy who stole the secret plans of the general at Angolita's death (the poor old man). You would be glad to please him wouldn't you?"

"I'm not sure that you can find it," replied Angelina. "No. Do you think I am a fool? We cannot work unless you know and this is not the land of Oz where porosity and her old friends reside. We dare not have secret stations for fear that the enemy would soon learn everything."

"You have got the best nerve of all and maybe we could find the signal station north of here then?" said Jennie.

"Yes it's a pretty big signal station, and I'm fond of it," said Angelina. "Jennie getting up and putting on her bonnet. "But it is so badly exposed just now and we would not like to risk trying it."

"Can't we do anything to stop him before he gets to the enemy's lines?" asked Jennie.

"Yes I'm sure we simply got to do something at all no matter what it costs, and that's more than he will do anything else," returned Angelina defiantly.

Jennie turned and looked at the girl pretty well, said:

"Yes we got to do something, and if you will first tell us where the signal station is and then help us on an expedition to find or detain the spy, all the people in Angolita will praise your cleverness. The spy will be brought to the Angolitan authorities and placed on conviction, but every one will know that an Angolita helped us."

"Well," said Angelina. "I found the abandoned signal station way up north of porosity Gale where there is near by a vast Glandolinian army. There is also a river that flows through a portion of the Hic-Hollant or woods, and in the middle of the river there is a small island on which stands a strong fortress. We could get there ahead of the spy for I learned he was heading that way. If we got there first time us girls could capture him ourselves."

"How did you get to the island so quick?" asked Violet. "You ain't got wings and can't fly."

"No, but I happened to be in that location at the time and spying on the enemy. I just saw him all the while he came that way. I just saw across the river, sometimes under the water."

"Under the water?" exclaimed Jennie.

Angelina gave her a surprised look.

"Why I had to even if I had to die or drown," she said. "The enemy could have seen me and made a grave for me under the stream, but I'm sure you could never find the place alone. It has always been cleverly hidden from the Angolitians by the I Ozia Glandolinians."

"But you Angelina could find it again I suppose," remarked Violet.

"Yes; and if you want to capture the spy, I'll go with you and show you the way. But we must be careful of our disguises. Your sisters must now follow us immediately but two days later."

"That's lovely of you," declared Violet. "Jennie and Gertrude will go with you also for this is to be their best adventure yet. As for my sisters I'll give them my plans, for I must also remain behind for a day or so but I'll follow after and you must leave a trail so we cannot be lost. While you are gone I'll have to find out some easy plan to get him. But take a strong escort with you and be careful as this is going to be a very dangerous adventure."

"All right come on Gertrude and Jennie," said Angelina. "Starting to move away."

"Wait a minute," begged Jennie. "How long will he be gone?"

"Oh about two weeks."

"Then I'll put up some things in a basket to take with us," said the little girl, and ran into the palace building to make her preparations for the journey. When Gertrude, Angelina, and her two companions had started for the secret, and hidden Glandolinian signal station in the far off river to make an attempt to get there first and intercept the escaping spy, Violet wondered again, what she and her sisters could do to cause the capture of the Glandolinian spy.

she met her boy friend whose name was paired and said:

"What are you going to do to cause the capture of the escaped spy?"

"I've been thinking over it for a long time," answered the daring Angolitan boy scout. "But I cannot make it out. The spy I'm sure is gone for good and all."

Violet left him and walked slowly toward her own place where she met Gerald strolling, just going up to the front steps.

"What are you going to do to cause the capture of the spy?" she asked.

"It's a secret but I'll tell you," replied the general, who was the commander of a brigade of pink Abyssinians. "I'm having my secret army agents out on a scouting tour in every direction possible. Every region which it is supposed the spy has gone to will be secured and surrounded by the best of the Angolitan Glandolinian soldiers. That will soon bring the spy to bay and he will be frustrated. Won't that be fine?"

"I'm not sure that even in that way he will be captured," said Violet. "Do you know what I and my sisters could do to bring him back?"

"I have not the slightest idea," said Violet. "It took me three days to think of a plan to frustrate the spy, but it is too late already."

The beautiful little girl walked thoughtfully around to the back of her own home, and presently came upon the Glandolinian general, who was the moment in conversation with two of his generals.

"What are you going to do to bring the escaped spy back and frustrate him with his intentions?" asked Violet.

"I want to keep it a secret," answered the general almost sternly.

"I won't say a word," promised Violet.

"Well I'm having some of my fleetest cavalry men—all Glandolinians mind you, out to scour the whole country for him aided with bloodhounds. My friends have always admired the cleverness of my bloodhounds, so I'm sure the spy will soon be headed down and recaptured."

"I heard you could accomplish anything with those ferocious dogs of yours," said the girl. "What I'm worried about, your Excellency is what to do myself to help bring back the spy."

"That was what worried me until I thought of the cavalry and the bloodhounds," said the general in chief of the Mobilization camp. "You will have to think Princeess Violet, that is the only way to get a good idea. If I had not been cleverer to day I would never have thought of the fleetest cavalry men and the dogs."

Violet left him and went to her room where she sat down and tried hard to think. Jennie's plan just came in at the moment and Violet asked her:

"What can we girls do to bring back the spy with the secret plans in his possession?"

"Oh let him go at that, the men will catch him," replied Jennie almost impatiently at that. "It is not our work to hunt spies. We are spies ourselves."

Then at that moment Angelina's plan opened the door and strode gracefully in. Seeing her two sisters she looked at them with intelligent eyes.

"Tell me please Angelina dear," said Violet. "What way should we like best to get the spy back to our fortress?"

Angelina gave her a look at her.

"Do nothing but let him alone," said she. "Spies are more dangerous than the worst men who pursue us, than anything else."

"But it is our duty to catch him for the love of our country, Angelina."

"Then let the men do their own duty for they can travel twice as fast as we can on horseback, and we have already gone through as much experience as we ever did before. Why seek another dangerous adventure so soon?"

"That would not be truly brave to back out of the adventure," objected Violet. "Or I and even you have loved our country and God ever so much, as much as we could, and really Angelina we should want to do something to catch him, cause everyone says he knows the secret of our main general at Angolita Agathia, a once earning a new transformation of her outer works near Betsy Robin."

"Let me see," said Angelina. "How would it be to ask Penrod to go out with a regiment of his boy scouts and to find him?"

"No," Angelina said. "We would not do so. Gertrude, Angelina, and Angelina picked with Jennie, for we are on duty to find themselves pleasure."

"Then sixteen disguised Abbotinian granddaughters."

"No that is no way to plan it."

"Well then Violet dear I guess you will have to figure it out yourself," said her sister. "To my notion you are more particular than any of the generals will ever be."

Violet therefore decided that if any one could help her it would be her sister, who was her eldest and most faithful sister. But at that moment Joice was away in the quelling country not far from Dorot by Gale, a two hours ride on the swiftest horse, it being quite a journey from Ozma town.

So the little girl told her two sisters where she was going and telling them to watch out for anything suspicious anywhere want to get her own horse. Her own horse which she never used when out and away, but only on certain trips was one of the most remarkable horses she had ever rode. It was of a pure white color with a little black on its head but white hair. Violet herself had received this magnificent horse as a present from her father and Uncle's combined and so she was much attached to the steed. Her horse was a swift and most willful traveler. Her father's horse was prepared for her by her scout whom she mounted it and rode for the country with all possible speed and got there in two hours and a half maybe longer please.

"Joice dear," said Violet when she had been greeted most affectionately by her dear sister, who was a stately little girl and almost as tall as Gertrude Angelina, with extremely beautiful but dignified features and dressed in a splendid and becoming lavender gown, "what are you planning to do to day?"

Her sister smiled gracefully and answered:

"Come into my tent and I will show you."

So they entered a tent that was surrounded by the fangs of another section of the great Dolerine fortification, and which fields beyond were teeming with strong works mounted by cannons. Here in the tent were gathered the rest of the beautiful Vivian girls, whose wit and beauty and sweet dispositions exceeded all descriptions. For any boy or man it would have been and was a great honor to be made the friend of the Vivian girls. When Violet followed her sister into this delightful patio of the tent either her other sisters were busy at studying a large map.

"What map is it Joice dear?" she asked.

"I and my sisters have made a recent discovery through looking over that map," explained Joice. "I have found a way to earn general Concentration Aronburg not to come this direction at all as Penrod lays in his way with the purpose to trap him. With this big map we are studying over we have found a good location for his advancing Abbotinian armies. You will not see that the proximity of the territory of Angelina's Apathia and her extensive fortresses prevents her from capturing on all occasions and we never need to be afraid no matter what happens."

Violet's eyes were wide open as she looked at the map.

"I've never seen any so beautifully made," she said with a sigh. "But tell me Joice dear, what can I and my other two sisters do to help capture the spy who got away with the general's secret intentions?"

Joice considered this question for a long time before she replied. Finally she said:

"Of course it would be a most dangerous thing to pursue him, and all friends of ours who wish to undertake such a journey would have to be careful. So I suggest that you and we all go and make out of ourselves a fine clever searching party, and get to the location where he is heading for first."

"Oh but Gertrude Angelina and her two friends are doing that already," exclaimed Violet in disappointment.

"That may be so at that," said Joice, "but they may need our aid."

"How many boys should accompany us?" asked the girl.

"Just twenty of them," replied Joice, "for no one knows what the spy is or what he may do, although he appeared to the one who saw him duck away to be merely a young boy only fifteen or sixteen years old--as fresh and as fair as a mere child."

"A few boys does not seem to lighten the peril much," Violet asserted.

"Make it a hundred boy scouts then," suggested Joice. "Don't you remember how we just used to enter the enemy's lines to rescue some one we loved. Well we need not exactly enter the enemy's lines to secure him unless he gets there first, but you could have so of the boys surprise him."

"Surprise him in what way?" questioned Violet eagerly.

"If I told you now it would not be wise," answered her sister, with a smile.

"Think it over my dear, and I'm sure you can originate a way that will greatly ease our peril when we start on the even adventure. You can go back to Jennie and Angelina and we will be back by night fall and then we'll start."

Violet thanked her elder sister and then going out mounted her horse and rode back to her own place. On the way she thought the matter over seriously of catching the spy and the peril it would be to pursue him, and finally decided what to do better.

My dear. As she rode she reached her own headquarters headquarters in the city of Dorothy Gale proper, she went to Penrod who had a small room temporarily fitted up in one of the high towers of the fort, where he added his Boy scout lessons so as to be able to perform such duties as were required to do by the Vivian girls. Penrod and Violet and her sisters were friends, and had enjoyed some strange and thrilling adventures together.

"Oh Penrod," said Violet, "I want you to help me capture the spy who got away two days ago with the general's intentions."

"I'll be glad to do anything for you and your sisters and for my country's sake," he answered. "What is on your mind Violet?"

"I and my sisters are going to follow Gertrude and her girl friends to who are looking for the escaped spy, and all that you know."

"Very good," said the boy. "In that all?"

"We are to use for ourselves some horses captured from the wheeler glandelinians not long ago who are the swiftest horses in the world," continued the girl.

"Very good," repeated the boy nodding his head.

"And I want you to take along with you about a hundred of your best and wisest boy scouts, and twenty girl scouts, and after the horses come up to us we will all go in combat quest."

"Merely," cried the boy, with laughter. "Is that all you want Violet?"

"Almost," said she. "Can you think of anything more the boys and the girl scouts can do, Penrod?"

"Not just now," he replied. "But who will you want me to gather the boys and girls scouts?"

"As quickly as you can for you are to help us," said Violet. "In going after that dangerous spy we will need lots of guardians fully armed as a spy is dangerous in the extreme."

"I should say he is," said Penrod.

"Well you, and I and my sisters, and they will go after him, and capture him."

The boy looked at Violet with admiring approval and then he nodded again.

"That's really clever, my dear," he said. "And I see no reason why we can't do it, just the way you say, if only we can get the boys to agree to it."

"Do you think they will object?" asked the girl.

"Yes because it is such a dangerous expedition, but perhaps we can argue them into it. Anyhow it is worth trying, and I'll help you if you'll agree to allow me to also accompany you on the mission. As you wished to share in this danger I think you ought to make me your partner."

"Of course," said Violet. "I'll be glad to do so."

"Then it is a bargain," declared Penrod. "We must go to our lines at the north of the fallen run at once twenty miles from here to seek our boys at once however for it will take time to get there, and we'll have to travel a good way to the Christian lines where we left them."

"I'm ready to go and so are my sisters at any time," agreed Violet. "I'll ask general Robert Vivian to let us take the wheeler horses." "!"

Penrod didn't answer at once. He took time to think of the suggestion.

"Go on," he answered at length. "Our last horses could not get through the region and there's some extreme danger to us in going through the enemy infested country to search for our own lines. So I propose we take any old set of horses that we can secure. We can ride them as well and as there may be danger to us from skulking Glandolinians we must be fully armed."

"That's a most splendid idea," exclaimed Violet. "Let's go now and ask the cavalry leader for the horses needed. Shall we ask Evangelina to please to accompany us?"

"I think we need not ask her to share such a dangerous thing," said Penrod, getting his hat and buckling on his cartridge belt. "We'll just leave word to our friends in case they inquire for us that we will be back in a few days. And here comes your other sisters so let's get ready."

In the whole part of the region known as Zoe Gallen Run, was a section of the extensive woods all called the Mic-Hollander Forest or Woods. It is probably the biggest forests in all of Angelina or Calaveras, and stretches hundred hundreds of miles in every direction, north, south, east and west. Adjacent to it being separated from it was another big wood known as the Marie Osborne Woods and on the west side was a range of high foot hills called the Vivian range covered with underbrush, flowers of all sorts, and wooded trees on the top. One of the biggest flowery hills were known as White Pass, and Garnett ridges. The biggest hill was called Mt. Mic-Hollander and could be seen from the city of Dorothy Gale plainly.

Since the defeat of the mountain christian armies at pine Pines or Zoe Gallen Run, the latter being a little stream, this beautiful forest was the temporary abode of one of the biggest Glandolinian armies in existence at this time.

Since the defeat of the christian army at the battle of pine Pines this Glandolinian army had seldom been disturbed in their leafy leafy haunts, because there was no christian army moving that way, and as it was believed that hardly any part of the forest had ever been seen by any eyes but that of the Glandolinians it was believed no christian army would come that way to reinforce the army beaten in the terrible battle in these woods.

The biggest sections of the Glandolinian army were in positions in the forests, while the smaller sections of the army, and especially the cavalry were confined as circumstances permitted of sentries and scouting guards in the mountain underbrush at the west. So you now you must know that in this Glandolinian army there were strict orders as well as in any other of the Glandolinian armies, and the same laws were made by the generals themselves, and were necessary to keep them on the outlook for the approach of christian armies, should they appear. In consequence of this Glandolinian army was no one else but the traitor general Vivian, General Robert Vivians wicked rebellious son. And the general had three other great generals to advise and do the work for him, and to maintain order in the vast Glandolinian army,--generals his hard hammerline, Francis Acknowledgment, and Thomas Federal, who were known as the generals Counselors. All these Glandolinians were the fierce and ferocious Gazarians, and their generals were very intelligent than most Glandolinian generals are.

In spite of the strict laws of the guards there are often incidents when some Angelinian spy would get into the rebel lines and one general lost a leg on account of having been shot there by an escaping spy. The general and even all his Counselors always punished those who may be suspected of being responsible of the spy's entrance into the lines, but so clever are the nature of christian spies that nothing can be done to prevent them from getting in or out.

ward this wild forest one morning advanced two strange persons, and when near to the centre of the woods, they aligned from their horses and paused to look around.

"Here is the place for us to begin our work," said one who was Francis Jiggodoe, the old Calaveras spy.

"Do you think there is a Glandolinian army here and not a Federal army?" asked the young Calaveras spy.

"The forest here is full of Glandolinians but not Manleys," said the old Calaveras spy. "There are enough Glandolinians in the rebel army here,--right here, that if they join Sunday they would be able to capture Angelina Angitia, if we can get them to believe what we tell them. To do that we must discard our disguises so we won't be taken for Nationals, and then go among them, and tell them what we know, of our plans, and so we must decide on what way and what uniforms we had better assume while going to the Glandolinian army."

"I suppose we must have to wear our own uniforms?" said the young Glandolinian spy.

"Of course, but that requires some thought. All of the Glandolinians here are Omarians, and General Germania Vivian is their general. If we enter the lines without showing our passports we will be shot down on sight. If we go in with our own disguises we have no now, we may not be detained but shall not command proper respect."

"I wonder if the Glandolinians will mistake us for Angelinian and attack us?" asked the young Glandolinian.

"I'm a Calaveras, but one of the most famous spies, and I've have papers to identify me so the Glandolinians would not hurt me," replied Budd Jiggodoe.

"I was born in Glandolinia city, so not one can hurt me with my pass," said the Glandolinian spy.

"But in order to carry out our plans, we must win the favor of all the Glandolinian generals in a command of the army in the forest."

"When what shall we do?" asked the young spy.

"Let us remove our disguises, so we will look as we should," proposed the old Calaveras spy.

"All right," said the young Glandolinian. "You stay here and guard the horses, and I'll stroll away a certain distance and see how the land lays. As soon as I discover that everything is all right I'll come back."

"No," said the old man. "We must not separate. We must change uniforms while we are together."

"We can do that, but I must scout," asserted the younger spy firmly. "You I presume are still planning to get secret, and I won't let you."

"The eyes of the old Calaveras flashed angrily, but he did not dare to insist. If he offended the Glandolinian boy spy, he might be deserted by him, and he would not like that. Some day he hoped to be able to learn the secret words of the plan he had secured from the christian general, but just now he surely must let the boy have his own way.

"All right," he said gruffly. "Go away please."

So after they both had changed uniforms and wore their own proper ones the boy spy walked to a certain distance going completely out of sight and seeing that everything was all right he strolled back to where he had left the old man. He then quickly joined his comrades and it did not take them long to recollect the situation.

In the mean time meantime there had been a considerable trouble among the Glandolinian army in the section of the Mic-Hollander Woods that morning. Colonel Chipco had been out scouting near the outskirts of the Glandolinian army while the latter had been outside with a party of men, and they had heard a shower of bullets hit among the trees, and saw them cut down the leaves of the trees. Simultaneously Lieutenant Arx was also wounded by the same bullets and General St. Pirrip who had been in the advance of the party had been killed. The officer who survived the party knew that it was caused by some Angelinian pickets or snipers hidden somewhere in the woods, or a party of hidden nationals out to look for Glandolinian scouting parties and shoot them down, and so he urged the men on, while some others proceeded to go and picky pick up the one who had been wounded. As the first man reached for the general's body, a bullet knocked him over. Then a party of Angelinians appeared and in the chase that followed the Angelinians who were about a hundred Continentals in the row fifty sharp quills at the fugitives, and the Angelinian officer fired a shot with out Manley's orders. "The spying work however is easy for us, because we are so accustomed to it, but we cannot dare enter the National lines again unless we got a writ on a command from Manley. But untill you see if he will stay with you and advise and help you, and we will have Manley come down here from Zoo Gallon run and join you and then when the time comes we both can move on Angolinia Agathia, Manley on Dorothy Galt, and you on the latter place, and bring for Gladolinia a most brilliant victory....."

General Germania turned to his group of counselors.

"How shall we answer to this friendly stranger please?" He inquired.

"General Germania was dancing around, and cutting capers like a clown.

"On my word your excellency," he said "This man is really a spy as the paper says."

"You act like a fool," said General Rambo.

"Well over the discovery that we have so great a spy in our midst we feel fine," declared the general.

"I think I'd prefer to leave Angolinia Agathia alone," said General Bru. "I never was born to be a reckless man no matter how brave I am, and I know the ways of the Authorities of Angolinia Agathia too well."

"What said the old Calverinian?" Is because you know nothing better." But when we have finally conquered Angolinia Agathia, you will be glad of it."

"General Germania yivian rested his chin on his hand, and seemed thoughtful.

"The whole command of generals in my command must decide this matter for themselves," he said. "Go you general Rambo, and tell all your generals and their staff officers to order all the highest generals and lower commanders to assemble in the great clearing at sunrise tomorrow. When all are gathered together, this great spy of Manley's shall talk to them and tell them what he has to tell us. Then if they decide to advance on Angolinia Agathia, I will lead my whole army for the siege."

General Rambo turned at once, and rode swiftly down the road toward his own camp. General Bru gave a disgusted grunt and rode away. General Germania remounted his steed. Then he said to Juggles:

"Meet us at sunrise tomorrow," and with a swift rush he and his horse vanished down the road.

The old Calverinian was much pleased with his apparent success.

"To-morrow," he said to his young spy companion "We'll have all these armies of Germanies moving against Angolinia Agathia, and we'll win on the Christian dogs. Then I will have my revenge on Gertrude Angeline, her friends and the old yivian girl kids, and all the rest of my enemies."

"But I'm doing all the work," said the young spy.

"Never mind you are going to get the commission I promised you," said the old Calverinian.

"Will general Germania yivian really decide?" asked the boy spy anxiously.

The Calverinian came close to him and whispered:

"Surely he will and if any of the Christian dogs opposes us we can show them how we can fight too, and we will soon render the Christian armies helpless."

"Of course," agreed the young spy, and he said to himself:

"I shall also as soon as possible desert this deceitful old Calverinian, for he lies and I cannot trust him."

THE STRANGE SIGNAL STATION, AND WHAT IT LEAD TO.

Angeline Ritchie was a very good guide, and led Gertrude Angeline and her friend by the most straight and easy paths, through all the parts of the Angolinian country near Angolinia Agathia encompassed by immense Christian armies, and then into the north section, where there were few encampments of any kind, and the finally through a wild and strange country, where there were no encampments, or even paths or ways. But the riding was not at all difficult, and at last the three girls came to the edge of a small or large forest, and stopped there to make camp and sleep until morning. From the branches of the trees, the three little girls made a tiny house that was just big enough for the three little girls to crawl into and lie down. But first they ate some of the food that Jennie Warner had carried in the basket.

"Don't you want some too?" she asked of Angeline Ritchie.

"No," answered the child heroine.

"I'll suppose you will hunt around and make a raid for something to eat," remarked Gertrude Angeline.

"We make a raid without any soldiers or boy scouts to help me. Why should I do such a rash thing as that?" inquired the guide.

"Why then you could be a still greater heroine," said Gertrude.

"I beg to inform your graciousness," returned Angeline, "that I have no desire to make a raid, and furthermore I'm not a bit hungry. Being without hunger, and being alone without any boy scouts or soldiers, I'd look no nice wouldn't I with wounds of bullets all over me, and ready for a grave because I was so reckless. But the fact is that I have no appetite that would permit me to eat things to-night, --in fact for some unknown reason or other I don't feel well."

"You are not sick are you?" asked Jennie Warner feeling alarmed.

"Not exactly sick, but don't feel like I should. Of course you know I don't want to complain, at the way I feel, for I have never been ill before. I have been one of the healthiest girls in the world so far if I'm not wrong.

I believe I am taken with a fever or something, as I feel achy all over and have a dry sore throat and a headache."

"I wonder," said Gertrude thoughtfully, "as she ate her bread and jam; "If you haven't got the Grippe or the flu or something."

"No and I hope not surely, not while on this important trip at least," returned the little guide. "For if I were to become so sick that I would not be able to proceed on the mission, and the whole three of us would have to go back."

Angeline Ritchie however was not so ill as that, but all night long she was disturbed by the sounds of distant firing but he was confident that she had her guns ready and it would protect her and her friends from harm. And in fact no rebels ventured from any section of the forest to attack them. At daybreak they were up again, and after a simple breakfast, Gertrude Angeline said to Angeline Ritchie who claimed she felt a little better:

"Let's forge ahead. I don't suppose we are far from the signal station you mentioned."

"Not far," answered the little girl, as she led the way into the forest. "But it may take us some time to get to it, and we will have to be careful when we go on that we don't be surprised by rebel scouting parties."

Before long they reached the bank of what they supposed to be a great river, and probably the Mid-Hollander Run. It was not so very wide at this place, but as they followed the banks it gradually broadened until it was very difficult to see the land on the other side of it. After traveling some distance the river made a sudden turn, and after the travelers had traveled around the long bend, they saw that the stream had become so narrow as to be as a sea itself, for they could not see across it at all, and further down on a high hilltop they beheld something like a small skeleton like structure narrow and tall. Something glittered on top of this structure which seemed to be not more than a mile away and Angelina picked her pause on the bank and said:

"There is the signal station, which is very curious and very beautiful. If we can get to the hill without being seen by any one, our task will soon be ended and by hanging in hiding up there we could watch and see if the spy and his companion would approach this way. Then we could surprise and catch him."

Gert rode Angelina and her companion looked at the broad expanse of water first, and then at the hill with the signal station on top of it, and began to whistle a low, quivering tone. Jennie Turner and Angelina picked knew that Gert and Gertrude Angelina was thinking, and the little girl did not look at the signal station as much as she looked at the trees upon the banks where they stood. Presently she took from her bigger pocket of her - coat a small axe blade of some sort, placed in a small scabbard to keep the sharp edge from cutting through her pockets. Then with a large steel axe she cut several small limbs from a tree, and started whittling them.

"Sit down girls," she advised her companions, as she started working. "I've got quite a job ahead of me now, for I have got to make three staffs for a number of signal flags which I have in my other pocket."

"What do we need three signal flags for, Gertrude?"

"Why so we can warn each other if there is any sign of danger. We can't all go up on the top of the small scaffold of the signal station, so two of us must remain below. I'll go on top."

"Can you make the three staffs very quickly, Gertrude dear?"

"Of course Angelina if you give me time."

The two little girls sat down on a log, and he gazed at the distant signal station far in the distance. There was no tree, no shrub, no grass near the signal station even, as far as they could make out from that distance. But whatever was on the top of it glimmered in the rays of the strong sunlight, and the two girls could catch the glimpse of two glowing colors above it.

"When I was here before," remarked Angelina, "I saw two glandelinians belonging to the Whimsies on the very bank inspecting something, and they had other rebels with them known as Kalidaha, S Growlows, and Panfalus and also Zimmermannians with them."

"What kind of glandelinians are the Kalidaha?" asked the girls. "I thought creatures with that name were fierce animals living somewhere in Oz."

"They are the most powerful and ferocious kinds of glandelinians in all of the glandelinian armies. This forest had hidden two of these miles to our rear a strange vast glandelinian army in its camp. All Christian scouting parties are spy enough to keep out of the way of the fierce Kalidaha glandelinians, which attack women and children as well as men and priests."

"Did they try to capture you when you saw them?" asked Jennie Turner looking carefully over her pistols, and getting very much excited.

"Yes, they sprang forward toward me in an instant, but as I could not escape I threw myself flat on the ground, so I would not be taken by them and when they lunged at me from that position, I shot them down as fast as possible and I laughed and jeered at the survivors until they were frantic with rage, for I nearly shot ten of them down out of thirty six in a few minutes. Go after a time not being armed with guns at the moment as I was, and realizing I was such a good shot, and discovering that they could not catch me or injure me with their lances which they hurled at me, they went away cursing and swearing to themselves and telling me they would get revenge on me yet. It was great fun."

"I hope any of those glandelinians don't come here again--not while we are here anyhow," returned Angelina picked. "or then it may cause our plans to be frustrated and there is no telling we may get hurt too."

Gert Gertrude Angelina was cutting the last limb from a tree, and making it sharp at one end and leaving a crook at the other end. She had finished the third one when Angelina picked cried:

"Look out! There's a whole group of glandelinians coming toward us and they are Omarians."

Jennie Turner jumped up, greatly frightened but held her wits, and looked at the group of terrible Omarians, as if fascinated by their fierce presence, for the glandelinians were looking at her too, and their looks were not at all friendly. But Gertrude Angelina called to her:

"Wade into the river Jennie, up to your knees--and stay there but shoot if necessary." And she obeyed her adviser at once. Gertrude Angelina stood still with her pistol drawn, and then got between the girl and a tree and awaited the glandelinians who sprang forward with a cry of defiance. Gertrude Angelina was as quick as she could be. Out of the seven glandelinians approaching she brought down four seriously wounded with good shots, and Angelina picked brought down two others afterwards so that the seventh was the last left to be opposed. As he sprang toward Gertrude with a blasphemy, she struck him between the eyes with the butt of her pistol with all her strength, and sent him rolling upon the ground. Then before it could get to his feet again, Jennie Turner came from the water and assisted them to bind the man. By this means they captured the seventh glandelinian, and made him helpless, for try as he would, he could not undo the knots the little girls fastened, and he howled, threatened them and cursed and swore something horrible.

The little girls did not wish to kill the glandelinian, and after seeing that the six others were not able to do anything and having relieved them of their weapons, they stood back and watched the glandelinian wriggle and struggle to get free, and growl and blasphemy, and satisfied that the others were in too bad a condition to get away from where they lay, and that the other one could not escape either, Jennie Turner proceeded to dry her wet stockings and shoes in the sun.

"Are you sure he or his comrades cannot get away and spread the alarm of our presence?" she asked.

"I'll bet a dollar on it," said Gertrude Angelina, and now Jennie had taken off her shoes and stockings, and laid them on the log to dry, while Gertrude resumed her work on the last staff. The glandelinian realizing after many struggles that it could not escape, now became quiet, but he said in a harsh snarling voice:

"I suppose to these girls think you are clever to tie me up and leave me lie on the ground in this manner. But when my comrades from the camp come here, they'll cut you to pieces for treating me and my comrades this way."

"Perhaps," remarked Gertrude and Angelina, "only as she worked at the stick." And perhaps not when are your other comrades coming here?

"I don't know and I would not tell if I did," admitted the Glandelinian. "But when they do come, you cannot escape them, good shots as you are."

"If they hold off long enough, I'll have my staff ready," said Gertrude.

"What are you going to do with that staff?" inquired the rebel.

"We don't reveal any of our intentions."

The glandelinian looked at her in surprise for a moment or so, and then it began and then he began to laugh. The laugh was followed a good deal like a cuss, and it had a cruel and derisive sound, but it was a new laugh neverthless.

"You three are going over to that signal station and I suspected it. Good."

said the Glandelinian. "Good, very Good. I'm glad you are going to the signal station. But what will you do when you get there?"

"We are not going to tell any one our intentions and I told you before."

The glandelinian laughed again, and then he became sober.

"If you got to that abandoned signal station before my fellows and comrades come and catch you," he said, "You will not even then be safe from us. We can swim and go through water like fishes, so the little girl who went into the water could not have escaped so or my comrades you shot down by getting into the water, but we glandelinians don't use that signal station over there."

"Why not?" asked Jennie Turner.

The glandelinian was silent.

"To us the reason," urged Gertrude.

"Well it is only a common signal station, but we don't care to tell our secrets either," said the rebel. "If you had not seen us so soon as you did, you could not have shot down any of my men that way and captured me."

"I've been to that signal station," said Angeline, "and I have looked at it from a closer distance than this is, and I'm sure it's too good a snare to be not laced in such a lonely place. So we are going to be on it for some certain reasons for which we will not reveal."

"I don't care," said the glandelinian in a sulky tone. "We glandelinians would be just as well off without it."

"Good are the things any how, and you three girls are also handsome," said the rebel.

"No, not when they are Christian dogs!"

"You ought to admire and fall in love with us girls any how," declared Angeline, "because we are beautiful and some day you can marry the three of us."

The glandelinian only growled in reply, and Gertrude Angeline having not cut the three staffs to their proper size, began to fashion the three differently colored flags to them, after having controlled out of sight of the glandelinian.

The day was nearly gone when they came within full view of the station. "It ain't too very big at that after all," said Gertrude Angeline. "I don't think I weigh so much, and you Angeline, don't weigh as much as I do I'm sure, and Jennie's weight don't count."

"But it is safe in it," said the latter girl. "I looks rickety..."

"Yes if it is good enough to hold a couple of soldiers it is good enough to hold us, and that is all we can expect of it."

Saying this Gertrude Angeline continued on, and as they approached the signal station, the glittering substance above became more plainly visible, and both Gertrude and Angeline decided that it was safer than supposed but Jennie was suspicious, but she felt the glandelinian had known something about the signal station that he could not tell. The colors of the flag cloth that Gertrude Angeline had placed on the whittled staffs were strikingly bright and beautiful and the shapes of the devices were varied and curious. Indeed they did not resemble any while ordinary flags at all. So intently did Angeline, Jennie and Jennie gaze up at upon the three flags that they scarcely noticed the signal station itself, until they at once almost right in front of its lower section.

But then Jennie Turner exclaimed:

"How funny it is Gertrude, that nothing else is within sight here but just the station, and not even anything hardly is growing around it, it..."

Gertrude Angeline placed a hand around the hill top and saw that it indeed was all bare ground, without a weed, or a blade of grass, and there was evident signs all around that the signal station must have been continually under fire. Jennie Turner eager to see what was on the top of the signal station that shined so brightly in the sun, sprang up the ladder sections of the stations and continued up like a monkey until she reached the top. When she stood beside the strange thing and was filled with wonder. Gertrude Angeline and her companion joined her, coming more leisurely, and they also stood in silent admiration for a time.

"I guess we will like this," remarked Angeline, "because, sitting down to watch the movements of the three colored flags. I'm sure we could see the approach of the spy a better from here than anywhere else."

"Do you suppose we have under undertaken a most dangerous risk, Gertrude? And can we get back down later on without being under fire?" asked Jennie Turner anxiously...

"Well I have been in bigger experiences than this," she replied, "but let's see what we can do."

She started to take a step forward when something from the platform came down of all of a sudden and falling on the air feet held them so fast that they could not lift their feet from the platform. Gertrude left leg seemed free enough but the other held down by the weight it would not budge.

"Now two soon held down, Jennie," she said, with a perplexed look at the narrow beam. "It's only a beam, and it ain't long, but it is heavy and holds our feet down."

Jennie attempted to remove the board, or lift her feet, but the board held them fast as it held Gertrude's feet and neither the one of them were strong enough to lift it off. The two little girls tried to slip aside them loose, or to twist them loose, but it was no use, they could not give the feet a lateral breadth.

"This is funny," she exclaimed, "but do you suppose has happened to us, Gertrude?"

"I'm trying to make out," she answered. "Take off your shoes Jennie. Perhaps you can get your feet free then."

She and Gertrude leaned down and unlaced their shoes, but they found that from the weight of the board on their feet they could not even get their feet free of the shoes. And the shoes who had been placed on the board, and which had however been given a force a shock on the shoulder, was standing around as naturally as ever, and now said:

"Your feet is held down by the beam, Gertrude, and I can see that it is too heavy for the three of us to lift. It's the same with Jennie. What's why you can't move. The thick board holds your feet."

Gertrude Angeline could not see her own feet very well so much they were held by the board, but she squatted down and examined Jennie's feet, and decided that Angeline's shoes was right.

"This is real hard luck," she declared, in a note that showed she was uneasy at the discovery. "We are prisoners Jennie on this signal station, and I like you to know how we are ever going to get loose from the board, so we can get down again."

"How Jennie why then a glandelinian we once made a prisoner laughed at us," said Jennie Turner. "And why he said none of his soldiers ever came near this station."

The horrible man knew he would be caught by this trap, and wouldn't warn us. In the meantime the glandelinian although tied fast, was facing the signal station and now the uplift expressed which had passed over his face, when he defied and answered at the three little girls, had changed to one of almost amusement and curiosity. When he saw the three adventures had actually reached the signal station, and were standing on its top beside the glittering object, he heaved a breath of satisfaction—a long deep breath that swelled his deep chest until the rebel could feel one of the cords that held his arms move loose a little, as if becoming untangled.

"Ah, he he," murmured the glandelinian. "A little more of this and I will be free, and I'll escape and bring as many glandelinians as possible to the signal station and have the one three National girl scouts captured."

So he began breathing and struggling very hard, puffing out his chest as much as he possibly could with each indrawing breath, and by doing this he managed to make the knots become more loose for every powerful breath, until at last the glandelinian—using the muscles of his arms and legs as well as his very deep breath—found himself free of the ropes at last. There was one rope around his hands or wrists how however which he had not succeeded in getting loose but finding a sharp edged rock deeply set in the bank he drew the rope back and forth over the edge until he had cut it in twain. Then by removing all of the rope from him he managed to get free entirely.

"Here," he exclaimed. "Except for the one bruise between my eyes, I'm as good as over, but I must admit that at the one the little girl she devils saved themselves by making me a prisoner and wounding my six comrades." Not the glandelinians, although the most disagreeable and fierce people in all the story, were nevertheless humans as well as any one of us, and in their natures a certain amount of good was mingled with the evil.

Of a course the glandelinian was not very well or very thoughtful I mean, and now that his late christian love was trapped and in danger of being fired on by a concealed barbarian, or in danger of capture, his sugar against him on faded away. So without paying any more attention to the three girl barbers, then they were paid a paying to him, he cut and the forest, and examining his wounded comrades for a moment promised to have add sent to them, and trotted along a secret path, that led to the hidden lair of the Glandelinians. While the glandelinian was making good his escape, Gertrude replaced the flag in her pocket and then tried to think what could be done.

"Angeline is too young all right," he said, "and my left leg did not get caught by the beam either. So it's only us two that are caught by the beam."

"It's the weight that does it Gertrude."

"I know Jennie, and that is what sticks me. We were now in a very dangerous territory, and neither of us three are able to lift off the beam, and so we can't help ourselves."

"Couldn't the yivian girls help us--or the old boy or girl scouts, or some Angol Angolinian soldiers?" asked the little girl.

"Ah, now we are beginning to reason," Gertrude answered. "I would have probably soon thought of that myself, in a minute more. By good luck / luck indeed Angeline Angeline picked up a still free, and so she can run back to the christian lines, and tell violet and her sisters about our fix, and ask them to come and help us or send us aid."

"All you go!" Jennie asked her friend, speaking very earnestly.

"It's not that, kind to go and desert friends when they are in trouble so I'll remain here too," asserted pichos in a kind of sulky tone of voice.

"Well," said Gertrude Angeline, "We have got to get back home or secure the spy one or the other, and I know you don't want us to stay here & take a hit. So if you realize the importance of the mission you will take the chance and go and tell the yivian girls what has happened to us."

"That's true," said Angeline pichos. "I don't mind telling violet and her sisters what happened when we got home."

"Won't you go now?" pleaded Jennie. "We don't want to stay here on the signal station any longer than we can help, and everyboy in the Angelinian army will be interested in you, and call you a heroine, and say nice things about you because you helped your friends out of trouble."

"I know it," said Angeline pichos. "But the christian lines are a good distance from here and suppose you are captured when I'm gone. Then I would be the one at fault for deserting you."

"But you are not deserting us," insisted Gertrude. "We have the free use of our arms and no glandelinian could reach us as long as our ammunition lasts. The only way they can get us is blow down the station and they don't know we are here yet."

"I'll right then I'll go right away," said the girl reluctantly. "And I'll tell the yivian girls to come and help you. But I feel like deserting you while in trouble."

saying this she climbed down the onehundred foot length ladder to the ground and then disappeared in the woods beyond. Not being able to manage three horses alone she selected her own and rode down the way she had come as fast as her horse would go and her two friends saw her disappear on the farther side of the bank, and then ride into the forest, where she was quickly lost sight of among the trees.

Then Jennie heaved a deep sigh.

"Gertrude," said she dimly. "We are in a bad fix. There is nothing here to eat, and we can even lie down to sleep or shield ourselves in case we are fired upon by shell or grape. Unless Angeline pichos is not detained and is able to hurry and the yivian girls hurry, I don't know what is going to become of us."

There was indeed a most tremendous and wonderful gathering of many glandelinian generals in the Mic-Hollester woods next sunrise. General rango Tamerline, had however placed more sentinels on guard duty, and every officer of low or high rank were in the great clearing, where most men of great importance was to be held. In the centre of the clearing stood a great tent, and in front of it stood the state ly glandelinian general in a high, germania yivian. Beside him on his left stood general pur, generala Comda, and a generala, the generala three advisers, and in front of them at the "Attention" stood the two strange glandelinians who were the spies. Then came the officers and generals, rows, and rows of them. The officers of the highest rank were nearest to the main general, then there were the colonels, and captains and majors, and the like, and behind them gathered the non-commissioned officers. Many officers were nervous to be sent down, were there, and some were unlike any of the glandelinians I wrote about in the former volumes. Some were from the camps west of the forest, and some from all the plains at the east, and some from opposite the river, but all present acknowledged the main leadership of Germania yivian, who had lead them wisely and forced all to obey the military laws. Most of the officers belonged to the germania, the germania, the germania, and grow laywong, and the other kind, next the germania, after them the zimmermannians, the hollesterians, the germania, and the germania, farth on the fierce scolders and Confessionians, and at the far edge of the forest was a long solid line of privates, still at attention, but with eyes bright and alert. When all the officers had taken their places in the clearing, and the rising sun of the morning day was showing its first bright rays over the treetops, general germania took several steps forward and saluted them all, and they returned the salute abruptly. The generala's giant form, and his fierce stern features caused a sudden hush to fall on the whole assemblage.

"Germania and brothers," he said in his deep fierce voice. "A strange spy has come among us from Germania lines, dressed in a curious uniform, and who has papers which show by Manley's hand that he is the most famous of spies that Manley has or ever will have, and is able to do anyt thing at his will. This strange or has come to us, with another of his kind after escaping from the christian fortifications at Angolinia Agathia, to warn us of a danger which threatens us all, and to offer us and our whole army a way to escape from that danger. He says he's our best friend, and he had proved to me and my counselors by showing the papers that he is the spy. Will you listen to what he has to say to you--to the message he has brought from polarine Mic-Hollester fortress?"

"Let him speak please," came in a great roar of voices from the great company of assembled generals and other officers.

So suggested the Old Galverinian spy stood upon a high platform not far from general germania yivian, and another uppour of voices, gentle this time showed how astonished the whole assembly of officers were at the sight of his curious uniform. His face and chin was covered by a snow white beard, his uniform was decorated in red and yellow stripes in front, and he had powerful arms and legs. Never had any of germania yivians officers, and generals beheld such a curious man, or a most curiously dressed man before, and so the very sight of the Galverinian stranger, who was said to be a great spy, filled all present with awe and wonder. His young companion stayed down below, and half hidden by a group of trees, was scarcely noticed. The boy realized the old Galverinian was helpless without his own help, but he also realized that the old man was the best talker, so he was willing he should take the lead.

"Generals and all other officers in command of germania yivians army," began francis suggested, the old Galverinian spy. "My comrade and I are your friends. We are two great spies, and from where we come from we could look down into the whole region of fortified Angolinia Agathia and Gerrothy Gale, and see every thing that is going on. Also from our many places of concealment I alone could hear what the authorities of Angolinia Agathia, and the generals of the immense armies and garrisons were saying. What is how we heard general Ben Osmannia in the main command of all at Angolinia Agathia work, say to his many christian dog generals."

"There is a vast glandelinian army hidden in a portion of the Mic-Hollester woods, and are of a great menace to us. Let us send four armies, surround the forest and capture the glandelinian army or drive it off one or the other. Let us put our armies so tightly around them, as if they were tied by ropes, and surround them with all our strength, until they surrender to us, and so on." and when the general generals and his other staff and his soldiers heard this, they were glad and raised a great shout and said: "We will do it. We will surely do it. We will go against the Glandelinian army and either drive it from the woods or capture it." The wicked old Calverinian spy could say no more, but then, for such a fierce roar and yell of anger rose from the multitude of generals and other officers that his voice was drowned by the clamor. Finally the roar of voices died away like distant thunder, and afterwards the old Calverinian spy went on with his speech.

"Having heard that a general at Angelina Agathia is plotting to capture your army, we watched to see what they would do, and saw them all begin making preparation to advance. You are angry, but we also were angry, for when the Angelinians are the enemies of Glandelinia, they also are our enemies, for we too are loyal to Glandelinia, although I am a born Calverinian. And my comrade and I said:

"We will save our friends and comrades, and have our revenge on the Angelinian people! and so we came here to tell you of your danger and the danger your army is in, and of our plans to save you."

"We can save our army ourselves." cried an old Glandelinian general. "We can fight like fury."

"The Angelinian crisis at Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Gale are overwhelming, a hundred go to your aid, and you can't fight against them without disaster unless you have help to help you." answered the old Calverinian.

"Tell us your plan." "Shouted a colonel, and the other officers echoed his words, saying: "Tell us your plan."

"My plan is simple," replied old Huggodoo. "By our quickest methods we can telegraph to General Ithia, tell him of your danger and he will come here from Zee Gellon to defend you, then when reinforced he will lead you on to Angelina Agathia. you can seize and ruin or live in all the fine houses in the city of Angelina Agathia, and then surround her, and eat the fine foods of the Angelinian people. and you can seize all their little kids (children) and drag them here to the forest, and make them serve as slaves in the army, make them go and forage on their own friends and hunt food, and fight for food, and often go hungry as all other slaves still do, and have no place to sleep but a bed of leaves or a hole in the ground, on without shelter of any kind. Having captured Angelina Agathia all us Glandelinians will then win the rebellion, and will soon have all the comforts we seem to desire, and having defeated them, the Angelinians will become very miserable. That is our plan, and if you agree to it, we will await the arrival of Haulley's army, and when he has arrived we will all march at once into the region of Angelina Agathia, and quickly conquer our enemies."

Then the strange man ceased speaking, a great silence fell on the huge hall, for all the generals were thinking of what he had said. Finally one of the Whites said:

"Can you really telegraph to General Haulley in fifteen minutes?"

"He can—he can," cried general Ionia, prancing up and down in an excited manner.

"He has papers also to prove it."

General Germania Iyian himself now stepped forward.

"You have heard the stranger speak," he said, "and now you must answer him. It is for you to decide. Shall we agree to this plan or not?"

"Yes," shouted some of the generals.

"No," shouted others.

And many were yet silent. General Germania looked around the great circle.

"Take more time to think," he suggested. "Your answer is very important. Up to this time we have never tried to capture Angelina Agathia ourselves, but we are proud enough to make the attempt. Think carefully, and when you are ready to answer, I will hear you."

Then arose a great confusion of sounds as all of the officers began talking wildly to their comrades. The non-combatants or non-commissioned chattered like monkeys, the generals growled in anger and the sound was like a babel of confusion indeed in mood, in head, such a hubbub had never been heard in this part of the forest before and each officer argued with his companion until it seemed as if the noise would never cease. Huggodoo the old Calverinian waved his arms to try to make them listen to him again, but no one paid any attention, some generals wanted to fight the armies defending Angelina Agathia, some wanted to knock out if, and some wanted to do nothing at all, while the rest decided to wait for the arrival of Haulley.

The growling of the voices and the confusion of sounds had grown greater than ever, when in a flash sudden silence fell on all the officers present, the arguments were hushed, and all stood in astonishment at a most strange sight. For in the center of the clearing rode a Glandelinian boy, more powerful than any other Glandelinian they had ever seen, and on the back of the horse rode a most handsome but dirty looking boy never known before who appeared to be smiling fearlessly at the multitude of officers and generals there. And behind the little boy came another horse of a black color, who bore upon his back a funny looking little girl carrying a small black flag. Right past the rows of wondering generals and other Glandelinian officers the stranger rode, advancing until they halted just before the tent of Germania Iyian. Then the first little boy and the funny looking one dismounted, and the boy demanded in a loud voice:

"Who is the general in command of the army in this forest?"

"I am," answered general Germania Iyian looking steadily and closely at the boy. "The general Germania Iyian, and I'm the commander of the army in this forest."

"Then I and my companions greet your Excellency with great respect," said the funny looking boy. "Perhaps you have heard of us and my companions, your Excellency. Well these papers prove to you who we are," and he handed a paper envelope and as Germania took out its contents and glanced over it carefully his eyes flashed angrily.

"You," said he. "I have heard of you. You have long claimed to be the most famous boy scout of the Glandelinian army, but no boy who I do not know or never seen before can stay in my lines whether he had papers and names or not."

"He has been sent to you by general Haulley, your Excellency," answered the other little boy. "And he is Gerald Starring."

General Iyian looked at him. All the other generals and officers were looking at him and his companions too.

"Who are you, you clown?" asked the general addressing the funny looking boy.

"Met Oh I'm just a boy scout," he answered.

"How dare you come here with out being invited," demanded the general.

"Why I'm not afraid to go anywhere, if my boy friends are with me," he said.

"I know them all pretty well, and so I can trust them. Not one of us is ever afraid of anything, not even when we get into a trouble, and all of us are terrible good shots though boys, and when we once get into a scrape there is no one even here who can conquer us with guns."

"General Germania Iyian looked at the seven or eight little boys, and realized he spoke the truth. Also the other officers in the seats came forward forward, and bowed, low before the boys.

"We welcome you, Your Graceful Excellency as boy scouts of Glandelinia," said one.

"We have known you several years ago, before you came to join the Glandelinian army, and we have seen you several months ago fight the terrible Iyian army and conquer and capture them, so we know you are the best boy scouts of Glandelinia."

"It is true," replied the handsome little king boy, "but we did not come here to remain in your army. General Germania Iyian is your Graceful Excellency here, and I believe he is a good general and a wise one. I come with my friends, to be the guests of General Germania Iyian, and I hope we are welcome." "If"

This pleased the great Glandelinian general, who said very quickly:

"Yes you at last, are alone to my forest camp. But who are these six boys with you?"

"Gerold Starbuck has introduced himself," replied the funny looking boy, and you are sure to know him when you realize him longer. This boy with the black flag is Frederick Dargor Dargor, a friend of mine, who can do wonderful tricks of spying. . . and the others are my tried and true friends."

"Are everyone of you boys scouts?" asked general Glandelin.

"We are certainly indeed," replied the funny boy, answering the question himself.

"We were following the trail of three girls known as Gertrude Angelina, Jennie Turner, and Angelina Pichea when we came here."

"Can't you find the one dandily spies without coming here to disturb us?" ing uired general Glandelin.

"There are plenty of chances to do so," said the boy. "But unfortunately we were pursued by enemies and lost our guns and ammunition in doing so. So we need ammunition to go on and need a little to eat also for we are hungry on hearth."

Now all the surprised generals in that clearing, were abashed indeed, but none were more surprised at the sudden appearance of the eight strange boys as the old Calverinian was. He was frightened too for he recognized them as his most powerful enemies, but he also realized that they could not know he was the former escaped Calverinian spy, because of the strange disguise he wore, which disguised him so effectively. So he took a courage and resolved that the strange boys should not defeat his plans, for they were none other than the Vivian girls in disguise and posing as Gerold Starbuck and his companions.

It was hard to tell just yet, what the vast assemblage of officers and generals thought of the new arrivals. Some glared angrily and suspiciously at them, but more of them seemed to be curious and wondering. They were interested, however, and they kept very quiet and listened carefully to all that was said. The younger Glandelinian spy who had remained unnoticed in the shadows of the trees, was at first alarmed by the coming of the seven or eight strangers than even Haggadee was, and the boy told himself that unless he acted quick, and without waiting to ask the advice of the old Calverinian, their conspiracy was likely to be discovered, and all their plans to cause the capture of Angelina Agatha would be defeated. The younger spy also did not like the way Haggadee acted either, for the old Calverinian spy wanted to do everything in his own way, and made the boy who alone possessed the secret plans he stole, obey his orders as if he were a slave.

Another thing that disturbed the young general was the fact that the Vivian girls and their boy scout Penrod had suddenly appeared or arrived which ever the sense may be, who were said to be able to detect any patrol parties, and so if they discovered him or his comrades could cause his capture right away. All these things passed through the mind of the Glandelinian boy spy, while the Vivian girls and the Glandelinian general were talking together, and that was why he now began to do several things. He found a place near to the point where to where he stood, where the road was a deep hollow tree, so hiding in the hollow tree, he drew his rifle or his pistol from its holster and fired at the boy who was Violet in disguise. The shot fortunately missed Violet, and Violet who had been standing with a smile on her face beside her horse, suddenly saw his form stagger, and then he fell to the ground and struggled. Violet cried out as loudly as she could:

"Frenson. There is a traitor here firing upon us from ambush."

Very one even the Glandelinian officers were startled at the sky, and Jennie Vivian seeing her sisters horses killed before her eyes, screamed and exclaimed:

"Mercy me."

But the next instant there was again the sound of a mysterious shot, and Jennie felt a bullet go past her cheek dangerously close, and at first the little girls were too bewildered to do anything, but look around them in wonder. Penrod's eyes seemed to flash fire, but he stepped behind a tree, warning the Vivian girls to do the same and they all gazed around to discover who the treacherous sniper might be. But the young Glandelinian spy who had kept himself hidden in the hollow of the tree, again fired a shot, and Penrod was struck in the arm and wounded. The boy was now wild with anger but seeing no one he was helpless to do anything as he could not see any smoke following the shots.

the old Calverinian however saw what was happening, and was afraid that by his reckless attempts to shoot the Vivian girls that he would spoil his plans, so he went toward the hollow tree and shouted:

"Stop shooting you fool, stop."

he boy would not stop firing however. Penrod seeing the man stepping over toward the hollow tree fired his own gun, but missed. Violet and her sisters had now witnessed the scene, and was watching to see who was to blame for the shooting.

When the old man spoke to the boy in the hollow tree, Violet knew that he was the one hunting at them and her and her sisters, so she made a sudden spring, and darting from tree to tree as carefully as possible made a race charge for the hollow tree. The old man did not see the apparently boy scout coming because he had his face turned toward the hollow tree, and Violet brought the pistol butt down on his head with such force that he staggered and fell on the ground utterly sent sense an unconscious. The younger boy seeing he was outwitted and several more girls moving for him with drawn guns and finding his pistol was empty and having no time to reload, he sprang out of the hollow, and tri trying to strike Violet down with his fist, reached for a tree and climbed up like a monkey, where he was sure no one could apparently reach him. He was not an instant too quick in doing this, for the rest of the boyscouts had come up and two of them proceeded to climb the tree after him. From his tree the boy spy hurled down a hard apple and laughed aloud to see how she fell from the blow. The officers and general thinking more enemies were hiding in ambush became frightened and instead of going to the aid of the supposed boyscouts, and fearing that they would be fired on began a stampede every one going off as fast as they could. The generals backed into the forest, and all the other high or low rank, rushed after them, sattering through the jungles until the clearing was far behind. The Vivian girls had scrambled up two or three trees near the one the boy had gone up into and swung themselves carefully from limb to limb, to avoid being seen by the boy, and to prevent him from shooting, and they were so quick that they almost surprised him. A panic of fear however seemed to have taken the Glandelinian boy spy, and after desperate efforts he managed to get away and as far away from the "Terrible Vivian girls" as he possibly could.

Violet and her sisters however were unable to get him and were therefore compelled to go back to the clearing being so astonished and bewildered by their experience that they could not look at one another in only a dazed and helpless fashion, although each one of them was greatly annoyed at the trick that had been played on them.

"Who was that young sniper anyway?" asked Violet. "And why did he attempt to shoot us, and who is his companion?"

"I'm not sure," said Violet.

"Maybe he was an Angelinian mistaking us for boy scouts of the enemy," said Angelina Vivian.

The young Glandelinian boy spy, dressed like a Glandelinian dandy, who had indeed scrambled into the high trees or thick branches in order to escape the daring Vivian girls who had been after him, and where he felt sure no one could see him, and having secured the black flag lost by Penrod, and which he had found and carried away in his flight he proceeded to examine it and see if it was anything very important. He was curious to see why the boy had used the flag, and what it looked like, and hoped he could use it for the same purpose in case he would again attempt to enter the Christianavines on another spy spying exploit, and secure more power to do his work more successfully in the future, but after he had looked over it carefully, and each design or form on it once by one he had to admit that the flag was a puzzle to him. For unless he understood its use, the flag was of no value whatever. The young Glandelinian spy, was no wizard or magician at all and so he could not do anything unusual, except to make use of the strange plans he had stolen from the Angelinian general in command of the fortress at Angelina Agatha. So he hung the flag to a limb of a tree and then climbed down to the lower limbs that he might see whether the Vivian girls were still looking for him or not, and if not what they were doing.

They were on top of a large flat rock, talking in tones so low that the wily young glandelinian boy spy could not hear what they said. He believed Violet and her sisters had given up the search for him. . . .

"It is certainly a most strange circumstance," remarked Penrod who had made Jim himself look like a funny lad. "But the spy or person who fired at us in such a manner is some who crept in the trees, and in such a situation which is easy to see his cause of his capture if we were sure he is a rebel--when you know he fired at us, and caused the glandelinian officers to run to the lines for their lives. And the most important thing we had about us was the black flag, but where is the black flag?"

No one knew that, for none had seen the glandelinian boy spy get away with it.

"Let's look and see if we can find it," suggested Angelina Vivian. So they left the high ledge of rocks, and all of them first searched the clearing high and low without finding the flag or the flag of strange color known only to the soldiers and which they had used to deceive the enemy with. Penrod searched earnestly at the same time, for he hoped he could discover it, he meant to hide it with the glandelinians and never find it.

Because if the glandelinian generals awoke, and probably with a large force of soldiers, the Vivian girls would be in danger, danger and if they were recognized by the glandelinians, the girls would be going for Germans.

Germania glandelinian never missed a shot when they fired. The old glandelinian himself had recovered from the blow and having risen to his feet he had staggered out of the clearing and hid himself. He was not really sorry now that he thought about it, that violet that the young glandelinian spy had fired at the Vivian girls. The glandelinian officers it was true had been so frightened, that they would never consent to be moved against Angelina Agathia now for fear he and his young companion and the others were secret enemies, but the old glandelinian decided to notify Manley who could make Germania do it against his will, and once Manley came and advanced toward Angelina Agathia, it would not be impossible to induce Germania and his army to advance against Angelina Agathia also. So all was not yet lost, thought the old glandelinian, and the best thing for him to do was to rejoin the young spy, who even unknown to him had the secret plans in his possession. So having made sure the black flag once in the possession of the Vivian girls was not in the clearing, the old male or human goose wandered away through the trees and when out of the hearing of the child heroines, he began calling the boy spy.

Violet and her sisters and Penno Penrod not being able to find the black flag, went back to the ledge of rocks, all feeling exceedingly strange and blue.

"Here the old fellow Joice knocked down with her pistol!" asked Penrod.

"He must have recovered and ran away," replied Jennie Vivian. "I wonder who he was?"

"I think," said Catherine, "that the old man was the stranger who who proposed to be the greatest spy on earth for these papers. Joice found on him proves it to be so. If so the boy who fired at us was merely doing it for a trick to deceive us, or to intercept our own plans, and it is therefore probable he has gone to rejoin his young companion, that wicked glandelinian boy scout, who obeyed all his commands."

"What shall we do now?" asked Hattie. "Shall we go back to the Christian lines, as we are, and then visit the main generals of the camps of Angelina Agathia, and ask him to have the country combed for the rascals?"

"I think so," replied Daisy. "And we can take Penrod who is injured with us, and have him taken care of. But I hate to leave that code flag behind us, for without it we shall not be able to get through the territory back to the Christian lines without danger. Also if we go back to the Christian lines, in the shape we are in, the Angelinian soldiers at Angelina Agathia and elsewhere will think we are poor investigators, or poor spy trailers, and will lose their respect for us."

"Let us make still another search for the flag," suggested Jennie, "and then if we fail to find the black flag anywhere here in this forest, we must go back to Angelina Agathia as we are."

"Why did we come here like fools any way?" inquired Penrod.

"Why the generals of the rebels happened to be in our path before we could avoid them," explained violet. "We did not know there was a glandelinian army near, and he having come so suddenly into the air what we had to do something quick to prevent ourselves being discovered. We faced our own wicked brother too, and we had to pretend something, even at the cost of lives, otherwise God help us. You know lies in case of great necessity, when not willful are not sins."

"We," said Daisy, "would have to get the consent of any one now to do that. And how are we going to get out of here at that?"

"I'm afraid it is too late now, and that in some way or other we are trapped," said Angelina regretfully. "It was a splendid plan to follow Gertrude and her three companions after the escaping spy, but we did not know it would come to this, and we have got troubles of our own, and I don't like being fired at in ambush at all."

"We had a nice scare and excitement anyhow," said Penrod.

"That's nothing," declared Jennie. "I have never been especially proud of being under fire at that, but I would rather be under fire while being chased, or while near a battle line, than being ambushed or anything else like that in the whole world."

Angelina Agathia had realized that Gertrude Angelina and Jennie Turner were her best of friends, and so was quite disturbed at the fix which she believed she had gotten them into by leading them to the strange but treacherous signal station. Her heart was almost the same like the heart of the Vivian girls, and she had also a consideration for others. At first when she started from the station she had moved very slowly as not to attract any rebels, and her horse had only gone on at a slow careful trot until it had reached the bend in the river, and was out of sight among the trees of the forest. Then she headed straight toward the Christian lines, and urged her horse on so fast that it seemed like a long line of cloud of dust trailing along the road or crossing the small valleys and plains. Having a good horse that was not easily tired, and with no reason of delay in her journey, Angelina Agathia had reached the other encampments near Dorothy Gale in wonderfully quick time. -- get your dime. . . .

"Where is violet and her sisters?" she asked one of the soldiers. "Soldiers, who was a sentry, and pausing up and down in front of a camp."

"I don't know where they are," answered the sentry.

"I must find the Vivian girls or get some soldiers at once," said Angelina Agathia.

When she found him, advised the sentry in a lazy manner.

Agathia gave him an angry look and retorted:

"I'll report you for your conduct, and then darted down the camp company street as fast as she could go, and came upon General Toto, the friend of violet and her sisters who had come to Angelina Agathia with them during his first expedition with the little girls."

"Where are the Vivian girls?" asked Angelina Agathia halted in front of him.

"The Vivian girls?" he exclaimed. "Why they have gone on a strange journey with their boy scout friend Penrod." replied General Toto.

"When did they go, and where have they gone please?" demanded the girl.

"They went this morning, and heard them say they would go through the Hollister forest for a short cut, in the Munchkin State of Angelina."

"Dear me," said Angelina Agathia, "what a long journey."

"But the y rode on the swiftest horses," explained the general. "And the boy with them carried a black flag. They are disguised as boys."

Angeline knew the whole stretch of the "go-blesser" woods well--for she had traveled through this forest many times in her journeys through the land of Angeline, and with armies. And she reflected that the "go-blesser" woods was nearer to the river or the signal station, than Porothy Gale was, and so if she could manage to find Violet and her sisters in time, she could lead her across or through the woods, to where Gertrude Angeline and her companion were imprisoned on top of the signal station. It was a wild rebel-infested country, and little traveled, but Angeline knew every path. A very little time need be lost after all, and she was worried for fear enemies may come and attack her two friends while pointed up on the station. Without stopping to ask any more questions, Angeline urged her horse onward for the Christian lines and soon darted out of the lines and away from Porothy Gale, taking the noisy direct route to the "go-blesser" woods. Again she and her horse flashed through the country like a streaky cloud of dust, and it would surprise you to know how quickly she reached the edge of the great forest. There were no glandelinian guards along the trees to cry out a warning, and this was so unusual that it astonished Angeline. Going further into the forest she presently came upon a lone soldier, which at first bounded away in terror thinking she was an Angeline boy scout. But then seeing it was she was only a girl, and he not being a cruel glandelinian as others were stopped, and the girl could see the graycoat was trembling, as if from a terrible fright.

"That's the matter Mr. glandelinian soldier!" asked Angeline, "Ichee with her hand on her pistol in case he would attempt to attack her."

"A dreadful number of snipers have come into our woods and are shooting down our officers or tried to do so," exclaimed the lone glandelinian, "and he they are firing on every one within sight boy or man--quick as a wink--and making us all fear a big ambush."

Angeline Ichee smiled and said:

"Why that is only some good little boy friends of mine. They may be trying the bravery of you glandelinians and having some fun with you at your own expense, but the boy scouts would hurry any one for anything unless attacked."

"I don't mean those eight boys," explained the man, "and if one of the boys is that funny little kid who rode a skinny horse into our clearing, he has been wounded himself by the snipers."

"The boy shot by the sniper. Why that's impossible," declared Angeline Ichee.

"No it isn't impossible. I saw him with my own eyes get shot in the arm, and the boys who were with him narrowly escaped with their lives, and one of them lost his horse, which was killed by the snipers."

Angeline Ichee was indeed very much surprised.

"When did that happen?" she asked.

"Just a little while ago in the clearing. All the officers met there for a council, but fearing of being caught in a big ambush and shot down in cold blood they all ran away to their lines. When the snipers began their storm of firing, and I'm thankful, escaped without getting a sniper's bullet into me. But Kim still afraid, even though not a coward, and I'm going back to the lines to prepare for the attack which is sure to come."

With this the glandelinian not recognizing her as Angeline Ichee ran on, and the little girl heroine, who knew where the big clearing was, went cautiously toward it, with her gun drawn. She walked very slowly, for a short distance, and then dismounting for better care walked slowly along side her horse, and she was thinking carefully over the amazing news the excited glandelinian had told her. When the girl reached the clearing, she saw seven girls and a boy wandering around in an aimless sort of way, for they were again searching for the lost black flag code. Angeline Ichee watched them for a moment, to make sure they were in the "vivan" girls and not rebel boy scouts, and finally recognizing them, walked slowly into the open space leading her horse on by the bit. At once Violet ran toward her crying:

"Oh sisters, here Angeline Ichee!"

"Here Violet!" asked her sisters in a chorus.

"Here."

Her sisters and Penrod now came running up to join Violet, and they all stood before Little Pledge Ichee, and opening again to her almost like a chorus, asked:

"Have you seen the black flag Angeline?"

"Often," replied she, "but not lately."

"It's lost," said Violet, "and we must find it or we cannot get out of the woods."

"Are you Penrod?" Angeline Ichee asked of the funny boy.

"Yes, miss."

"And who are these others? Really the 'vivan' girls?"

"I'm Violet," said Violet herself.

"I'm Joice," said her sister.

And her other sisters had immediately identified themselves.

Angeline Ichee stood beside her horse and looked over them seriously, and almost laughed for she was humorous.

"My, what a funny lot you are in your disguises," she exclaimed, "but who are the ones who played the joke on you?"

"It's no joke at all," declared Violet. "It was a cruel wicked nature of sniping us girls from ambush, and the one who did it was a young glandelinian boy spy or fool dressed like a glandelinian dandy."

Angeline Ichee laughed again.

"That glandelinian must look funnier than you do," she said, "where is he now?"

"Somewhere in the forest," answered Joice. "He just jumped into that tall oak tree over there, for he could climb like a monkey, and then while we tried to catch him by climbing after him, he disappeared into the forest."

"And there was another one who was an old man," added Angeline Ichee.

"What became of the old man?" asked Angeline Ichee looking carefully around.

"He must have gone away to find his friend," answered Jennie Ichee, "but the old man could not travel very fast, so we could easily find him if we wanted to. But we don't want him. We want the young spy."

"The worse thing of all," said Hettie Ichee, "is that the black code flag is lost. If I could find it we could easily get through any section of the rebel lines without being detained, and we could get back to the lines again. Will you help us search for the black flag, Ichee dear?"

"Of course," replied Angeline Ichee, "for it was my own signal code flag. But I expect the strange boy spy you mentioned carried it away with him. If he is a crack shot, he knows you need that flag and perhaps he is afraid of you girls. So he has probably taken the flag with him, and we won't see it again, unless we find the boy."

"That sounds reasonable," said Hettie Ichee. "I'm glad you came to our assistance."

"If Angeline Ichee is right," said Joice in a solemn voice, "there is more trouble ahead of us. That glandelinian dandy, though only a fourteen-year-old boy is dangerous, and if we go near him he will surprise us before we know of his presence. He may shoot us down like dogs."

"I don't see how we can be worse off," growled Peter Penrod, who was indignant because he had lost the black flag.

"Anyway," said Catherine Ichee, "our best plan is to find the boy spy at any risk, and try to get the black flag from him. We may manage to steal it, or perhaps we can argue him into giving it to us."

"Why not find the old Calvinian first?" asked Daisy. "The old man may be angry at the boy, and he may be able to help us."

"That isn't a bad idea," retorted Peter Penrod. "Come on girls, let's find the old human goose. We will separate and search in separate or different directions, and the first who finds the old man must bring him here, where we will all meet again in an hour or so."

Now the old Galverinian was even more angry at the young Glandelinian spy than were the Vivian girls who had been fired on by him. Being one of the wickedest kind of men indeed, the old Galverinian detested anything in the way of children, especially the Vivian girls, and he had also heard that the Vivian girls, in that is violet and her sisters and their four girl friends were feared by all the Glandelinians more than anything else in the world, and also the old Galverinian was ashamed of the manner he had been outwitted by the girls, and his young Glandelinian friend also, and it would make him shudder to reflect that some of the Vivian girls may see him and lay him low.

So the old Galverinian was afraid of an ambush, and afraid of every one around him at that. If any of the girls ever fired one shot at him, he then could be destroyed or killed as they never missed unless they intended to do so purposely, and almost almost any one of the girls he might meet in the forest alone might conquer him, and if he was captured and brought to the Christian lines it was surely the end of him. Added to these fears however, he was filled with anger against the young Glandelinian spy, whom he had always meant to trap, by stealing from him the secret plans he had in his possession. He also believed the boy must have been absolutely crazy to spoil everything the way he did, but the old Galverinian knew the sudden arrival of the Vivian girls and their boy companion, and feared the spy, and he was not sorry the boy had fired on the Vivian girls. It was his own defeat or outwitting, that annoyed him, and made him indignant, so he ran about the forest, hunting for him, so he might get a better place, and coax the boy spy to follow his own plans to help the Glandelinian generals conquer and capture Angelina Agathia.

The young Glandelinian spy, had not gone very far away, for he had surprised himself as well as the others by his quick shots, and was puzzled as to what to do next. Hugh suggested the old Galverinian was overbearing and tricky, and the young spy knew he was not to be depended upon, but the old Galverinian could plan and plot, which the younger boy was not wise enough to do, and so when he happened to finally look down through the or from the branches of a tree, and saw an old man walking about and heard him dry our. "Where are you boy spy?"

The boy answered in a low voiced voice. "Here I am," and saw him hanging himself down to the lowest limb of the tree.

The old man looked up and saw him.

"You have bungled things in a most dreadful way," exclaimed the old Galverinian. "Why did you do it?"

"Because I had wanted to," answered the spy. "You acted as if I were your lowest slave, and I wanted to show these dangerous Vivian girl scouts that I'm more powerful than even you or them put together."

The old man hissed softly, but the young spy did not hear that. The old man quickly recovered himself, and muttered to himself.

"This boy is a go go and it would be better for him if he wore a sharp shape of the goose. I will be gentle with him now, and fierce with him when I have him in my power." Then he said aloud to him.

"Well hereafter I will be content to acknowledge you my master. You have bungled things as I said, but we at all can tell our generals how to conquer the city of Angelina Agathia."

"How do you make it out?" asked the young spy.

"First let us go to a secret hiding place, and then we can surely talk together more conveniently," suggested the old Galverinian.

"Wait a minute then," said the young spy. "I want to see how near those girls are first." And he climbed higher up the tree.

The boy soon came down predicting everything was clear.

"Good," said the old Galverinian, well pleased, as the young spy joined him by dropping down from the tree. "Now let us find a quiet place where we can talk without being overheard by the Angelinian girl scouts."

So the two started away and crossed the forest until they came to a place where the trees were not quite so tall and large, nor so close together and among these scattered trees was another clearing, much larger than the first one. Standing on the edge of this clearing and looking across it, they saw the trees on the other side or the woods below at least full of tents and swarming about with Glandelinian soldiers, who were talking together at a great rate of the night they had witnessed at the most ing.

The old Galverinian whispered to the young spy not to enter the clearing, or allow the Glandelinians not to see them.

"Why not?" asked the boy drawing back.

"Because the Glandelinians are the fiercest warriors, part of general Germania Vivian's army—which we wish to see come conquer or capture Angelina Agathia," said the old Galverinian. "Sit down here with me please, and keep quiet, and I will explain to you my plan."

Now with the young Glandelinian spy nor the old Galverinian had noticed that a shy and pretty looking boy had followed them all the way from the tree where the two had been seen in conversation. Indeed this boy was none other than Grace, who had poured himself, and who now had decided that he would watch the two Glandelinian conspirators, and see what they would do next.

With a brave face he moved through the woods very softly, without making any noise, and so his Glandelinian enemies did not suspect his close presence. But when they saw down by the edge of the clearing to talk, with their backs toward him, he did not know whether to risk being seen and shoot them both down, or creep closer to hear what they said, or whether it would be better for him to hide himself until they moved again.

While he considered this serious question, he discovered near him, (which was certainly fortunate) a great tree, so on a spruce, which was thick and had a hollow trunk, and seeing that there was a hole in this wide tree about four feet above the ground the boy decided it would be safer for him to hide inside the hollow tree, so he sprang into the hole, and crouched down in the hollow so that his eyes just came to the edge of the big hole by which he had entered, and from here he watched the forms of the two rebel spies.

"This is my plan now," said the old Galverinian to the spy—speaking so low indeed that he could only hear the growl of his voice;

"Since you are such a good crackshot, and do any kind of shooting you wish without a moment's delay, we will hunt up the Vivian girl spies, and when we have found them, or see them, we will shoot them down before they suspect it. Then we will not be hindered further."

"The Vivian girls are not easy to find, and they won't make much of a loss to the Glandelinians either," objected the young spy.

"We need to do this or we will not be able to carry on our plans. We need a great army and a numerous one but we will have to put the Vivian girls out of the way first," responded the old man. "You will shoot them out of the way of the Vivian girls. There are seven of them, and once we have them out of the way we need not fear anything further."

"What shall we do with their bodies?" asked the boy. "Isn't it extremely dangerous for any one to try and kill the Vivian girls?"

"But we can do it easily in this woods," said the old man. "It is true that the Vivian girls are important Princesses of Angelina, and that it would be a dangerous thing to kill them, but here no one would know who did it but the Glandelinians themselves and when we have done it we can hide their bodies somewhere or at least they may be cut into thousands of small pieces, and while every piece is taken we can wrap it up into something and throw it into the river so that their remains will never be found. When they are gone and it is proved the Manleys and their armies will gain courage, and swoop upon the Christian armies in such a manner as to scatter the Angelinian armies in all directions, and place them into such a condition that they will be quite helpless. Therefore with the loss of their Princesses and the defeat of the main armies, and with Angelina Agathia captured the remainder of the Angelinian army will be afraid of the fury of the Glandelinian armies, and we will conquer them with ease and bring the war to a happy end with victory on our side."

"That seems like a good idea," replied the boy, "and in such a case we need not bother any more with the generals of Germania's army until the deed is done!"

"No you have frightened them, making them think that a force of Angelinians were swarming them into ambush, and they I'm afraid would no longer consent to assist us in conquering Angelina Agathia until we have got the Manleys to come and force them to do so. But the Vivian girls are foolish creatures beautiful as they are, and once we have put them out of the way, we can tell Germania Vivian of it and they will have courage enough to consent to do it. Could you shoot them down all at once?"

"No I will not take one at a time," said the young spy. "I will go alone and find them, and I will shoot the first villain I see."

"Where are you going?" asked the old Calvinian.

"I must be alone when I attempt this desperate deed, and would be nervous when doing it in the presence of another person," declared the young Glandelinian spy, who was determined not to allow his treacherous companion to learn his secret ways. "So I'll go where no one will see me."

Haggard the old Calvinian was disappointed, but he hoped at all to catch the boy unawares, and surprise the secret plans he had in his possession, as he wanted all the credit for their capture from the Christians himself. So he merely nodded his head, and the young spy got up and started back into the forest a short distance. He passed the hollow tree without being seen by the boy in it, and continued on. The young Glandelinian spy ran past the tree the boy perceived himself ducked his head so that he was out of sight in the dark hollow beneath the hole, and then he got out and started to follow. He nodded and whispered to himself;

"I hope I can capture that little rebel before he starts his infernal work." Then he ran after the rebel, but the boy felt sure he had been followed, and went faster. When he instantly stepped behind a tree that was so big and tall that it stood higher than all the other trees.

"Good," said the boy spy. "One of the villain girls is following me."

Penrod had observed the spy as he slipped behind a tree himself, and putting himself carefully out of range of his adversary he drew his gun and waited. The rebel however did not budge from his place but remained still behind the tree, and it was impressed on Penrod's mind that the rebel spy was showing that he kept edging from tree to tree as carefully as possible until he had gotten as near as possible with out being observed. When the boy decided he would try an experiment. While the boy spy was not observing him, Penrod worked himself nearer and nearer until he was two trees around to the rear and instantly he rushed upon the spy, and in a moment had him prisoner and had taken his guns from him. Penrod was delighted he had captured the boy so easily, and started forward with him just as he observed the old Calvinian following. The old man saw the two boys, one a prisoner of the other so he hastily rushed forward. Penrod did not know how poor powerful the old Calvinian spy might be so he resolved to take no chances and forcing his prisoner in front of him against a tree, stood behind and waited for the rebel to come on. He then fired a shot but the bullet only took away the old man's hat. Being forced to keep his prisoner as close to him as possible he had missed his first shot, for he did not handle his gun in the right way, and the rebel spy was not hit. But the old Calvinian knew at once he had the Anglinian boy scout leader to face, so he rushed to a tree, and cried;

"Release that boy you have a prisoner there you goons and I'll leave you alone."

But Penrod did not answer the Calvinian rebel, and he fired but the bullet only struck the tree and Penrod was not harmed. The old spy now began firing, as fast as he could, hoping to bring the Anglinian down, and Penrod, hanging to the tree and the prisoner at the same time was somewhat troubled by the fear that he might succeed. However the brave Anglinian boy scout, who was used to his gun, remained calm, and soon fired a shot that struck the old man right in the knee and brought him down. Then the boy seeing the man trying to fire while laying down fired another shot that struck the pistol from him and then before the rebel could drag himself forward to get it, went from the tree with his prisoner and running up pointed his own at the Calvinian and demanded to him to surrender. He helped the old man to his feet, and carefully bandaged his wounded knee, both he and the boy spy helped him to the big clearing. Violet and her sisters uttered cries of delight when they saw their old friend Penrod come with the two prisoners. They crowded around the prisoners, and asked Penrod what had happened. Before he explained anything he told of his own adventures and how he had by chance surprised the two spies, and been able to after a short pistol duel to capture both though he wounded the old man.

"But see here," exclaimed Violet, "what has become of the rebels who were firing upon us."

"I have one of them right here and it is the boy," admitted Penrod. "But I suppose he will regret it now since he and his companion are prisoners."

Jennie, Nurmer and Gertrude Angelina stood on the top of the signal station, actually held to the spot by the weight of the heavy beam which through the object it not when it fell, prevented it from falling down further and crushing their feet under it. They were in dire peril for should the enemy batteries be trained upon the signal station they would say good bye to the world right there.

"Aren't you afraid?" asked Jennie Nurmer, with a long sigh, for she had been standing there now for hours and hours and no relief was in sight.

"We'll pop!" replied Gertrude Angelina. "I'm not saying that I am not afraid, Jennie---if any kind of unseen danger is near---but I guess other people have had worse experience than we do and came out off whole."

"I'm not so sure about that, Gertrude," she said thoughtfully. "Age and bravery might make a difference, but it seems to me size would make a bigger difference. Seeing that we are children and not soldiers, you know the Glandelinians may be far worse and exert all their efforts to slay us if they see us."

"I hope they won't see us then," Gertrude rejoined. "For other wise I cannot stand it any longer. I do hope Angelina's sissors will hurry, and I hope that God will make it that Violet and her sisters, or soldiers which ever they are won't waste any time coming to us."

Jennie Nurmer sighed again, and watched the distant enemy encampments over a mile away, because there was nothing else to do. Just now she saw a lovely group of pink colored flags rise from the nearest point of the enemy's lines, but soon they descended and seemed to fade away in smoke, and as the mass of deep gray smoke poured forth there was a noise like thunder in the distance. Then something burst in the sky that spread out in a form like a large yellow chrysanthemum. It was right overhead of the station but nothing else happened.

"It's something wrong," said Jennie Depatiently. "I actually do believe the enemy has seen us and are firing."

"They are mighty slick to be able to see us at such a great distance," observed Gertrude Angelina.

"I know and if some of the Glandelinians would come and even take us prisoners it would be a finer thing than to be left up here under fire, but to have to stand and watch the shells bursting over or about us without a chance of getting away is not so much fun. I wish Gertrude dear they would fire at our beam and cause us to get loose."

Scarcely had she spoken when right near the beam of the station which held down their feet was a sudden big puff of smoke like a white ball, ball, and the two girls were shocked by the noise with a cry of mingled fear and anger. Jennie reached out and tried to pull the beam off her feet, but finding it impossible. Gertrude Angelina was too dazed by the shock and noise of the shell at the sudden wish of the girl being seemingly granted so fr quickly, so before she could believe whether the shell had done any thing to free her feet or not, the smoke faded away, and small tongues of flame took their place. The bomb had started a fire.

"Gosh now we are in for it," exclaimed Jennie Nurmer and even while she struggled to get her feet loose, she seized the beam with both hands and exerted all her strength with the intention of tearing the board loose but of no avail. Gertrude was still bewildered. He indeed did try to struggle loose, but in vain, for the beam was too heavy for her and nil no efforts of hers or her friends would move it out of its place.

"Behave," cried Jennie Nurmer. "We can't get loose from the old thing; but watch out, Gertrude that none of the shells hit us."

A great explosive now burst high in the sky above them and rained down fragments and deadly missiles but none however hit the signal station. Then another shell exploded where the first one had and fortunately though it done more damage, put out the fire.

"Can't my monkey with these Glandelinians," Gertrude remarked. "Cause they are starting to get our range."

"Well it catch a shell and ow." Advised Jennie Turner who instinctively inclined to a joke despite her peril, but the shelling was increasing now, and a deep purple cloud of smoke arose in front of them being blown in their faces by an explosion. Again the little girls felt a pan panic seize them, and Jennie said to Gertrude: "We ought not to have got up here in the first place. If we were more careful, we would have missed this sharp experience. Here let's try our efforts to get loose again! Even as she spoke six shells exploded in the sky above them almost simultaneously so covering the sky with smoke which was stabbed by the red flashes, and Gertrude Angeline hesitated no longer. She grabbed with both hands and worked in her efforts to remove the beam like one possessed, and Jennie did the same, but almost gave in exhausted.

"It's curious," gasped Gertrude. "How the beam gave way when we got up here in the first place." "The whole thing is curious," declared Jennie, "and yet no such beam could have been on here or any signal station existing in the country. It is a trap. Those are grapeshots Gertrude, look out for them. Don't let the fragments hit us for they mangle you so, and--Ooo, here comes high explosives." And she made a movement as if to dodge the explosions that followed. The little girls felt their end was now up but both were too plucky to give in without a struggle, so they again began working like mad to draw the beam off their feet but in vain. But after they had stopped to rest, they were surprised to notice that the explosions of shells had ceased.

"I wonder why they stopped firing," mused Jennie Turner, who was not worried because she had enough of the experience already and inwardly thanked God the rebels had failed their marksmanship.

"Well maybe they ceased only to draw their cannons within better range." Said Gertrude. "And maybe that is the reason. And perhaps if they get the range, we'll go to head heaven."

"But why should we remain here and die like rats in the trap?" asked Jennie Turner who was a girl who would die hard rather than give up. "I'm not a coward and don't intend to be one under any odd conditions."

"I guess," replied Gertrude, "that this signal station is a trap, and any folk folks caught caught on it would be killed or snipped or left here to die of hunger."

"Do you think if I asked God earnestly to cause the beam to remove from us it would do it Gertrude?" Jennie inquired anxiously.

"What are you thinking of, Jennie? Don't you know things from God now--adnys only comes from natural means."

"Well I think if I try we may be free. We could at least try it."

"Alright then, try it Jennie!"

she tried it praying as hard as she could, but it had no effect whatsoever. "Try it yourself if Gertrude," she suggested. "Maybe your dead sister would come and help us."

Then Gertrude Angeline prayed, with no better result.

"No," said she. "It's no use, the prayers only affect for natural means and this here would be a miracle. But I'm glad to know that they have ceased firing any way and probably in the meantime hap will arrive and surely we won't starve before the vivian girls or soldiers get to us."

"But I'm getting tired standing here so long," complained Jennie. "If I could only lift one foot a moment, and rest it, I'd feel much better."

"Same with me Jennie. I have always noticed that when you have got to do a thing, and cannot help yourself at all, it gets to be mighty hard pretty quick."

"Folks that can raise their feet, and also who are not in your position just how don't appreciate what a blessing it is," said Jennie Turner thoughtfully.

"I never knew what fun it was to be able to raise my feet any time you feel like it until I'm trapped here..."

"There are lots of things that people do not appreciate," replied Gertrude.

"You know if some one probably the glandelinians would sit on our breath, we would think breathing was the finest thing in life. And when people are well, they never realize how jolly and good it is, but when they get sick, they surely remember their time when they felt well and happy, and wished that the time would surely come back. Most folks even forget to thank God for given them a sister or a brother, till they lose their sister like I and you did, and then it is too late, except to look for a chance to avenge our loss, and to praise God for leaving at least our only friends..."

"Your left leg ain't so bad Gertrude," Jennie remarked, looking at it critically.

"Any how it is not rooted tight under the beam like your other foot."

"I'm not complaining," said Gertrude. "What is that coming toward us, Jennie?" She added, looking toward the river.

Jennie looked too, and then she replied.

"It's a long rowboat of some sort. It looks like a dugout, or a canoe, only I never saw a boat have so many colors. It looks like a dog and crazy quilt."

The boat approached swiftly and gracefully toward the shore near the signal station, and as it drew nearer its gorgeously colored sides astonished them. The sides and inside of the boat were of many colors of glistening green, blue, and purple, and it had a yellow bow, with a red mast, and a pink, white, and violet sail.

When it reached the shore, it was rowed ashore, and then a single man got out and approached the signal station, and then mounted up to the side and stood up on the platform eyeing them critically.

"You folks are cottonily strangers here," said the man standing there and viewing them critically, and "and youse cottonily have been caught by the beam and made prisoners."

"Yes," returned Jennie Turner, with a sigh. "We are held fast. But I hope we won't be fired on again."

"Youse cottonily will," said the man who was dressed in a Calverinian uniform. "Youse will keep on being fired on for day after day until bye and bye a shell will hit you and blow you to nothing unless add ranches you. That is the usual way on this island signal station."

"How do you know about it, and who are you anyhow?" asked Gertrude Angeline sizing him up.

"It's my own business little girl," replied the man. "I suppose youse have hold of me?"

"No said Jennie Turner. "I can't say I have, but makes you refuse to tell me what or who you are."

"Why because I don't know youse," returned the man.

"I'm Gertrude Angeline and this is Jennie Turner," said Gertrude herself.

"Oh so youse are the famous christian spies do I take ye to be so?" exclaimed the man.

"Please to meet youse. I'm a Calverinian spy in the service of general vivians army. But I have no families or any relations at all."

"Haven't you any friends?"

"Yes I have but I cannot count them. And just now as I have nothing to do I'll do what I can to help youse loose. I've been a long time in the christian army and I've got to get youse loose so youse can help me in my work, because I'm looking for two glandelinian spies who stole general puggedocannas plans, secret plans. Think of the nerve of those spies. Can you wonder the whole country is scourged for them. I'll bet they caused this to happen to youse."

"Why didn't you bring a number of boy scouts with you and have them do some thing?" inquired Gertrude as the man started to tug at the beam.

"I have sent every boy scout and girl scout and many men that I know can do the work--man child, or soldier--for the occurrence of the spies deed is certainly disagreeable to me. In a few minutes I hope I'll be able to free youse, for I cannot bear to see youse in this position any longer, and I'll not go away and leave youse either come what may."

Said the man as he struggled vehemently but in vain. "But yet as for doing anything, it seems no use in it. All I do is tug and pull and it won't budge an inch."

"Don't you think you could pull us loose?" asked Jennie Turner.

"Yes I can but you will be without feet then. Wait a minute. I'll go down and be a back. I've left some tools in my boat and maybe I can pry it loose." He went down, and in a few minutes came up again with a great crowbar and a couple of blocks and other things.

"You must be a military engineer." remarked Gertrude Angelina.

"Why so?"

"All the tools you have there shows it."

"Try but that is not the reason. I took them from the boat itself which had the tools when I stole the boat from the rebels and got away in it. You must remember that when I'm in a hurry I don't care what I take as long as I can get away with it. You must also remember that I'm the only Calvinian Christian spy in this neighborhood just now, and I would not like any glandelinian to come and find me unarmed for all the world."

"Seems to me you like to fight them with tools." observed Gertrude Angelina.

"I can't say I like it exactly." replied the man as he started to work with his long crowbar. "but once it seems to be by my fate of having found them, I'm rather proud that I have something to help you go girls get loose with. As for fighting with the enemy, I got two good guns besides, an ammonia grenade and a sack."

"How do you suppose a single spy happened to come our way and see us like you did?" asked Jennie, wondering thinking of her prayer.

"I think it was a God send, but I'm not too sure of it either." declared the spy. "The reason for things are never so important as the things itself, so there is no use remembering anything but the fact that I just came here. But I hang it this beam is certainly stubborn. I've broken the crowbar."

"I guess you had better give it up." asserted Jennie. "If you can't do anything for us, you can at least get help for us, and then you could get us free."

"Now you are getting foolish." said the man. "I'll not go and leave you."

"I'll get you out of here or stay here until you are free. See the point?"

"But then can't you help us some other way?" pleaded the girl. "If there is some other thing you could use, you might succeed in getting us out of this scrape."

"I haven't anything stronger than the crowbar was." replied the Calvinian.

"What ever else I have is just the blocks I intended to use to place under the beam when I raised it, but I find the crowbar is busted and I don't think I can do anything with the short end but I'll try again."

"At least if we could sit down for a little while, while you work we could stand it a little better." said Jennie. "But we have nothing to sit on. It's tiresome."

"Then you will have to stand it I'm afraid because there is nothing here."

said the man.

"Perhaps you can secure something down below which could be used as two seats."

suggested Gertrude Angelina.

The man seemed to reflect for a moment, looking down at the ground sharply. Then he said:

"Down below there are some small logs. Perhaps I can bring them up here but they are mighty heavy."

"Well if you can bring them up they will do." answered Gertrude Angelina.

"Then I'll go down and get you a couple." said the soldier, and began descending.

He went down to the bottom and searched around for several minutes, and after ten minutes had passed, they saw him appearing with something solid under one arm. While they were waiting for him they saw something strange in the sky.

Something like a light, for it was growing dark now, seemed to wobble about in a small circle. It went around the circle to the right three times, and then it went around to the left three times. When it hopped back towards the right three times, and forward three times. Then there was the sound of an explosion and it disappeared.

"What was that?" asked Jennie.

"I cannot tell, it was strange, putting me in mind of a wizard incantation."

replied Gertrude Angelina. However now they heard a succession of soft queer noises, in the sky that sounded like strange quacks of a duck, and yet seemed to mean nothing at all. These sounds kept up so long that Jennie finally exclaimed:

"Gertrude can't you make out what that is. If you cannot do so you are not much of a girl scout leader."

"It is some kind of signaling about the enemy, and it puts us in peril, as they are massing guns upon us at a better range." said Gertrude. "If the man does not get us free soon things will become too disagreeable for us." At this Jennie kept quiet, and yet the strange quaky mattering continued. When the man appeared on top with something in his hands and these appeared to be two wooden boxes he had found in the woods.

With a cry of pleasure the two little girls ran back upon the boxes and found them to be very comfortable to sit upon. When both were seated, they found the man working desperately at the beam.

"Thank you ever so much." cried Jennie and Gertrude cried or called out; "you are obliged," but the man was too busy now to pay any attention, and finally after a minutes desperate work he got Gertrude free. Without even looking to see whether he had accomplished anything or not, the man went to Jennie. "Jennie," and Gertrude after easing her aching foot helped him but she was held more firmly and the two of them were absolutely working in vain.

When the girls first came within view of the signal station they had observed that on that hill a top it stood about one hundred and fifty feet, and although the trees that did grow on the hill were somewhat scattered, the signal station was a big and high that it quite filled the spaces in which it stood, and branches of trees pressed it on every side. Of course the little girls had been foolish to climb up to the top of the trick signal station, for now they could not get down alone as their feet had been injured slightly by the pressure of the beam. Indeed Gertrude Angelina's right foot hurt her so she could not hardly move it at times and when she put her foot down it felt as if an electric shock ran through it.

And still poor Jennie was imprisoned by the beam, for now had they been free of the beam they could not have climbed down, or made their way half way across the platform alone. At first the two little girls had been half suspicious and afraid of the Calvinian who had appeared to them so suddenly, but soon finding that the stranger was really all right, and was doing his utmost to help them out of their trouble, they felt better and only looked at him curiously. The little girls standing in the middle of the platform could not see what could have gone on down below, they could not even raise themselves, so tightly was their feet held by the beam. But Gertrude was now free, but could not hardly stand upon her right foot. So the Calvinian finding the two girls helpless and one still caught, was at first perplexed, and was disturbed his most was that not far from the signal station as he could see there was a great gathering of glandelinians, and presently all the hands were moving forward and it was apparent that by the looks of things there was serious trouble brewing.

He leaned over and peered down almost into their faces.

"Gosh it is some of the glandelinians under general Ebu Pecker." he said to himself. "but somehow or other they will not scale this signal station as long as I have any ammunition left."

Very soon all of the glandelinians who seemed to know the truth about the top of the signal station started a great commotion, and the noise attracted the little girls but they could not see anything because they were not able to and Gertrude was almost afraid to get up. Having heard the uproar the Calvinian had come to the edge to look over to see what was wrong. And the Calvinian being wiser and more experienced, at once knew that the glandelinians were going to surround the signal station and sent men up to take care of the top prisoners. He realized that the two girls were helpless on top of the beam, Jennie was being still imprisoned by the beam, and knowing he was powerless to release her from it decided nevertheless that as long as his ammunition held out no glandelinian would successfully scale the station. It was true they may blow it down, but nevertheless he defied them to do so. So although he feared the dreaded consequence, he laid down close to the edge and watched the proceedings.

"He told the little girls what he feared and he said;

"And now in case I have exhausted my ammunition, and the rebel continues to try to scale it, I may ask you to loan me yours, for if they are allowed to once get a foothold on the top of the scaffold we are goners."

The little girls did not reply at once, for they were thinking of what good would be resistance when it was likely the enemy when they realized they could not scale the station, would blow it down.

"It's almost a useless thing to ask of us," said Gertrude, "or if the rebels see they cannot scale the scaffold they will blow it down or set it on fire, and then we would be in still greater danger. And maybe they won't be foolish enough to attempt the scaling of it at all at that. They may intend to set it on fire right now. However in case of necessity we can do what is possible."

At this time one of the glandolinian officers who was a thin man and who had been greatly interested in the signal station was curious to see what the prisoners on top were and what they looked like. Hearing through his messengers that they were two little girls, the thin man decided that if he climbed a tall avocado tree that stood at the side of the clearing near the station, he might be able to see the girls at a close distance without their seeing him. So after giving some orders to his panfashas the rebel officer went to the tree, and being a good climber since boyhood easily scaled the tree to its very top, and looked in the direction of the signal station, saw the two girls and a single man on top of the scaffold, although the station was a long way off from here. It was indeed to him a remarkable and strange sight, and he realized it the man was a Calverinian for he had on immense round rounded slo slouched hat with red yellow and purple plumes, and though honest he looked very fierce, and terrible.

Being satisfied his curiosity, he then began to climb down the tree more slowly. Suddenly he discerned that in the possession of him, glandolinian was a small black c odo flag and therefore knew what was up.

In the meantime elsewhere Violet and her sisters who with Penrod was guarding their prisoners heard a good story from Angeline. Violet.

"I forgot to tell you so she said. That Gertrude Angeline and Jennie Turner, are in trouble, and I came here to hunt you girl up, and get you to ground rescue them."

"Good gracious Angeline. Why didn't you tell us before," exclaimed Penrod. "For the reason that I found so much excitement here that I almost forgot at Angeline Aronburg and Jennie Turner."

"What's wrong with them?" asked Violet.

Then Angeline explained how they had gone to take a view on top of the signal station and how they had been tapped by a falling beam. Violet and her sisters were greatly alarmed, but she shook her head and said sadly;

"I'm afraid we cannot help our dear friends in time, because we cannot or do not know the way."

"Will you go to them if I lead the way?" asked Angeline. Violet.

"Of course," replied Jennie. "But I do not think us girls can rescue them even at that, and how can we succeed without men to help us."

"Don't you trust yourselves any longer?" demanded the girl heroine.

"Well we are very pretty at many things," admitted Violet, "but we are not regular experts at climbing signal stations you know, and so we don't expect to be able to do much."

"But if I lead the way--and find the signal station inside of five minutes--will you try to do something for them?"

"Well we will admit that we'll die rather than fail," said Violet reluctantly. "But I'm afraid we cannot do it. We never have worked on a tall signal station made in the fashion the rebels have them, and there is no way to climb up them at we know of."

"That shows how much you know," retorted Angeline almost scornfully.

"Now come with me dears and we'll see what is to be done."

Just as soon as they had started on they heard the sound of firing, and Angeline became excited.

He to go back to the imperiled ones at the signal station. The Calverinian was getting impatient. The glandolinians were remaining quiet and only hesitating the signal stations and he did not get up and approached the little girls and said;

"Well girls what shall he do about the situation?"

"Let us remain here and seek your own safety please," replied Gertrude. "If you will reach out for the near-nearest tree there you can grab hold of a branch, and escape to the christian lines."

But the old Calverinian shook his head.

"I cannot and will not do it," he declared. "The glandolinians down below are the fierce yh imies and Panfashas and if they captured you, and knowing you would shoot you as spies."

"The glandolinians would capture us alive," promised Jennie Turner. "I'll make every one who climbs up have a good swift descent to the ground. We two will feed them the nicest kind of lead, and train them to do clever falling tricks on a hundred and fifty feet to the ground. Then the survivors before they get us will have some exciting stories to tell their comrades. What do you say Mr Calverinian my friend?"

"I say now," answered the man. "I won't be responsible for any descent on my part, and what's more I'll not do it."

"Very well," said Gertrude calmly, "then you can remain. But you will be sorry."

However at this time a large party of the glandolinians had moved forward a little nearer and proceeded toward the signal station many of them carrying arms full of dry grass, straw and wood in their arms which they started to plant under and around the frame structure of the signal station. Further on hundreds of panfashas, Erbs, Growlwoogs and Wainsias, and ginsammians and marians had gathered, and their wild defiant yells, curses, threats, and laughter could be heard a mile away. But the Calverinian soon hushed the babble of sounds. He threw first one and then another of his ammonia bombs down upon the glandolinians below, and the fumes routed the glandolinians from the signal station and drove them from the clearing. This action made the man very popular with the two girls, but the trouble was not over yet.

The Wainsias officer now wished to select twelve glandolinians to cover their faces with damp cloths and rush forward toward the signal station with flaming torches and when he asked for volunteers nearly a hundred offered to go, so great was their confidence in the work they had undertaken. The colonel selected a dozen that seemed intelligent and collected in mind, and they rushed forward the flaming torches making a great glare of light. Again an ammonia bomb was dropped, and then a deadly grenade followed which exploded among the glandolinians with a terrible crash. The explosion made a thick smoke that quite enveloped the retreating glandolinians who cursed and swore as well as the form of the signal station, but when the smoke cleared away, it was seen below that thirteen glandolinians lay motionless on the ground and a number more were limping or staggering away. Some glandolinians now started to climb trees, and when high enough started a clattering fire of rifles at the signal station but the Calverinian was not hit. He had only one grenade left, an ammonia bomb and he hurled it at the tree where he saw the thickest number of glandolinians and the explosion brought a big branch down and forced the glandolinians to dismount or be stifled by the fumes. The glandolinians in the clearing below started a furious rifle fire and the woods seemed to blaze but though bullets struck the structure by hundreds the Calverinian lying down behind an iron shield on the edge of the platform was uninjured. Thousands of glandolinians were within view, and those who had witnessed the brave defense of the single man above were much astonished, and Gertrude said;

"That was a fine trick to do sir, but how long can you hold out against them. I'm afraid they will surely succeed in the end."

And then Jennie Turner remarked;

"You are certainly the most wonderful man we ever met in all the land of Calverinia."

"On no indeed," modestly replied the Calverinian. And I'm only Hans Rango but I must not let them get you girls if I can help it."

"Oh we have heard of you. Hans and we now know you are one of the best friends of children and that any child may trust you. I heard of your rescue of the child, who you battled across the river for under fire, and when ever general Vivian learns of it you will be receiving a commission. Some day we hope you will meet the Vivian girls and I'll hope it will be soon."

"It's all right, there are greater heroes than us," he answered, as he crouched near the ledge and peered down to see what the landallians will do next.

"You see explained Angeline Pichee, that old signal station where Gertrude Angeline and the nurse were held by the beam is also in this same location but a little further off--over at the east, and it is no further to go across the lots from here than it is from here to Angeline Agatha. So we will save time by cutting through the woods to the east until we reach the river."

"Are you sure you know the way?" asked Violet.

"I know all of the land of Angeline and Calvernia, better than most living creatures know it," asserted Angeline Pichee.

"Go ahead then and guide us please," said Penrod. "We have left our poor friends helpless already and it maybe the enemy may attack them so the sooner we rescue them the more happier they will be."

"Are you sure you can get them out of their fix," Angeline Pichee inquired.

"I have no doubt of it," Violet assured her, "but I cannot tell what sort of a signal station it is or what means we may have to use until we get to the place and discover just how they are held."

"I have heard of that signal station through a girl scout friend of mine," remarked Violet Vivian. "Not long ago, when I made a secret trip toward the rebel lines under penalty through this same forest, I met some disguised Angeline girl scouts who warned me not to go on top of the station, and told me stories about it, and how a certain shining object is placed on top to entrap christian piers, or scouts--men or children."

"Is the signal station really wonderful?" questioned Angeline Vivian.

"I have heard that it is it is to the landallians one of the most trustworthy signal stations in the world," answered Violet. "I have never seen it myself, but many of my boy and girl scouts have told me that when out on their scouting tours they have halted their horses on the shore of the river and looked across or down the so shore of the river and looked at the signal station, and had seen men on top of it with colored flags and landallians. It is said however if a strange person who does not know anything about the signal station and goes on its top they are trapped by something or other. That in my opinion makes the signal station for the enemy at least the most wonderful in existence."

"But surely these are only old stories," said Jennie Vivian. "Has any of your other friends ever gone up to the top of the signal station?"

"I admitted Violet," or they feared that if any certain person who are Angeline Angeline whether men or children ventures up to the top of the station, whether the glistening flagpole stands, that man or child, may be caught by something and held captive, or they may suddenly be under fire and be killed."

"That happened to Gertrude and Jennie then?" asked Jennie.

"They were caught by the feet when a beam or a long heavy piece of wood fell upon them, and from the sounds of explosion they must be under fire already," said Angeline Pichee.

"Then said Jennie Vivian anxiously, "we must hurry up or Gertrude and Jennie will be hit by a grape shot or something and be dead before we get there."

They were proceeding at a rapid pace during this conversation for they were all obliged to move swiftly to keep pace with Angeline Pichee. After leaving the clearing, they crossed a small hill, and then a broad plain, after which they reached another branch of the forest, much smaller than that where the Norman Vivian's army lay in.

"The signal station is on a small hill in this forest," said Angeline Pichee.

"But the river is probably at the other side of the forest. There is however no pathway through the trees, but nevertheless if we keep going east, we will soon find the river, and then it will be easy to find the signal station."

"Have you ever traveled this way before Angeline?" inquired Penrod.

"Not exactly," admitted the girl heroine, "but I know we shall reach the big river if we go east through the forest. And I smell a ammonia fumes. I wonder where it comes from."

"I do so but it is a mystery," said Penrod. "But lead us on. We are in a hurry." Angeline Pichee started away, and it was for the first hour of traveling very easy to pass through the trees, but before long the underbrush and vines became very thick and tangled, and after pushing their way through these obstacles for over an hour, the girl travelers came to a place where not one of them could push through.

"We had better go back and find a path," suggested Nettie Vivian.

"I'm surprised at you, Angeline," said Jennie Vivian, eyeing Angeline Pichee severely.

"I'm surprised myself," replied Angeline Pichee. "But this has never been here before and yet it is a long way around the forest to where the river enters it, and I thought we could save time by going straight through."

"No one can blame you," said Violet, "and I think of instead of turning back, we can find a way to get through this if we go one by one."

Penrod appeared doubtful, and Angeline Pichee knowing that each of the little girls called small glittering axes in on for use in case of necessity suggested that all get to work and cut their way through. So they unsheathed their little axes made of some strong metal so highly polished that they glittered brightly even in the dark forest, and began to flit like the blades right and left, finally starting to clear a way through vine and brush, and scattering the tangled barrier gradually that they were able to get through at last almost a walk. The brushwood seemed to melt away before the little girls they using their little axes with all their strength and chopping so fast, that Angeline Pichee who helped pull away smaller vines only saw a twinkling of the blades. Then suddenly to their surprise the forest was open again, and they replaced their little axes as in their sheaths. After carefully wiping it with their handkerchiefs. When they went on and in a short time reached the ocean like expanse of the waters of the river.

"Let me see," said Angeline Pichee looking up and down the stream. "I think we are on the hill with the signal station at last so we must go up the stream until we come to it. And I hear explosions, and the sound of firing. They must be attacked."

So up the stream they traveled more swiftly, walking comfortably on the river bank, and after a while they saw a sharp bend in the shore of the river, hill hiding all below from their view. They rode briskly along however, and had nearly reached the bend, when Angeline Pichee cried out in a sharp warning sound of voice; "Look out!"

The travelers halted their horses abruptly and Penrod himself said;

"Look out for what?"

"Here is a strangely colored man coming toward us," he replied and a man dressed in a strange gray uniform and rowing a gorgeously colored boat appeared before them. He however did not see them and passed out of their sight.

"I wonder who he was what business he had on this side of the river, and what he was doing here anyway?" asked Angeline Vivian.

The man then swerved the boat and halted on the shore of the river and seeing the apparently looking mounted boy scouts came up to them with a gun drawn and demanded who they were and what they wanted.

"We have come to rescue some friends of ours who are held or trapped on a signal station near this river," explained Violet who saw the man was honest looking.

"I know them," said the man. "I've been to see them and they are stuck or held fast by a heavy beam. I am looking for some thing for them to sit on while I work to set them free. You may as well go back home however for all the effort I have already tried shows that no power can save them."

"We are the Vivian girls and this is Penrod," said Angeline Pichee pointing to her girl friends and Penrod.

"Well my name is Hans," was the reply. "I'm a great christian spy as any Angeline can probably tell you, but even I have no power to remove the beam which held hold their feet."

"I'm the man who rescued the little girl near the river so long ago!" inquired Violet.

"Yes, I am, and I rescued the pretty little girl because I have no one for myself to love, and at that time had hardly any friends except the soldiers. The soldiers defied me to take the chance and I did. But I admire my own pluck alright so I'm glad I did it."

"Where is the signal station?" asked Violet.

"About a mile from here."

Violet had already dismounted from her horse and ran around a group of trees to see if she could view the station from there. There was no such thing in sight but as it was growing very dark, night having approached the she did see far in the distance a glimmering row of lights a mile long flickering and going out and reappearing again and looked like flashes from gunshots.

"I wonder what is going on over there!" asked Violet to herself. "I know a place in that direction where a horde of strange glandelinians are in position and I escaped from them once, and only got away after shooting down my pursuers one by one."

She returned to her sisters with the statement that she could not yet see the signal station as it was too dark but that she saw a group or row of flashes. Hearing something was up they started to resume their journey Hans having gone off toward the signal station without telling them.

"Do you think that Penrod dear, that the man who called himself Hans was right in saying that no power or effort could rescue Gertrude and Jennie?" asked Daisy Vivian in a worried tone of voice.

"No, I don't think the man was right in saying that," answered Penrod gravely "but it is possible that they are in a situation will be harder to overcome than I expected. I'll do my best and so will you girls, of course, and no one can do more than their best."

That did not entirely relieve the anxiety of the Vivian girls, but none of them said anything more, and soon on turning the bend of the horse line, they came in sight of the signal station.

"Where they are!" exclaimed Catherine eagerly.

"Yes, I see them," replied Penrod, nodding and her sisters looked. "They appear to be sitting down and there is a man with them."

"Is that queer?" replied Angeline. "There was no man up there when I left them to find you."

"That a tall signal station it is," cried Violet in wonder as her gaze fell full on it.

"Never mind the signal station and its wonders now," advised Penrod. "The most important thing to do now is to try and rescue our friends. I see they are surrounded by glandelinians who are attacking them."

By this time they had arrived at a place just opposite the signal station, and now both Gertrude Angeline and Jennie turned from the great distance saw the arrival of their friends, and signalled to them for help.

"How are you?" Violet signalled back.

"We are in hard luck and attacked by the glandelinians," signalled Gertrude Angeline in reply. "We are held here by a beam, at least Jennie is, and my right foot is almost crushed and I cannot get down."

"What does she mean by that?" asked Violet.

"I can't move my feet a inch," signalled Jennie.

"Why not?" Violet signalled back.

"They are held down by a heavy beam," explained Gertrude. "It was hard work to signal with flashlights from that distance, so Penrod said to Angeline, please."

"Go as near to the signal station as it is safe to do and signal to our friends to be patient, for we have one to save them. It may take a little time to release them, for that kind of a signal station is new to us, and we shall have to experiment with the glandelinians first and drive them away by some trick. But tell them we'll hurry as fast as we can."

So Angeline piches rode as near as she dared under cover of the trees and bushes to signal to the two on top of the station not to worry, and Violet and her sisters and Penrod began to make their own preparations. The first thing to do was to make a sort of flash to throw confusion among the glandelinians surrounding the signal station.

At first neither the boy or the seven Vivian girls could not think of a thing. But Penrod first came upon an idea. He first placed upon the ground a good distance from the Vivian girls a small rounded tripod which he had carried with him in his pocket, and placed something like a small lamp on top of it. Into this basin he poured a large quantity of gunpowder. Then on the pile of wood he placed along side of it, he also poured some powder. Then he fumbled for some matches and finally found some and lit the powders which began to sizzle and flash, a pink glare, and a sky blue one simultaneously, and also send out clouds of clouds of violet and red smoke that floated up into the air and also toward Violet and her sisters and completely enveloped them, as well as their horses on which they still sat but hidden in the darkness. Then after the smoke had disappeared into air, Penrod called out to Violet:

"Are the glandelinians abandoning the siege to come and see what the lights were for?"

"No," shouted the Vivian girls in answer. "Therebels did not see the lights, or did not pay any attention."

Penrod rubbed his head thoughtfully and then looked toward the glandelinians whom he saw were over a hundred feet away. He then whispered to the little girls to go further away ordismount from their horses and take refuge behind trees and bushes and when they had done so, he took from a little black bag on the side of his saddle a little black ball, and exerting all his strength after lighting it, threw it toward the glandelinians. He had whatever it was exploded just over the heads of the glandelinians in the rear of the besiegers with a terrific force and seemed to scatter a million sparks over the glandelinians and Penrod and the little girls saw a good number drop, and other scatter in different direction. A confusion of sounds followed, and a large number of glandelinians began approaching their way.

"Oh," said Penrod. "I guess that will give some of us a chance to get to the signal station and set Jennie Turner free, and help the three down from it." But though a score of glandelinians came toward the woods the remainder stayed by the signal station, and the disappointed boy realized that he would have to try something else. After some of the glandelinians had went into different parts of the woods to investigate where the strange grenade came from, Penrod worked hard, using every effort, he had, and every thing he had in his black bag, and at all he could not cause any of the other glandelinians to draw away from the signal station.

"Dear me," exclaimed Violet. "I'm afraid one of us will have to go back to the Christian lines and get a force of soldiers to help us after all." That made little Penrod blush, for it showed him to think that his wisdom was not equal to that of any one else.

"I won't give up yet girls," said Penrod. "For I know a lot of tricks that I have not tried yet. I don't know how many glandelinians are around the signal station, or what their intentions are, but I do not that I can cause them to withdraw from it if I use the right right means. It's like unlocking a door you know, all a person has to do is to find the key that fits the lock."

"But you have no right key with you," suggested Angeline. "Is hee?" and suppose you do not succeed, what then?"

"Then we will have to get help," he answered.

Angeline piches had come back to their side already and had told the girls that the glandelinians were trying all kinds of desperate means to get at the two girls and the man on top of the signal station, and that the two girls were getting frightened over there, because the glandelinians were threatening to blow down the signal station by dynamiting it. Just now when I left my hiding place the glandelinians were making a hole in the ground near the signal station to place the charge of explosives."

"I think," said Penrod reflectively, "that we had better go as near to the signal station as possible at no matter what the risk, where one of us can signal better to them, and work to better advantage. How did Gertrude and Jennie get to the signal station in the first place?"

"They rode up to it," answered Angeline. "Their two horses are over there near the river bank but hidden from the enemy."

"I suppose you have not the courage to go and bring the horses to us have you?"

"No I would not dare go as near as that to the enemy," said the girl. "It would be like cutting my head off."

"I'll try and get it for you girls," volunteered Penrod. "Of course I feel dreadfully scared for fear the glandelinians will see me and shoot me down, but I'll try and get the two horses and bring it to you."

"Thank you my friend but be careful," said violet.

So Penrod plunged into the thicket and soon managed to reach the point where the horses of the two besieged girls were hidden. Getting upon one horse and holding the reins of the other he started off at terrific speed, and so quick was he that he managed to bring them up to the place where the ivian girls and Angeline rode before they were concealed without having been seen or heard by the enemy.

"Good," exclaimed the little girls well pleased.

"When we go forward as near as possible we will have to take care not to let the enemy see us or hear us, then we'll be quite safe," violet decided. So the little girls told Angeline to guard the two horses until they and Penrod returned, and then they started slowly forward toward the bushes.

There was a small pathway through the woods at this point, so the little girls and Penrod pushed their way carefully and went as close to the signal station and its besieging enemies as possible. Violet and her sisters were shocked to see what peril the two girls and the man on top of it were in, and Jennie ivian said to her sisters:

"If we cannot save them soon, the glandelinians will succeed in mining it and then there will be nothing left of our friends."

"Be patient sister dear," counselled her sisters, while Penrod, took another little black object from his black sack.

"What are you going to do with that?" asked violet.

"It's a powerful gas grenade," replied Penrod, "and when I throw it among the glandelinians, it will cause great confusion among them, and then while the rebels have scattered for safety one of us can run to the signal station and climb up to the top before the Whimies gather again."

"Don't," warned violet in alarm. "Don't do it. If that shall explode among the glandelinians the survivors will realize where it came from and we will be fired upon from all sides and shot down. Those glandelinians are all Whimies and they never fail when they once get aroused."

"To hurl a grenade at this short distance," said Angeline ivian, "would be like exploding it among ourselves."

The boy put the grenade back into the black sack, and took out a long skyrocket from it from the back of his horse.

He was preparing to light it when violet again asked:

"What are you going to do now?" And she eyed the skyrocket fearfully.

"It's going to send it flying among the glandelinians," declared Penrod.

"Don't do it," pleaded violet with a shudder. "It will cause the same results."

"It would just bring a mob of glandelinians down upon us," explained violet.

Penrod then placed the rocket back.

Suddenly violet saw that Gertrude Angeline was signalling and watching carefully she made it out as this:

"I guess friends it is all up with us this time. Please tell general ivian that we got into trouble trying to capture a escaped spy. When he will forgive us. This signal station is lovely and wonderful, but it is just a lure to catch christians and children on this dread dreadful hill, and then allow the glandelinians to destroy them. You will have to get along without us now

Dear Princesses of Angeline and I hope that none of you will ever forget me or dear Jennie, Angeline, violet and her sisters were greatly distressed and all of the poor little girls had hard work to keep the tears from their eyes.

"That all we can do just come up nearer and see them in danger and perishing!" violet asked Penrod.

"It is all I can think of just now to be sure," replied violet. "But I intend to keep on thinking -- as long -- as long -- as long as the thinking will do any good."

They were all very silent for a long time, violet and her sisters and Penrod standing behind trees, and Gertrude Angeline and Jennie were soon to be sitting on their own seats.

"Suddenly violet said:

"Penrod I have thought of something."

"What have you thought of?" asked, looking at the little girl with interest.

"Can you remember any of the big nals the glandelinians use or their sentries use when danger lurks near for the glandelinian camp?" she asked.

"Of course, I can remember any of them," said he.

"Then you can with the help of four or five small grenades far to the rear of the enemy and allow them to explode in the fashion of a glandelinian signal like the five strokes of a drum. It is a hard task and only the know how to do it but we can try if we are attentive. When the glandelinians become alarmed and draw away, we can rush or fire on the others who remain and get to the station and rescue the girls before the glandelinians come back."

"Can it really be done, Penrod?" asked Jennie ivian, eagerly.

"I think so."

"And explode them like five strokes?" inquired Angeline.

"If we do it right. Why we can place the grenades in a line and if the glandelinians fall for the false signal we can then go to the station and rescue them before they come back."

"All right, do it," cried Jennie.

So Penrod took five grenades from his pocket, his sack and then four of the girls accompanied him to a certain distance and then they lighted one after another as quickly as possible, and accidentally they done the right thing and each exploded correctly as they wanted it. Instantly most of the glandelinians with drew from the signal station in a confusion of sounds, and violet and her sisters seeing a clear space moved forward to the signal station just as the man up above was descending and helping one of the girls down.

"Hooray," shouted violet in delight. "They are saved."

"I guess they are," cried the man, equally delighted. "Our desperate situation made me work so frantically that I saved or freed Jennie too. As the man came down also, and had them both back to their hiding places and on the horses and yet the glandelinians not return. After all were mounted on their horses, they hovered around for a while to see if the glandelinians were returning, and then someone appeared started started riding away as fast as they could. When they reached the bend of the shore, Penrod asked excitedly:

"Where did the glandelinians go after the signal we made I wonder?"

"The glandelinians," inquired one of the ivian girls.

"Yes, there were hundreds of them."

"Hundreds of them," said Jennie ivian. "Why a large number of them are following us on horseback and gaining steadily."

"Goodness gracious," cried violet horrified.

"It was a little enough for all our experience to have them come after us now," remarked Angeline. "But we can use our weapons to good advantage if they get too near."

"How dreadful," wailed Catherine ivian wringing her hands in despair.

"Those Whimies never miss a shot and if they see us we are surely gone. They can hit moving objects five hundred yards away in the dark they are so expert at the rifle."

Just then she heard a buzzing overhead, and a bullet from somewhere took away her hat.

"Here they come." Said Penrod looking back in alarm, but he quickly drew from his bag two of his six remaining grenades and hurled them toward the nearest horse men, and Violet and her sisters almost fabitated with relief, when the grenades exploded and checked the advance of the horsemen long enough to enable them to get so far that they could not be followed any further in the darkness. Then Penrod gave a laugh and said:

"Those may not be the only Glandelinians in the forest, but I advise you all to keep away from these woods as much as possible during our retreat toward the Christian lines, until we regain our proper points."

"Let's hurry and get them now." Advised Violet. "The Glandelinians are a fierce lot at you never can tell what might happen next."

So they all started off as fast as possible. Angeline noticed that Jennie Urner was suffering from the pain in her injured foot, but nevertheless she was so happy over her escape that she was softly crying, while Gertrude Angeline congratulated them all for coming to their aid in time. The soldier who was sitting behind Violet was hugging her tight to keep himself steady, and he was so pleased that he had saved a share on their hands before he realized it and had taken off his hat and bowed politely to the little Vivian girls. Then after they had halted a moment Hans did a very curious thing. He dismounted from his horse, went to a big tree, and drawing his gun looked over the chambers carefully. Then he sat down on the ground for a moment and after taking a roll of stout cord from his pocket tied the hands of the two Glandelinian spy prisoners who had been at all with them and then proceeded to bind their arms to their sides. Then after that he got up and said:

"I hate to be stumped, so I'm going back a little way and see if we are still followed. You girls keep hidden with the prisoners."

"Put if they see you you will get shot." Exclaimed pained Vivian, with evident disapproval.

"No this time I'll dodge them so they will never see me. I noticed that they did not see me while I was on top of the signal station, and while they were trying to do their mean work I freed Jennie Urner. Those Glandelinians were whimsies, worse in character than a wild beast, and they come from the seats of Glandelinian purmeramians. They also had with them the fierce Growleywogs, and the phantoms, and those kind comes from the Gaurian seats. So when we were pursued after we got the two girls from the signal station I noticed our pursuers were Gaurianians and not Glandelinians as Penrod supposed. So now I'll scout a little and see if the rebels are following our trail."

"But why do you wish to scout all this time?" Asked Violet.

"Don't you know that at we have to be on cautious and be prepared or they will surprise us!" He demanded.

"Of course it is a wise plan." said Angeline Riches but "But I don't approve of it."

"Well I know my business and I'm going to do it, and I mean to see if we are followed or not, and if we are we can be warned in time and make a race for the Christian lines."

"That would be fine." cried Jennie Urner eagerly "If you think you can do it, and it would be safe to try."

"I'm pretty sure it is safe, the way I can detect things, and the way I'm armed." said the man "and if I should happen to get pursued, I suppose you can hear a good number of shots."

"I suppose we could." agreed Penrod. "Anyhow if you wish to try it sir go ahead, and we will stand by here and wait and watch and see what happens."

So the Gaurianian got upon his horse again, and rode down the road to the rear for a certain distance as far as he dared. They watched him ride down the road, until he was out of sight. Then after waiting five minutes or more they saw him reappear and riding toward them with greater speed. During the time he was he was rapidly approaching to where his girl and girl and boy friends awaited him, seven different varieties of colored lights suddenly flickered in the distance and then went out.

"I guess the by the sound I hear a large force of cavarly is following our trail, and also are moving in separate companies so as to prevent our escaping." He said as he rode up. "they figure that we only go or want to escape down by one road, and that if we went straight ahead we would be caught without warning. But we will fool them easily."

"Nevertheless despite their shrewdness we will fool them." remarked Angeline Riches, who knew the country more than the Glandelinians did. "No one will care to go the way I will go and lead you, so we won't be caught napping."

"Well let's go on then." Exclaimed Penrod. "If the Glandelinians think of getting us, I would like to know how that can be."

"It will surprise them." Glandelinians all right when they find we have tricked them." declared Violet as she urged her horse on to follow the rest, and yet gazing in awed wonder at the distant lights and watching them change color, die out and reappear.

"Our escape and daring rescue to boot will surprise everybody in the whole Glandelinian army." Angeline Riches asserted in glee. "And it will be a lesson the Glandelinians will never forget."

"I think the Glandelinians ought to have a little redist at that." Objected Jennie Urner. "They are brave nevertheless though wicked."

"That's true." admitted Angeline Riches but "if they will ever recieve any credit from me it will be from my pistols and nothing else."

"Now add Penrod." "we must start for the Christian lines." "But how are we going to get Jennie Urner and Gertrude Angeline to their own places. Neither one of the poor girls cannot walk a step, that's certain their feet are so injured."

"So it is true." acknowledged the man Hans. "Jennie herself has a pretty badly injured foot. Her horse is injured by some stray shot and cannot carry her much longer. I could carry her myself for a while, but I would have to stop to rest every few minutes, and three cannot get on the horses now you know."

"Couldn't Jennie ride on the back of my horse, and hold on to me." Violet asked, with a good natured yawn.

"I don't object to trying it, if I can hold tight enough and not fall off." answered Jennie Urner.

"If she falls off she might get injured badly or killed." said Gertrude.

"I'll fix it so she will be safe." Promised Hans. "Violet you sit on my horse, and little Urner and I will sit on yours."

They set work to make the exchange as quick as possible to do this. When this was accomplished he held on to Jennie and at once the little calvacade proceeded on their journey and their horses moved so fast that their riders were astonished.

"That beats riding on ordinary occasions." Exclaimed Gertrude Angeline, and admiringly. "You don't happen to have three guns have you?" she asked of Hans.

"No" he replied. "I have only two guns but if you need one badly I can lend you one of mine."

They continued on as swiftly as possible Hans, and Jennie both riding on the back of one horse, and between them rode the other little girls, and Penrod. Their two Glandelinian prisoners were sour and grumpy, at first at being taken so easily, but before they had journeyed far, the wicked old Gaurianian himself had discovered what he thought to be a fine amusement. He was riding on a single horse alongside of Violet and one of his hands had become free. He saw that one of her curls was constantly hanging down from underneath her purple cap and when she was not looking he would slyly seize the curl and pull it. The first time he did it the pain made Violet almost scream and she not knowing who did it, thought it was Penrod and looked at him reproachfully. Finally again when Jennie herself was not looking he pulled her hair, and he was so quick and sly that the little victims could scarcely detect he done it. Finally when he reached for Violet hair again she happened to see him right on time and scolded him angrily and told him if he did it again he would be sorry, and she moved away out of his reach. After the party had left the house the forest it began to rain heavily, and they were obliged therefore to make camp for the night, choosing a pretty place beside a stream. By means of some canvas covers they had on their horses backs they made three tents, pitched in a row on the deep grass, and nicely fitted with all that was needful for the comfort of every one. The middle tent was for the two prisoners, and they had to sleep on the floor as well as the rest. Another tent was for the yivian girls, while the third was for the man and boy, Gertrude and Jennie Turner occupying the tent, where the two prisoners were. The old man Hans was to remain on guard so the prisoners could not escape. Outside the tents seeing it had stopped raining, Penrod made a fire and placed over it a kettle for a while, by good luck, which from which he presently drew all sorts of nice things, for their supper, smoking hot after they had eaten and talked together for a while, under the twinkling stars, they all went into the tents except Hans to get some sleep. Jennie Turner and Gertrude Angelina were also asleep too, when they were aroused by the scream of one of the yivian girls for the old Galverinian had crawled out of the tent and was pulling her hair. Annoyed by the uproar, Jennie Turner cried out:

"Stop that racket please girls!" and getting sight of the old Galverinian coming back into the tent struck him a blow in the face with her little hand. It was not hard enough to hurt him but it stung his pride and he would have struck back but that moment the man Hans came in to see what the commotion was about and had hurled the prisoner into a corner to hug him if he started again anything again he would injure him for good. Then Jennie Turner lay down to sleep again, but the yivian girls who were now awake again knew who had pulled Catherine's hair. After whispering together, Violet and Jennie let their curls hang loosely about their heads and all remained quiet pretending to be asleep. Presently when he was sure everyone was asleep and as the guard appeared to be so too, the old Galverinian stole near one of the yivian girls again and seeing violet's hair hanging loose gave a yank to one of her curls. Instantly to his utter surprise every one of the little girls leaped to their feet, almost simultaneously, and although they were little girls, the entire even made a horde stronger than two men together against him and they surrounded the half bound prisoner and though he tried to strike them with his fist, the two of them clung to his free arm, while the others clinging to his coat and legs made him a prisoner. Then they forced him out of their tent without ceremony and bore him down to the bank of the stream. Violet and her sisters had noticed that the banks of the stream was covered with thick slimy black mud, and when they had forced him to the stream they threw him right into the mud bog. When he got out he was so covered with mud, clothes, face hands and all that he could hardly see and so thick was the mud upon him that he looked as if he had been made of mud. In this condition he was forced to slowly get himself alone back to his tent. By morning as he was unable to remove it the mud had dried hard on his face and clothes and it was a black color throughout. Gertrude Angelina, Angelina Jones, and Jennie Turner were horrified, but Penrod and Hans only shook their heads and said it served the rascal right for teasing his own captors. Penrod asked if Hans should wash off the mud from the prisoner in the brook.

"Not yet," answered Gertrude Angelina. "The prisoner deserves to be punished--so I think we will leave that black mud-----which is as bad as paint--upon his body until we get nearer to the Christian lines. That silly old Galverinian is so wise and so vain that he will be greatly ashamed when the Angelinian officers see him in this condition, and perhaps he will take the lesson to heart, and leave the yivian girls alone hereafter."

However so thick was the mud on his head and face that the Galverinian could not see or hear and to be at least a little considerate, two of the yivian girls cleaned the mud from his eyes, ears and lips, washing them clean. As soon as he could speak the Galverinian asked indignantly:

"Are not any of you going to punish those girls for playing such a trick on me?" "No we cannot punish them," laughed Hans, "or they are our superiors." "You played a trick on them by pulling their hair, so this is only tit-for-tat, and I'm glad the yivian girls had their revenge."

He would not allow the rebel to even go near the stream, or no one of to clean the mud off his clothes, but placed him on his own horse retied his free arm and then they resumed their journey toward the Christian lines at Dorothy Gale.

"This is only a part of your punishment," said Violet severely. "Every one of the Angelinian will laugh at you, when we get to the Christian lines, and so will all the generals and officers and the people too, and even your own comrades and prisoners there."

The latter suggestion hurt the old wicked Galverinian more than anything else. The old Galverinian always argued that he could make many people come to his own terms and now if any of his comrades should see him in this condition, it would be dreadfully humiliating. However soon a most unfortunate thing happened. While they were going on, they were suddenly pounced upon by a squadron of Galverinians and though the girls and Hans and Penrod managed to escape and wounded seven of their number they rescued their two comrades the old Galverinian and the young spy, and Hans was seriously wounded. The little girls however never missed their two prisoners until they had gained considerable distance between their wild pursuers and then it was too late to get them back.

"I expect he still has the general's secret plans in his possession," said Violet.

"Never mind," replied Hans who had been bandaged his arm in a big handkerchief. "Perhaps the Galverinian spy and his old companion have been punished enough and we must not forget what their fate would be if they were brought into the Christian lines."

"Yes to some and I think of it it fills me with horror," said Violet and her sisters shuddered. "But I do think as you do that the old man has been punished enough and perhaps he won't dare pull the curls of any little girl again." Finally when they arrived at Dorothy Gale's late that evening Gertrude, Jennie Turner and Hans who suffered from their hurts were quickly attended to, while Violet and her sisters went to give the alarm that the prisoners had escaped.

ROSWELL, BUSTON JOHNSTON, AND THE REBELLIOUS BOY AND GIRL SCOUTS.
A CELEBRATION OVER THE SAFTY OF ANGELINA AGATHIA.

VIOLET and her sisters arrived at Porothy Gale to which general Vivians and other christian armies had retreated to after the defeat at Zoe Gullen gun and arrived within or at the christian lines at an opportune time, for general Jack Evans was holding a slight court parashall in his headquarters, where general Roswell puster Johnston was appealing to him to punish some of the boy and girl scouts who were belonging to one of Gertrude Angelina's small girl scout regiments. These boy and girl scouts were constantly with general Robert Vivians commands, and had seldom gone very far from his army. It so happened that general Roswell puster Johnston was one of the generals to whom the Vivian girls for some unknown reason were not friend very friendly had acquired the habit to try and rule the child scouts to his own liking but the boy and girl scouts objected because they wanted to do their work as Gertrude Angelina or the Vivian girls would have them. So they refused to do as he demanded. And when the general insisted, the result soon was that if it had not been for some of his soldiers the boys and girls would have dragged him from his headquarters and thrown him into the water of the river near by. The learned and yet haughty and dignified general was naturally indignant at such attempted treatment, and so he had brought the rebellious girls and boys to general Jack Evans headquarters and appealed to the latter general to punish them for their rebellion.

Do not suppose that general Jack Evans was very severe with the rebellious boys and girls, because the Vivian girls were the Princesses of Angelina, and while he was listening to the interesting case in his room, Violet and her sisters came in and seeing what had been going on, abruptly sent the boys and girls home and Violet going up to general Roswell puster Johnston said:

"General, you have proved during the war that you are a great general, and a great fighter, and have saved the army on many occasions, but I warn you if you ever interfere with my boy and girl scouts without my permission again I'll report you to the Angelina Angelinian authorities and demand them to relieve you from your command. And remember I don't fool. I mean it. You have never acted as a friend of me or of my sisters and so you better not arouse our wrath."

General Roswell said nothing but left the room.

Violet and her sisters were even at this moment feeling pretty blue over the escape of the two prisoners and so wishing not to let any one know of their failure they refused to say where they had went. Gertrude Angelina on the following day was able to walk again but Jennie Urner still could not stand on her feet. However Violet and her sisters knowing the unsuccessful adventure they had experienced had went to their own headquarters and kept the secret of the escaped spies even refusing to tell their own father, general Evans, and their other friends and relatives where they had even been. For a week the army was remaining at Porothy Gale and every day the Vivian girls went to see Jennie Urner. The brave little girl had received bad injuries of her feet and for a week had to go around on a wheelchair but she did not seem to lose her usually bright and brave ways on account of her trying experience, and Violet and her sisters were sure that Gertrude Angelina who still limped would prize Jennie Urner as one of the most daring girl scouts of the whole Angelinian army. During these same days Violet and her sisters went to their boy and girl scout regiments training them and the boys and girls were so intelligent that they had already learned everything that the Vivian girls or their officers had taught them. Violet and her sisters though being strict to the military rule treated the boys and girls who served them with great kindness and gentle gentleness and secured for them food and provisions that they loved best, and at on all occasions they had promised to do their best for Violet and her sisters.....

It soon odd that Angelina Agathia and Porothy Gale went threatened so often by the rebels and assaulted so fiercely many times, and yet though not so strongly fortified or defended as all Vivian's they should hold out without even ever being touched. So we need not wonder that over such glorious victories as at Angelina Agathia that the people, and the very armed defending them should have great celebrations when ever they can just as other folks do and consider such things an occasion for feasting and rejoicing, and for praying, and for having as many as possible a good and prayers of thanksgiving to God as possible.

Get Gertrude Angelina, the beautiful girl companion of the Vivian girls, was a real heroine, and one of their best friends, and though like a wildcat to the rebels who molested her or who perused her during her work, was so sweet and loving in caring and training her boy and girl scouts that she was greatly beloved by them all. When ever he had the opportunity she resided in some of the very tents the Vivian girls would or in the same headquarters the generals would, but that did not prevent her from being the friend of the most humble soldier, or child so out in her dominions. She would mount her horse, and would ride out to the camps of even the soldiers, or go into a mess hall during mess time and sit and eat with the soldiers and talk with them, or she would play with the child scouts or with the soldiers and give them each ride on her famous horse, or she would stop among the boy and girl scouts not under her own command to speak to them and ask if they were happy or desired anything else to make them content, or she would teach you young girls and boys who did not know how to use signals to be able to understand all kinds of signals, or enter the camps of the wounded soldiers and be like an angel to them giving to each and all a hearty word or sunny smile. And then Gertrude Angelina would also sit in her tent, with her chosen courtiers all about her, and listen most patiently to all complaints and complaints brought to her by her boy or girl scouts or even by any of the soldiers, and strove to accord equal justice to all. Nowing that Gertrude Angelina was always fair and just in her decisions, no one ever murmured at her judgments, but agreed. If Gertrude Angelina decided against them, she was always right and they were wrong.

When Violet and her sisters, and Gertrude Angelina, and also Jennie Urner and Angelina Agathia were together, one would think they were of all the same age and height except Gertrude Angelina, for Gertrude Angelina was only a few more years older than the Vivian girls were. Violet and her sisters were entirely different than they however. They would when not on their duties laugh, and play with them all in regular girlish or childish fashion indeed, even in her their merriest moods, yet always there was a strange quiet dignity about the Vivian girls, that in any manner, distinguished them from the other girls. They were of a sweeter nature, never lost their temper, nor ever got angry, and bore all their trials and difficulties and sufferings without a murmur. The other three or four girls were different. Angelina Agathia was unusually a hot head and on many occasions so was Gertrude and Jennie Urner, and so the enemy always dreaded these three more than the Vivian girls or the greatest christian generals. When angered by rebel persuages the three girls were merciless and furious like tigresses and go one of the Angelinian had ever captured them yet as far as was known. Jennie Urner and her friends loved the Vivian girls devotedly as if they were their sisters, but they never were able to forget that the Vivian girls were the royal little rulers of Angelina, as their father and mother were the king and queen of Angelina and by birth also belonged to the most powerful race in the world. The place which the Vivian girls had selected in the city of Porothy Gale was a beautiful building, and situated in a most wonderful, delightful and extensive garden garden in the world, where all kind kinds of splendid trees, and flowery shrubs, statues, fountains and everything else abounded. One could easily walk for many hours in this fascinating park of Porothy Gale, owned by the Vivian girls themselves and could see something at every step. In two places were two great aquariums, where many strange and beautiful fishes swam, and at spots all the birds of the air gathered daily to a great feast which the people provided for them, and most of the birds were so fearless of man that they would alight on a persons shoulder and eat from your hand. There were many fountains were many fountains cool and delicious, where all were welcome to refresh themselves.

around the place where the Vivian girls had their temporary abode in Dorothy Gale was a great fortified wall, thickly encrusted with sharp glittering poe points. On days before the war broke out the people of the whole city when ever they had the time and chance often took their children to see the wonders of these beautiful gardens, and even were allowed to enter the royal palace of general or vint, Robert Vivian if they felt so inclined, for they knew that they and their rulers were friends, and that Robert Vivian and even his daughter or wife delighted in giving them pleasure. Now since Angelina Agathia was still safe, and with all this considered, you will not be surprised, that the people throughout the whole nation of Angelina and her states, as well as the most intimate friends of the Vivian girls, and even their royal courtiers were eager to celebrate the events, and made preparations for many the festival in every parts of the country not in the possession of the foe. Throughout the nation all the thousands of brass bands practiced or played their nicest tunes, for they were to march in the numerous processions to be made throughout all the states of Angelina or Abbeinnia, as well as in all the big east cities. Not all of the people how however could go to Angelina Agathia to congratulate their ruler and friends, or praise the armies but all could celebrate in one way or the other, however far distance from Angelina Agathia they might be. Every home and building throughout the land of Angelina and Abbeinnia was to be decorated with banners and bunting, and here were to be games, and plays, and a grand display of fire works, and a general good time for everyone. It was the custom of the Angelinian authorities of Angelina Agathia to give a grand feast for a celebration, to which all the closest friends and the rulers invited as many as possible.

On the special day for the celebration a long table was set in general Robert Vivians headquarters at which were place cards for the invited guests, and at one end of the room was a smaller table, not so high, for the friends of the Vivian girls, whom the Vivian girls never forgot, and at the other end still further on was a big table where all the gifts for the Vivian girls were to be arranged.

When the thousands of guests arrived being mostly soldiers and civilians alike they placed their gifts on this table and then found their places at the big long banquet table. And after all the guests, were all placed, the men generals entered in a solemn procession and were placed at their own tables by the chief general of all. Then while a large orchestra outside played a march composed for the occasion called "All Angelina forever," the Vivian girls themselves entered the banquet hall, attended by their girl scouts and some maids of honor and took their seats at the head of the main table. The little Vivian girls looking like angels when in their best dresses were greeted by a loud and deafening cheer from all of the assembled company, the generals and other children and soldiers adding their cheers and applause to swell the glad tumult, and then all seated themselves at the table. At the right of the Vivian girls sat the famous Jack Ryan Evans, whose face had an bulldog expression, but whose happy jolly nature and shrewd wit, and his bravery, had made him a general favorite of the best and highest of generals and a guardian of the Vivian girls. On the left of the Vivian girls was placed general Jacob Baldwin. General Baldwin commanded all the cavalry and artillery of general Robert and Hanson Vivian's army and was one of the most important generals of all. Next to the others the three girl friends of the Vivian girls were seated, and then the soldiers and so on.

Finally when the banquet was over and everything had been served the time came for the Vivian girls to see their presents, so general Hanson Vivian arose and beckoning the little girls led them to the table, where all their gifts were placed in magnificent array. A beautiful flower pot full of roses of course attracted their attention first, and Gertrude Angeline and her two companions had to tell them the whole story of how they got it. When the Vivian girls thanked them all and said that they could use the flowers for a good charitable purpose. When they discovered marvelous new uniforms sent by the Angelinian governments and being little girls who loved pretty clothing, the set ecstasy of the Vivian girls at being presented with a number of most exquisite gowns may well be imagined. They could hardly wait to put them on but the table was loaded with other pretty gifts, and the little heroine rulers spent a good part of the night before they had examined all their presents and thanked those who had love lovingly donated them.

The morning after the celebration of the saving of Angelina Agathia as Penrod and the Vivian girls were walking in the grounds of the park, Gertrude Angeline came out and joined them saying:

"I got some surprising news for you little girl friends of mine." "Go they all sat down on a large wooden bench near to one of the fountains, and between them Gertrude related the news. It happened to be that the Landelinians who had rescued the two spies had been later on set upon by a force of Christian Cavalry and the prisoners recaptured with the bold band. Gertrude related that the two prisoners were being brought into the lines and that if Violet and her sisters wanted to see them before the army should make an a march it would be best to go right away. So they quickly left the city, and within another hour were within the lines once more.

"I was dreadfully fussy when those Landelinians secured the two spies from us," said Violet. "For it did not feel good a bit to be outwitted like that. And I was not quite sure, you know that the two spies would ever be taken again."

"They might have been still at large yet, if the Angelinian Cavalry had not surprised the Landelinians who rescued them," declared Penrod.

"But where are the two prisoners which have been captured?" Inquired Violet. "Why I have almost forgotten where they have been taken," was Gertrude's reply, "but I believe we can have them located."

Then they started a search and inquiry for the internment camp where the two prisoners were likely to have been taken and soon learned where they were. As they proceeded to that location, Violet and her sisters were regarding their situation thoughtfully.

"It would not be right to allow them to be shot without mercy especially when the spies have not accomplished their mission," said Violet. "I think it would be our better duty to not allow it to happen."

"But we don't know what their natural characters are, and whether they have been successful or not," objected Gertrude Angeline. "For of course the disguises they wore when we girls captured them were not natural to them, and you must not forget Violet, and also your sisters, that their natures were cruel and mischievous, so if they are spared from their well deserved execution, they might escape later on, and cause our nation a great deal of trouble."

"Nevertheless," said Violet, "If we can we must free them from such an awful fate. When we come near enough to see them we can discover who they really are, as we could not make them out in the darkness, and surely we need not fear any two people, even though they prove to be Landelinian spies, and our enemies."

"I am not so sure of that," protested Gertrude Angeline with a shake of her head. "The one who captured the general of--is no simple yet so powerful to us, that no one could equal it, so if it was lost to us it would be a most serious blow. It was not all in the plans you know, it was the way it was planned. So if the two spies have any treacherous means in their heads, they might prove to be very dangerous to us, if we do not allow their execution."

"I have an idea," exclaimed Jennie Vivian. "We girls are so sweet and good and have such pretty ways, but maybe if we try to use our own influence on the men we can bring a confession from them that may save their lives, so if they are thus brought to their senses we need not fear these Landelinians at all."

"That is your plans my dear friends," asked Gertrude Angeline.

"Well," replied Violet or Jennie rather. "I know that one of them appeared to be a young lad and the other was an old man, and that is what put the notion into my head. When we come to them, we can grill them ourselves and bring from one or the other a truthful confession. It is the law of our nation that no spy meets his death unless he was successful, and if they were really unsuccessful they are safe--and everything else too."

"That is not a bad idea," said Penrod, looking at Jennie approvingly. "But we must wait a little closely nevertheless." While they continued on, Gertrude said: "I don't know whether the two spies are two glandelinians or not. If they belong to the sects known as the Whimsies, Crowleywogs, or Zimmermannians, including the Murrermannians, and the like, outside of the Omarians no amount of grilling would do any good, in fact a grilling would only infuriate them and they might attack us even though they are prisoners and under guard. So it might be safer for us to see to it that all our pistols are goodly loaded so to protect us if necessary. All acts of glandelinians outside of the Omarians are sullen, and fierce. If they are Omarians we need not fear but if not we must be on our wate h."

Violet and her sisters drew out their revolvers and seen to it that every chamber was loaded. As soon as they reached a small internment camp, Violet drew out a small silver silver whistle which was attached to a slender gold chain, and blew upon it two shrill blasts. The sound though not harsh, was very penetrating and as soon as it reached the ears of some of the guards, two Angelinians who were armed to the teeth quickly came toward them. Gertrude Angelina explained to them what the vivian girls wanted, and were about to do, and told the guards to keep around and watch so as to be handy if danger threatened. So the two powerful guards stood near the camp and waited. The two prisoners were brought forth one at a time. First was brought a boy about fifteen years old as he appeared. He seemed bewildered at first as if trying to remember what had happened to him and why he was confronted by the pretty vivian girls. At first he did not notice Violet and her sisters, or Gertrude and Penrod, but at the guards, then his gaze turned to them and beheld the girls regarding him curiously, and the two Angelinians standing as their guardians. The young spy did not know who they were, but he seemed to look at them as if he thought them very pretty. So he smiled at them--the same innocent happy smile that a baby might have indulged in, and that pleased Violet who gently seized his hand, and led him to a seat beside the barbed-wire fence.

"Why I thought you were a dreadful glandelinian spy," she exclaimed, "and yet you are only a boy."

"Yes I am a spy," he said, "and what is worse my mission was an unsuccessful."

"Don't you know the fate of successful spies?" Inquired the girl.

"The boy spy shook his head. Then he laughed.

"I don't care a heck what happens as long as I die for my country," he replied seriously. "But I'm not to be shot. But my companion is."

"It is very curious," remarked Penrod. "He wears the dress of the Zimmermannians, so he must be a Zimmermannian though he has not their nature. Of course the boy does not need to tell us anything of his history or his family, but he will be retained until the end of the war nevertheless."

"He seems a nice young lad, despite all the wickedness he may have in him," said Gertrude Angelina. "If we could only keep him with us and teach him our ways--to be true and considerate of others everything would be alright. But he does look dangerous nevertheless as he really is a Zimmermannian."

"Why in that case it is lucky he was caught," said Violet. "But I'm glad he won't be shot."

"It is indeed a good thing," agreed Penrod. "But the remarkable thing to me is how such a young boy ever learned to become a spy. Perhaps his companion who was the real spy, who was the old man, was the real one, although I seem to remember it was this boy Zimmermannian who shot at you girls in ambush."

"Well we will soon know who the other is," suggested Gertrude. "He may prove to be another Calverinian."

Violet had the boy dismissed, and the old Calverinian was soon brought before them. Violet and her sisters looked at him in surprise and Violet exclaimed:

"Why it is old Mc-Hollister whom we saw in one of the child slave factories over two years ago."

The old man swung around and faced them.

"Yes indeed it is true," he said in a loud angry voice. "It is the old man Mc-Hollister, suggested, and I'm going to see to it that the whole glandelinian army of Manley's and others will be able to capture Angelina Anathia, and conquer the whole of Angelina, and be revenged on you vivian girls for spying on us when I was in charge there." He looked around a moment, and then continued more furiously. "There isn't any large number of Angelinians in sight, and I'm stronger than all of you girl friends put together. I don't know how I came to be captured and brought here, but I'm going to fight the fight of my life,--and I'll win or die."

His white hair and beard, waved in the breeze, his eyes flashed hate and vengeance and so astonished and shocked were they by the sudden appearance of this old enemy, that they could only stare at him in silence, and shrink away from his wild and defiant glare. Suggested laughed scornfully as he was forcibly led away by his guards and said firmly:

"And now--and now--and now you think I'm going to be shot as a spy but I'm not. I defy the whole world to do it."

He was then led away, and Violet then said:

"Once before this old Calverinian spy came here to spy on us, and once before he was caught, but escaped."

"For that reason," said Gertrude. "We must see to it that a place is found for him, so that he will not be able to escape this time. For if he escapes this time he will make trouble for you girls beyond doubt."

And so the wicked old old Calverinian was placed under stronger guard, so that he would not have much chance of escaping.

After having retreated to Dorothy Gale after his defeat at Zoe Callen, and at Pine the Christian armies having been heavily reinforced again, moved forward again to meet general Manley but he refused to stand his ground and retreated toward Jennie. General Vivian was sent by Hanson Vivian to try and cut off Manley's escape. Vivian moved forward as fast as he possibly could the Vivian girls and Jack Evans being in his command. By a forced march Vivian got around Manley's rear and he had to halt at Jennie. General which was fourteen miles northwest of Dorothy Gale. Manley seeing that the Christian armies under the two Vivians were making a swing around to the north, and with Vivian moving from the south, he became afraid, and realized if he did not strike one of them a blow, he would be caught in a trap. So after retreating for two days, slowly, he sent a part of his army, and some cavalry to the town of Florinanna. Francis Schmidt, and left the rest of it at Jennie. General to try and check the advance of Vivian. This movement caused two simultaneous battles to be fought. General Vivian engaged Manley furiously at Jennie. Turner and after a full day of fierce fighting drove the glandelinians before him with frightful losses. Men officers and artillery, and captured a lot of prisoners. The other battle raged for nine days with Manley's other a section of the army at Francis Schmidt. It also ended as a Christian victory, but general Vivian's army was shattered with its losses.

THE FULL ACCOUNT OF THE SIEGE OF JULIO CALLIO.....
AND THE BRUTAL GREAT FATHER THAT RAISED FOR HER POSS
SESSION. THE BATTLE OF LATER. AND THE BRUTAL TORTURE
AT BRIGAND.....

In the meantime the battle of Jennie Turner was still raging it being close to nightfall but nevertheless to the joy of all of those who heard of it the enemy was giving way at all sections of the line but only gradually and the whole outcome was already a great Christian victory. Violent and her sisters though they had not seen much of the horrible and usual slaughter of the battle itself though they had seen the devastating devastation caused by the terrible battle had nevertheless heard the awful roar of the conflict, had been amazed at the din and had wondered when it would ever end. They were overjoyed however when late that evening one of the sergeants appeared and told them that the Christians were winning a complete victory. And that the enemy was retreating. Violet asked him where their guardian colonel Jack Evans was, but the sergeant did not exactly know though he declared that Colonel Jack Evans passed through the whole battle safely, that he was not injured and that they may see him some time in the morning.

"They say the battle was terrible," said Violet. "A fearful slaughter of men. Do you know how many have been killed sergeant?" "I couldn't say just now," Evans may be able to know though. "He added. "He was always with general Vivian, who can find out losses easily."

"I know as we experienced the concussion of the battle damaged towns and cities for miles but one of the men had told me that there was more noise to the battle than regular slaughter," said Violet.

"The real fury of the battle," Violet said to tell you. "Said the sergeant. "But the battle is worse than that man said. Far worse than it's racket. The whole Christian army has been thinned out terribly and we have suffered a awful loss in generals. Our greatest leaders even fell."

"I know how many leaders and generals fell," said Violet. "And that did convince me that the battle was more terrible than those men cared to tell us. I had some experience this morning during the battle and as did my sisters. We had been captured and brought within the enemy's lines and close to the battle where we could hear and see it all. But terrible as it was we can stand the strain as long as our side won."

It was three days after a great and cruel battle had raged for nine days at Gloriana Francis Schmidt when the main armies of general Vivian arrived and encamped in the region of the recent hellish conflict at Francis Schmidt where thirty million on both sides fell and general Vivian after reforming his shattered but victorious army which he had brought to general Zimmermann's rescue decided to wedge in on Norma and Julio Callio and raise the siege which the other Christian armies had laid to the city for nearly two years, and fighting fierce battles to no decided advantage three or four times every month during those two harrowing and bloody years. The war in Europe in all its fury and horror could never rival the ferocity of these many battles raging at Julio Callio. Even Verdun and the others were only small battles compared to them and over four million had fallen on the Christian side alone during those terrible series of battles, and which were still continuing. In fact the cause of the siege of Julio Callio and Norma was the slaughter of children in the two cities, the child slave horrors prevailing elsewhere, and the seizure of ships laden with child slave refugees early in the war. In this way the Glandelinians had forced as many as 1700,000 children to be given up and finally at the same time the attacks on Julio Callio occurred, in which the Vivian girls with their mother and aunt experienced, by the Abbeisannian frigates the Glandelinians and St Joseph's was fired on by the Glandelinian warship the Christian when it was not prepared for an attack, and the Glandelinians carried off sixteen hundred thousand children out on refugee ships who were claimed as occupying child slaves. Every one of these proved to be Abbeisannian children and under the pains of this terrible war already raging Angelina demanded these children to be given up or all the soldiers under the Glandelinian service at Julio Callio would be massacred when the city would fall. But the Glandelinians refused to give up these children and not only that but insults were made, in fact instead of becoming better her actions grew worse.

A GREAT DISASTROUS DISASTER.....

In December 8 1912. And Abbeisannian excursion ship including the beautiful little saintly daughter of the Holy Abbeisannian King Cannon was sunk by a Glandelinian submarine flying the Angelinian flag and like the tragedy of righteously forty one, this ship sunk with all on board were lost. This action tended to increase Abbeisannian fury and hence now she never rested in her attacks on the fortifications of Vivian wickie a called the Mc-Whirther fortifications. This occurred near Julio Callio on the Mc-Holleston Run. The Angelinian government demanded justification for the tragedy threatening destruction to the besieged at Julio Callio and Norma and Brigand if the Glandelinians did not give the reason why they torpedoed the ship and the death of King Cannon's daughter. The Glandelinian government answered by throwing the frightful war into full swing in Galvernia raging many of the battles already mentioned as far as even the battle of Gloriana which is approaching, and Abbeisannian herself had become fully aroused by the disaster and collected large arms which were to be immediately thrown upon the cities of Julio Callio and Norma as soon as the Mc-Whirther fortification should fall. These places however did not fall until a little after the frightful carnage at Francis-Atlanta.

THE SURRENDER OF HOLIE.

The terrible siege opened, with a disgraceful defeat for the brave Glandelinians holding the fortifications of Holie on December 8 1912. General Waire the Glandelinian commander moved fiercely against the Angelinians under Mc-Holleston to raise the siege making a desperate attack on the Christian line. It was one of the bloodiest battles of the war along that part of the line. After a number of bloody disasters in which general Morie's left flank was annihilated his shattered armies fell back on Holie. There he was assaulted furiously by the Christians in overwhelming numbers. Morie was mortally wounded, his remaining army reduced to fragments and then forced to surrender to avert annihilation. It had been a terrible battle and out of eight million Glandelinians one hundred thousand survived the great battle. No loss of the Abbeisannians and Angelinians was severe but not credited, though 24,422 were found slain in a space of twenty yards across a shell swept plain. During the same month and into fierce attempts were made by the Christians to capture the southern fortifications of Norma already stated being the series of bloody battles of Norma's bridge but though the Glandelinians showed the greatest bravery that could ever be imagined they were successful in holding their positions in this quarter and suffered mutual losses.

Not long after a large division of general Waire's army under general Gandon was sent against the fortifications of Norma but they were attacked without warning by a force of Abbeisannians and Dombians and compelled to surrender. Many of the prisoners and also the wounded were slain by the infuriated Glandelinians who had lost many sweet hearts mothers, and children who had been slain by the Glandelinians in the Norma sign reign of terror. Simultaneously at Julio Callio an overwhelming force of Abbeisannians advanced upon the eastern fortifications, the Glandelinians stormed with their attack but were defeated in that seething inferno after a most terrible battle on the banks of the Angeline River. Simultaneously the Abbeisannians severely blowed the north and south ends of Julio Callio. Forts Holie and Norma were taken by the Abbeisannians and retaken by the Glandelinians fifteen times in six hours, only to be recaptured again after two long desperate battles.

but the dearly bought victories were of no benefit to the christians and when general Nolan Francis tried to take the main Glandelinian fortifications by storm the next day he was completely defeated with the most frightful loss in men and officers and baggage and cannon also and the Glandelinians counter charging like an army of maddened demons & retook the two forts and he held them successfully against the most pugnacious and desperate attacks which kept up for two weeks and made that region for twenty miles a raging inferno. In these engagements the atmosphere had been shaken into titanic convulsions by hundred of thousands of terrific shell explosions per day and the cannonading was heard for hundreds of miles. The christian onslaughts during this terrible battle of the Angelina river was inconceivably heavy but the number in killed and wounded though given at first as five million was finally withheld and such losses denied to be so small.

BONDINIA RUN: BEAUTIES LAKE, AND OTHER GREAT BATTLES. RAGING JANUARY 1 TO THE 2TH.

The Abbieannian and Anglinian troops were still more successful near the northeast of Julio Callo. They captured Fort Ponsin and defeated the Glandelinians in fighting of the most savage character at Bondinia Run. This fighting had been merciless and extremely bloody and both sides were crippled by the collision. Stubborn battles at Beauties Lanes and Zanagusta, polous and Wotruba in which both sides lost heavily raged simultaneously and in these battles neither side could claim the victory.

THE BATTLE NEAR THE CITY OF BADULA.

The siege and battles starting in the early summer were now becoming terrific. In September 1912 and Abbieannian and Anglinian forces five million strong were hurled back in an abyss of slaughter by the Glandelinian forces under Makon who lost forty thousand horses in a cavalry engagement raging simultaneously along the right. But in the highest fury of this bloody battle the Glandelinian assailants were met by the main Abbieannian line and in a welter of carnage defeated with a loss of nineteen thousand cannon millions of men in slain and wounded and with the loss of great portions of their strongest position. Besides many rations of ammunition provisions and the taking of one hundred thousand child slaves who rejoiced in their freedom. The Abbieannians burned a long line of stockades, child slave houses and thousands of public fortifications.

THE AT ATTACK ON AD ANDREW.

While this bloody battle was occurring large forces of Abbieannians and an Abbieannian fleet of warships under Boonia advanced for the fortifications of Anden and while their army prepared to attack that place the fleet attempted the capture of the fortifications which commanded the entrance to the city of Norma. For twenty four hours shot shell and high explosives was rained in torrents of ruin and destruction upon the fortifications, but while Fellenon kept the Abbieannians away fiercely enraged Markdumh with his Glandelinian warships suddenly attacked the christian fleets on all sides with such success that toward evening all the Abbieannian warships had either hauled down their flags or were running away as fast as steam would carry them. The Abbieannians simultaneously struck a blow at Chrillie. An Abbieannian fleet carrying three hundred thousand men entering Norma and capturing a small Glandelinian naval force steamed on to attack Julio Callo by water. While the thunderous cannonading was in progress a reinforcing army of Abbieannians was landed about six miles from Chrillie and attacked the place being led by Shrone. But general Gansoni was there with nearly a superior force and he was not the man to waver without a desperate fight. As rapidly as possible he threw up defenses and posted his army behind them. Quickly as possible the Abbieannians began the attack. Gansoni did not waste his ammunition or powder, he waited until the Abbieannians were close and then his forces kept pouring a deadly fire upon the christians steadily. Hundreds of generals and other officers were shot down by the whole line of christians, and though the Abbieannians tried hard to carry the Glandelinian works again and again they were driven back with their divisions mangled and torn to pieces at every onslaught. The Abbieannian losses were frightful but nevertheless they did not give up. The main wings were thrown against the Glandelinian positions in fearful numbers in which general Darge was killed and his army of Glandelinians driven from the works.

Chrillie was finally taken by the christians the Glandelinians were forced from the works and now Julio Callo seemed seriously handicapped. But another general Darge on the Glandelinian side had won on September 12th two bloody battles, one at Lanes, the other at Gandelina. And which were quickly followed by the battle of Moltteburg September 30th and of Gogis September 30th two fearful battles in which Darge again won the victory all raging through the same month. In the meantime general Lullie who had been appointed commander in chief of the Abbieannians advanced his besieging army aided by twelve thousand Cavalry men near the fortifications of Varah Kroothellie on July the tenth beyond the main line of the Abbieannian railroads, and during a furious bombardment lasting four weeks in which millions of shells seemed to rend the earth with their explosions captured the fortifications. His left wing during four weeks of severe infantry action pressed forward in their victorious advance toward the town of Poverty Row twenty miles east of Julio Callo. The advancing drive being successful the left wing under Dannerwater captured the Moolle fortifications after pounding it to pieces with an artillery drum fire and three other fortifications reduced to ruins surrendered to general Lullie. General Lullie's Abbieannians while an Abbieannian fleet under Commodore Girlinat Evangeline Scollieo was shelled by batteries at Anna Migi but the batteries were silenced and the Glandelinian fleet put to flight with a loss of about two thousand men and a score of ships.

THE TOWN OF POVERTY ROW TAKEN.

Scollieo, also defeated other forces of Glandelinians with the loss of their artillery beating them at Satas lanes and Bel Beelzebubs creek and pushed forward attacking attacking Chapooltepek the strongest defense of Varah Kroothellie, captured the town of Poverty Row and carried the other positions after making many fierce assaults. Seeing that all hopes of holding Varah Kroothellie were gone the Glandelinians under general Anna Migi recoiled toward the main line, with what remains of his army.

General Scollieo and Lullie entered the town of Poverty Row with his forces and raised his flag over the public buildings.

THE BATTLE OF CALVERINE.

While this was going on with Lullie's forces the Abbieannian army under the command of Evansville moved toward the city of Calverine to corner the christian forces upon northern Norma and Julio Callo in full force. There at that time general Ignorance Wickey and Phelan Cannon were stationed with about ten thousand million Glandelinians. The two armies met at Calverine October 1th 1912 in a withering storm of battle. At first after a fierce fighting the Glandelinian army was successful but just when it seemed that it must be victorious a fresh body of Abbieannians arrived, the Alandelinians were defeated and fled frightened and in disorder toward Norma. No on a counter came however or encouragement came from this great Alandelinian defeat for the Christians underated stood that a long fight for Julio Callio and Normahad been started by themselves and to carry it on a hundred million volunteers were called for and fifty million dollars were raised.

THE FIGHTING CONTINUED ALONG THE JULIO CALLIO AND NORMA BATTLE LINE. THE FIERCE FIGHTING IN THE WEST.

The Alandelinians were on the same date also defeated at Finger Mountain and again at Jellie Creek. General James Viviani with twenty million Alandelinians was compelled to surrender after a gallant fight at Viviani, and general Calso was attacked and beaten by the Abbieannians at Mendon on October the tenth.

But Commodore Hennie who afterwards became an admiral determined to capture the fortifications at all hazards and as he sailed on April the first with the strong fleet and an army commanded by general Consoand so perilous was this expedition that his best friends thought that he was going to commit suicide. For several weeks after April the second Hennie hammered away at the fortifications which continued to hammer back. The discharge of artillery on this occasion was frightful, two hundred thousand guns thundering in fearful salvos and so deafening was the din that thousands went insane from it while the shock was as severe as 4 kil birds in the air and windows broken in scores of towns in the region though hundreds of miles away. Hennie found that bombarding the fortifications was of no avail and so he endeavored to boldly steam pass them and in spite of their heavy firing put through the chimneys, out fought the Alandelinian force destroyed the opposing Alandelinian fleet but failed to pass the Alandelinian fortifications. This expedition was a failure and this important step to open the Angeline river, and made another scene almost like McWhirther.

GENERAL TRANSIT'S DRIVE.

In July, Transit with his Abbieannian army moved forward toward the Tripontia fortifications, the Alandelinians opposing him fiercely at every step. A month was spent in besieging and attacking these fortified fortifications fearful sanguinary battles occurring simultaneously at Palm woods but with no decided advantage for either side just now. These occurred on August the 6th. Pressing on Transit attacked Mc-Gullich and the desperate battles of Angeline will be followed on August the third to the tenth. The Alandelinian losses were terribly heavy and Mc-Gullich moved his main wings across a branch of the Angeline river other terrible fighting occurring of which the most notable was the frightful carnage at Meldon on August 19th. The loss on both sides was heavy the Alandelinians withdrawing to Calverine Landing and Transit relieving red fl forces determined to press on and so continued to move on advancing now toward Julio Callio. He met and defeated on September 15th general Hendon Satens Alandelinians at Calverine Landing and later on the same day beat other Alandelinian forces which endeavored to retake Poverty Row, the Alandelinians being beaten and retreating in all haste while general Transit pushed onward as soon as the Abbieannians could be gotten into proper order they started again after Mc-Gullich. A desperate fight took place at Musplains Hill and the Alandelinians were driven back. Simultaneously Mc-Gullich had sent general Melaine to Melshury where he made twelve thousand prisoners and captured a large quantity of arms. These two last battles occurred on September 10th.

THE BATTLE OF DECLINIA...

1-164

Mc-Gullich Johnston and St. Eaton were fiercely attacked at the fortification works of Declinia on September 24th which proved to be a very terrible fight and lasted three days on both sides suffering frightful losses. The Alandelinians however held their ground despite their loss of 2433 2,433,999 and at night the Christians resumed the bombardment.

THE BATTLE OF GATHERLINGBURG.....

Mc-Gullich Johnston and St. Eaton strove to retake the Tripontia fortifications but was stopped at Gatherlingburg by the Abbieannian army and in the meantime fighting that followed, the Alandelinians were severely defeated, the Alandelinians losing 3,900,000 men in killed and wounded while 99,000 99,800 men were taken as prisoners. The Alandelinian front in the west of Julio Callio and some battle lines reached from Portentia to Angeline river gap. The whole region for almost the entire length was in the possession of the Alandelinians and the whole region was packed with series of strong batteries. This gave the Alandelinians a double advantage for it prevented Abbieannian ships from passing up and down the Mc-Hollester river and also the Mc-Whirther River and it made it very easy for the Alandelinians to procure a plentiful supply of beef from Alandelinia. Part of the plan of the terrible siege laid out by the Abbieannian generals was to try to drive the Alandelinians from their rivers. One step toward this was the capture of three fortifications on the Angeline river fronting Julio Callio by a fleet of Abbieannian battle ships under Commodore Nelsies on November 4th. The commander on the side was Major general Bernard Dunn Anderson.

THE CAPTURE OF THE NELKINSBURG FORTIFICATIONS.

Then simultaneously general Farlow with the help of Nelsies fleet attacked the Nelkinsburg fortifications under John Nunn a strong support on the Mc-Whirther river or Mc-Hollester river and after three weeks hard fighting which resembled almost a Mc-Whirther bombardment captured it with about 600,000 men. The rest of the Alandelinian force then withdrew from the Angeline river toward Norma and Julio Callio.

THE BATTLE OF LANDING ISLAND.

On October 20th 1912 the opposing armies met at Landing Island. After a cruel struggle the Alandelinians were at first driven back, and it seemed as if the Abbieannians must be successful. But their leading general ghapool was killed and general Nelsies likewise arrived with fresh troops from Julio Callio to help the Alandelinians. The following day after more cruel fighting the Abbieannians retreated north to Colton. But on the same day Snowline Alandelinian stronghold on the Mc-Whirther river surrendered after a month's obstinate fighting. General Simon Francis continued in which fort Ignorance was taken by the Abbieannians while simultaneously the fortifications of Chillows captured by the Alandelinian troops. Thus at least the Mc-Hollester River was opened to the Abbieannians as far south as Clamburg. South of Clamburg was Julio Callio. In the meantime but simultaneously, the Alandelinians were driven from Colton and one of their generals Pugnosia with an army of 600,000 men were captured at the fall of fort Henryson. Callion was sent to force back the Alandelinian drives north of Julio Callio and Callio in a desperate battle lasting a month stopped the Alandelinian drive.

The "landelinians losing Pugnoses who was killed with the mortally wound wounding of general Mc-goodill-fell back across Selrion gun. Thus ended the three months series of battles.

THE BATTLE OF BONSULU

Gallion pressed his advantage following the enemy and a battle raged at Selrion on April 10th the conflict raging four days in general duisultry and frightful violence that startled the world. The losses on both sides was very great but as the army of "landelinia held the field at the end it had a sort of victory. Bonsulu was the strongest fortifications guarding Julo Gallio, many fortifications being below the city at this point thousands of heavy chains being stretched from bank to bank of the Noma, Mc-Hollister and Mc-Wharther rivers, and there numerous iron clad men and submarine sum submarines so that it was impossible for an enemy's fleet to go near the fortifications. In a series of conflicts around these fortifications millions of "landelinians fell and hundreds of thousands were taken prisoners. But the next week after severe artillery duels Mc-Gullich Johnston with larger forces again made furious drives for the Tripononcia fortifications. But was met at Hamselburg and there another terrific battle took place which lasted a four days raging especially at Pafu Padula. A week after Mc-Gullich's army was twice the size of the Abbieannians under Transit but having defeated with a loss of about 11,664,000 men of which 444,777,500 men were made prisoners. And again the "landelinians were forced to fall back on Julo Gallio.

THE BATTLE OF HALPSCOW, OR CLAMDONBURG.

Nevertheless the three "landelinian generals were bound to retake the fortifications of Tripononcia and redoubling the strength of their forces marched to attack the troops of Abbieannians at Clamdonburg creek and if successful they were to push on to the fortifications. But they did not get so far. General Francis Handlin with a force of tens of millions of Abbieannians hurried forward and drove in at the "landelinians at Clamdonburg on October 20th. The bloody battle lasted six days, and was one of the bloodiest for the possession of Julo Gallio. The first five days the struggle was fierce on both sides with some advantage gained on the side of the foe. On the sixth day there was nineteen hours of the most savage fighting and toward the evening about three million three hundred thousand "landelinians the pick of the "landelinian army made desperate and fearful charge against the Abbieannian line. Fearful was the struggle and fearful the loss. But it was like a charge against a mighty mountain. Handlin did not give way, and the "landelinians with their columns torn and scattered were driven back to where at night found the Christian troops victorious. The Abbieannians lost in killed and wounded five million three hundred and thirty five thousand men in killed alone while the "landelinian loss was considered as about ten million nine hundred thousand.

THE SURRENDER OF CLAMBURG.

In the meantime the "landelinians still held Clamburg and Violet Dane on the Angelina river. General Camilio Camillia Darge however succeeded in crossing the river by means of pontoon bridges and got his army in the rear of Clamburg. A siege then began on July which lasted more than ten weeks. The shelling of the fortifications was kept up without intermission. At last when the food was so far gone, that there was only one cracker and a small piece of meat a day for each man in the "landelinian army itself he general Clansoni the "landelinian commander surrendered with three million men. A month later Violet Dane also surrendered and the whole length of the Angelina River from fronting Julo Calliows open to the Abbieannians....

THE BATTLE OF AURANDIGO.....

Mc-Gullich though unsuccessful several times in his attempts to retake the Tripononcia fortifications had with the help of fresh troops, attacked the army of Abbieannia at Aurandigo on October 1th and drove it back with heavy loss to Calmoco. But general Darnot who commanded the right wing of the Abbieannian line bravely held his ground and saved the army from complete defeat. For two months Mc-Gullich kept the Abbieannians shut up in Calmoco, with continual heavy fighting going on. Then Darge Johnston was given command of the armies in the drive against Julo Gallio went to Calmoco with notes. Hannie also remained there with some troops from Clamburg, and Hel Mendila brought 25,000,000 men from the east. In a series of blood battles which kept on for three days Pears mountain and Apperidge were attacked and taken and Mc-Gullich was forced to retire upon Julo Gallio again.

HENNIES DRIVE.....

Up to this time each Abbieannian army had been operating independently but now Hannie was made commander in chief of all the armies, and he once prepared to make a general drive on Julo Gallio. On June 4th 1913 Hannie drove his way forward being forced to fight his way step by step. On the 7th of June he was suddenly attacked in general fury by the "landelinians and a furious battle raged at Violet Lainsin Run, which lasted three days. Then followed immediately on June 24th a ten days battle at Gallio and another at Violet Lainsin Run which starting on July 4th lasted fully a month raging in a most savage manner. Cannon fire of the Abbieannians was driven back but was rallied before disaster occurred. In these desperate battles there was terrible slaughter on both sides. The "landelinian losses in killed and wounded was over 16,000,000 in the three battles and the Abbieannians lost about 9,000,000. Hannie however confident over his three victories would not turn back now, for he felt sure of success and declared he would fight it out if it took him ten years. Nevertheless the "landelinians on the 19th of July laid siege to Tripononcia and Calverine, this siege lasting only three days however. General Homer an Abbieannian officer of great experience and daring advanced to attack the besiegers, but his left moving on Padul was attacked and driven back with terrific loss. In the meantime general Darge Mc-Hollister was moving his forces forward and at Gallio lanes the "landelinians were defeated, the left was rallied, and the whole line went forward after battling furiously for two days. More fighting lasting a full month occurred at Colongen, and at the worse of the battle Hannie the main leads was twenty six miles away at the time his army was taken by surprise and driven back in confusion. After a most terrific conflict of seven hours. When Hannie heard the terrific booming of the thousands of cannon he knew that one of the most bloodiest battles of the siege of Julo Calliows was going on. He quickly sprang into his saddle and snurring on his fast reached the scene of the terrible fight just in time. Though surprised and driven into confusion the Abbieannians had made a stand, but now his men were fleeing before a fearful charge of the enemy.

"Turn boys and fight for your Saviour. Turn. He cried. "We are going back the other way." And back they went. Encouraged by his words, and presence the Christians made a gallant counter charge driving the "landelinians from the field, capturing sixty hundred big guns and took many prisoners.

Before this bloody battle in which nearly ten million or five hundred thousand fell on both sides, the Glandelinians had butchered some more women and children.

HENNIE CAPTURES VIOLET PAUL.

To carry out the plan agreed upon, Hennie continued his drive with his force of seventy million men and after three other savage battles at Bulla Collen, and Plappen, in which Darge Mc-Hollesst was wounded the Abbieannians were for a time checked in their advance, the Glandelinians falling back on Violet Paul. These battles occurred the first in July 19. The others occurred simultaneously. On August 19, Hennie immediately attacked on August 20th and after a two days battle the Glandelinians were so badly defeated, and their army so badly broken that the survivors retreated in a panic. General Surren also with an Abbieannian force tried to aid Hennie's advance but in two other battles Surren's Abbieannians were defeated on Sunday August 19 and on the 20th. In the meantime Saten was hemmed in on all sides the Christians held on besieging him and now he began to look about for some way to retreat. He could get neither food or arms, and his men were half starved. But there was no means of escape for the railroad which he depended upon had been destroyed. It had not been so lately when Hennie and Darge Mc-Hollesst had defeated Saten at one hundred forks river and the next day the Abbieannian works in front of Triponencia had been attacked by Saten's men but Saten receiving no reinforcements could not win and began to retreat slowly northward.

THE SURRENDER OF SATEN AT MELPORT.

Saten tried several times to reach Julio Callio where he could get aid but his worn out men came face to face with another large Abbieannian force in under Mc-Hollesst's Darge and resistance was of no use. Though a battle did rage in vain. Seeing this Saten with his whole army surrendered to Hennie on July 31st 1912. Hennie treated the Glandelinians in the most generous manner, asking only that they should lay down their arms, and surrender and return to their country as they were nearly starved. He ordered thirty five thousand rations of food to be given them.

GANNON SURRENDERS.....:)

The only Glandelinian army still besieged was Gannon Dunn at Hollie town. But as he could do nothing alone, and as there was no one to help him and being cut off from Julio Callio he too surrendered and his men laid down their arms. In a short time all the smaller bodies of the Glandelinians still at large in this region surrendered, and now Julio Callio seemed fully open to Hennie's army.

BATTLE OF TURNER HILL.

BATTLE OF TURNER'S HILL. JUNE 12TH 1913.

In the meantime fresh troops had been sent out from Angelina to help General Abbieannians besieging Julio Callio. Thus strengthened he determined to capture Turner Hill. But before he could do so the Glandelinians took possession of the hill and fortified it. General Cancer then sent a large force of Abbieannians to drive the Glandelinians from the hill and position. A long and bloody fight followed. The Glandelinian army under Bone fought well and desperately and though obliged to retreat last before overwhelming numbers it was a dearbought victory for the Abbieannians. Their losses in killed and wounded were over 10,000,000, while the whole loss of the Glandelinians was five million two hundred and fifty thousand in killed and wounded beside those found missing.

THE BATTLES ALONG THE JULIO CALLIO LINE CONTINUE WITH TERRIBLE ERNEST..

THE Abbieannians at the same time captured the Port of Hurricane blow and Mc-Fern, and a chain of one hundred forts, and newly built forts behind these were taken in a series of fierce battles, a drive being made simultaneously on the Protestia fortifications. General Cancer advanced his armies furiously to attack these fortifications. Gabbie who was second in command took the advance learning that large forces of Glandelinians were concentrating on Haddonson gun. He marched there and suddenly attacked and defeated the Glandelinians. The victory was short lived however, for the Glandelinians sent over a large force a week later against Gabbie who was obliged to surrender after a furious conflict.

SECOND BATTLE OF FORT PROTESTIA.

After the surrender of Gabbie Hennie threw forward his forces to attack Fort Protestia with the intention to capture it all hazards. General Proclib marched against Fort Protestia and the result was that the Glandelinians opened one of the deadliest battles and the Abbieannians were forced to retire in the greatest confusion having suffered fearful and inconceivable losses. Proclib was wounded. And his army was saved from annihilation only by the coolness and courage of General Cancer who had five horses shot under him and many bullets passed through his coat. This disastrous battle occurred on June 24th.

THE SURRENDER OF THE FORTS.

General Cancer a brave Abbieannian officer, indeed relieving 10,000,000 men again moved forward to attack the forts. General Que the Glandelinian commander saw his danger, but he was a brave man and marched out as soon as possible to repel the Abbieannian attack. In the long and long death struggle that followed, the Abbieannians were victorious, but General Cancer was mortally wounded, and died after the surrender of the fortifications. Shortly after the capture of the great line of fortifications the rear line also fell into the hands of the Abbieannians. This occurred on June 30, --- 31st.....

GAG-GAGSEIDS TROOPS TO DESTROY THE MILITARY STORES AT BOONIA. BATTLE OF BOONIA. JUNE 2th 1913.....

Learning that a lot of powder and other military stores were at the lands, landelinian fortifications of Boonia General Gag-gag sent general Alie with twenty five hundred thousand men to destroy them. But there also was a large force of landelinians, and when the alarm reached them the soldiers quickly got ready to relieve them. A small advanced force of the Abbieannians fired on the landelinians stationed near a bridge leading to the city of Ju'o Julio Gallio, killing twenty five thousand and wounding a hundred thousand, and then hurried on to Boonia where they destroyed some cornfields and captured many cannon. By this time the main force of Abbieannians were aroused and they made a vehement assault on the Abbieannians. A furious death struggle followed and the Abbieannians were under such a heavy cannonading during the height of the battle that they began to run and were chased like a flock of frightened sheep..... These landelinians were led by Mc-arn.

ANOTHER DRIVE AGAINST JULIO GALLIO.....?

The news of this great defeat of the Abbieannians spread through the country of Galverinia, and every man able or unable asked to enlist and help capture Julio Gallio. Men dropped their work, and enlisted by millions boys asked to serve with the drums and the smiles soon grew larger and in a short time Gag-gag had a large force of landelinians under Phelan Gummilia shut up in Boonia. Having learned that new forces of landelinians intended to attack the northern part of Boonia, general Protestant, sent two large Abbieannian armies to reinforce Gag-gag. One of these was commanded by Gadlin Homer, a gallant Abbieannian who was fighting for the Christian cause, the other by general Neldion....

Gadlin Homer captured Scandia after a desperate fight of twenty days, starting July 1th, forty thousand being killed, and two hundred thousand wounded every day and then pushed forward hoping to take the landelinian fortifications on Nellie Galverine gun. He was joined by Neldion and the drive was resumed with the result of sad and crushing defeat for the landelinians who were driven back with a loss of 15,000,000 in killed and wounded and two hundred thousand in prisoners. This was on July 28th.

But on the Abbieannian side during this terrific battle of Nellie Galverine Run the brave Gadlin Homer the main commander was killed, Neldion and Neldion were badly wounded, and the Abbieannian forces were in a pitiful plight on account of their frightful losses.....

But in the meantime general Josue G. Cannon was drilling his men about Boonia while one hundred thousand cannon was placed in position on surrounding hills from which they could easily shell the landelinian positions at Boonia, and Nellie Galverine gun. Starting August 1th the city was cannonaded by so many guns for two weeks, the landelinians finally withdrawing, Cannon entering the Boonia fortifications in triumph. But simultaneously the Abbieannians were defeated at Clocklin with the loss of 20,000,000, and again at Nellie Galverine hill and Francis Lawdale and Labie, with untold losses these battles being extremely cruel merciless and savagely in their inconceivable fury, and by the beginning of August 28th at this section the landelinians had recovered most of all their lost positions.....

THE SURRENDER OF A-HICKADEE - POWAD..

After several bloody battles, at winning and losing some of which he was victorious and in the others in which he was defeated, A-Hickadee-powad pushed his way against the Abbieannian line, but two other battles at the same places put him out of business and he had to surrender to the Abbieannians and the news of this victory caused great rejoicing throughout the world. The first two battles occurred in July 22nd and 30th. The third one on August 4th. The fourth August 4th.

THE ABBIEANNIANS ATTACK POWAD. COMMANDED BY FRANCIS SCHM IDT IDT PHILIP.

Simultaneously large forces and fleets were pushed forward to attack fort Morbon but at that fortification was too strongly fortified, the Abbieannian ships sailed south hoping to capture Powada great line of landelinian fortifications. These were attacked on August 5th. These fortifications were built of stone and iron and they made such a gallant defense that after a desperate fight of two weeks the ships were forced to withdraw with the loss of ninety ships and fifty thousand men. Their leader was general Joe Sporn.....

THE BATTLE OF GANDONLINIA.

SEPTEMBER 18TH... ..

After driving the enemy from Boonia, the Nellie Galverine gun Cannon moved his large forces of Abbieannians to Morbon and general Ignorance who had come up from Bondinaw was suddenly attacked at Gandonlinia. His army had been strengthened by fresh divisions mostly Omarians sent from Omaria, and so he determined to stand his ground at all costs. General America with a force of about sixty million held the fortified positions at Gandonlinia and defense on the hills south of the city of Julio Gallio. The Abbieannians being successful at the left, crossed from Erebus gun, and attacked in general fury all along the line. This most desperate of battles raged four days with the most frightful violence. On the fourth day the Abbieannians were fighting bravely against the Omarians when they suddenly heard firing behind them. It was too late to escape, they were surrounded. Their loss in killed and wounded was over 33,000,000, and over five million were made prisoners. While the battle was going on in full swing Cannon crossed over from Morbin, but was unable to save the force from its total rout and from capture. As he could not hold the positions he had captured against the larger force, Cannon retreated to the main Abbieannian line near or toward Nellie Gallio gun and then continued on to Arton Plains where he was reinforced. The victorious landelinians attacked the Gallio fortification three days later recapturing them, after desperate fighting, taking about five hundred thousand prisoners. This indeed was a heavy blow for the cause of Angelinia, but reinforced as he was Cannon did not lose hope for a moment.

Cannon recrossed the Angeline and Mc-Holleston railroad line and made a driving counter charge across a range of landelinian batteries, which stormed with drum fire, closely followed by other Abbieannian forces. Being successful he crossed the Eminie river destroying the landelinian forces on under Marcotown, and passed over toward the boundary of Julio Gallio Run, first taking care to destroy all the bridges, available for the use of the enemy.

This left the landelinians no other choice than to retreat. The main line of the enemy however not only held firm, but counter charged with such terrific violence, that the Abbieannians had to let loose a blinding storm of curtain fire, and the very lands and plains were choked with the landelinian dead. So sudden was the main onslaught of the landelinians that nearly ten million five hundred thousand landelinian soldiers were killed, wounded and taken prisoner, and nearly all the stores fell into Cannon's hands. Though this onslaught had been surprising, sudden a terrific fight had been made by the Abbieannians, and so furiously that they resisted their foe until they fled with nearly over forty five million five hundred thousand killed and wounded taken prisoners. It had been one of the fiercest battles of the war in that section but was finally won by the foe as it resumed. The following week Cannon fared better, and defeated another force of landelinians on a narrow plain, along the Angeline river. Banks and now again it was the enemy's turn to fall back, and the whole line of fortifications north of Julio Gallio was again in possession of the Christians....

The hope of the Abbeccians of the immediate fall of Julo Callio was now completely revived despite his defeat at Gandonlinia. Gannon now marched to Abietown run, where his armies closed the siege there more tightly.

THE BLOODY BATTLE OF ANGELINE RIVER. AUGUST 1 19TH.

While this was going on general Salsia Johnston with about eighteen million men advanced to capture Philsion. Gannon extended his lines to head him off. And again the two armies met but this time along the wooded region of the Angeline River. A most cruel sanguinary conflict ensued, and the Glandelinians were again defeated, with a loss of 9,118,000 men in killed wounds and prisoners. The following week in a desperate battle at Mornon the Glandelinians were again defeated with frightful loss. In fact the results of the battles were very discouraging to the Glandelinians. Simultaneously Boglonia set forward with an army of about 100,000,000 men his drive being bravely resisted at St John by large forces of Glandelinians under general Pett or but they had to retreat. In this advance there followed the bloody battle at Gannon, and the enemy were defeated again. General Calsoe made a stand at Salvos run, and in a bloody battle which took place Boglonia drove him back capturing two million prisoners. These two battles occurred simultaneously on August 15th.

CALSOE'S SURRENDER..... WHY HE DOR'S.....

I

It was still the turn for the Glandelinians to retreat and Calsoe made haste to get back to Julo Callio. Finding this far too impossible, he fell back on Smil'ses Mu Mouth. Here he was hemmed in on all sides, he had very little food and there was no way of getting more. Malscow who was expected with fresh troops, had not arrived while the Abbeccians forces were being constantly increased..... by the arrival of reinforcements. But Calsoe attempted to break through..... the Abbeccian line on August 19th, but after a series of bloody battles, there was nothing else to do..... But to surrender..... And this Calsoe did August 27th 1913 and his army of ninety million men with cannon and arms fell into the hands of the Christians. We can imagine the effects of this victory won by the Abbeccians. All hopes of Julo Callio falling was still more revived while the thinned out ranks of the Angelinians and Abbeccians were filled with new volunteers, and there was general rejoicing throughout the whole County of Calverlinia and Abbeccania too....

THE BATTLE OF MOUTHINGBURG. SEPTEMBER 10TH. 1914

After the surrender of Glandelinia Malscow was ordered to attack the Abbeccian line to revenge Calsoe's downfall. He was attacked himself however at Mouthingburg run, a severe fight occurring, but though successful the Glandelinians did not win a complete victory. As it was the Abbeccians lost more than six million four hundred thousand in killed and wounded, and eighty thousand by capture. The Abbeccians succeeded in falling back on Nellie Calverline run. Gannon rushing reinforcements for them. During this battle the Glandelinians had also attacked the fortifications of Nellbury and annihilated the defenders killing the aged refugees, including women and children burning the therefor fortifications and leaving the place a ruin. Similar barbarous acts occurred elsewhere the Glandelinians burning millions of tons on to the Angelinians and capturing their artillery. Unable to withstand the Glandelinians at the north and south of the city, the Abbeccians turned their attention to the southwestern fortifications. A large army of Abbeccians and even Tripolygonigians and Domdocians extended their battle lines southward and in a very short time on the 10th of September that part of the fortifications was in possession of the Christians who shelled the city for days. The Glandelinians now became frightened and called out all her militia but the Abbeccian forces were too strong and overran the whole region. General Marcosellion attempted to recapture with a fleet the fortifications of Richterston on September 21st but after a week of stubborn fighting the Glandelinians were repulsed repulsed with heavy loss.

THE LOSS OF POWAD.

Two weeks

Two weeks after the defeat of at Richterston general Marcosellion withdrew to fort Powad but he was besieged there by Gannon with an army and a fleet and after a desperate battle was forced to surrender on October 14th. Hoping to recover the southern fortifications Hickadeos armies gathered in large forces on in front of the captured Omnia Woonia fi fortifications and there a terrible battle took place which raged three days. The Glandelinians were badly defeated their losses in killed and wounded being three million one hundred twenty thousand and all their baggage and artillery was captured. The battle of Omnia Woonia raged October 15th-----17th.

THE BATTLE OF LATRUVA

However these victories resulted in greater carnage than over General Francis Mc-Hollister had during this time advanced all his Christian forces to help raise this siege..... Having nearly 50,000,000 Abbeccians, 500,000 Gannonians, 200,000 Tripolygonians, 900,000 Domdocians, and 16,000,000 Angelinians the combined number being 67,000,000, of which the other 600,000 were cavalry. The Glandelinians at this section of the line under Oliver Gannon, and Henna Shoemanna, concentrated across Vivianias plains and here at the same time the great battle of Cedernine was fought another Cedernine raged. It was the most terrific battle the world had ever been called to attention about in this part of the bloody war and for forty eight hours the roar of musket merrymen and cannon, hundreds of thousands of big guns and terrific explosions never ceased, charges following in endless succession. Toward noon of the second day general Mc-Hollister's left wing had been wiped out and in the afternoon his army being on the verge of defeat from their losses had started to give way when another force of Abbeccians came up, and struck the Glandelinians a terrible blow on the flank. This army under Hina Aronburger rushed the Glandelinian army and surrounding one quarter of it forced it to surrender. The rest was routed. The losses is not given on the Christian side though the fees losses was considered as 40,222,222. Over this bitter defeat the general in chief of the Glandelinians at Julo Callio became a afraid and on November the Abbeccians won victories at Stanok, Gend Gen Cedan and Calmarinia fortifications, their path lay open to Julo Callio which they then besieged in general. The siege and battles lasted for weeks but nevertheless the Abbeccians found it impossible to take the city of Julo Callio, and called upon general Vivian for aid. Thus the reason for general Vivian's purpose to capture the city. Now to make statements for the conditions of the prisoners inside of Julo Callio especially among the children was something terrible. Indeed the scenes during the reign of terror in Norma had been unspeakably terrible but the scenes in Julo Callio had the sign of terror in Norma beat a thousand million fold. No one could

No one could imagine the sufferings among the children there. The children, not glad enough looking were driven to the hardest slavery, and those good or pretty in fancy features were considered as defective, unable to work and were thus in place called torture building and the children driven to slavery were a good deal better off than those confined in the torture building. Children unable to work or overcome from tortures lasting months were usually crucified, nailed to the crosses by their fingers and toes and hands and feet connected and stripped of all their clothes even little girls, and scourged with iron spiked lashlines as they hung there. May the crucifixion was similar to that of our Lord, equally horrible and thorns were crushed upon the hair of the dying children. The city of Juila Caliso was a veritable hell, a hot place of demanating horrors, and who can imagine the indescribable tortures inflicted upon children, either really crippled or helpless, and these children suffered because they were prettiness. All the inflicted tortures to the children was described in full details just now especially in the last paragraph, I need not repeat it again. It is difficult to describe them correctly, but let me say children died in thousands every year from these tortures. Some of the children were loved like sons and everybody else ever anybody considered as Christians no matter what nationality but they had it a great deal easier than the children, were offered pay for their work, and few fell well on their promise not to alienated themselves against the landelinians names. But the various priests and other religious were treated the same as the children being fairly driven in their work got no pay, and were half starved. All this had continued during every day so wages, the landelinians receiving the captured childlike pains of the fortified rivers and boys, the children child children being sent here by the general landelinian mines when ever children were captured during raids or victorious battles. This city was the center of all the landelinian terror for nowhere else in California was there any greater slavery or cruelty. Truly it would be a great providence if the Angelinians would finally capture the city of Juila Caliso-General Vivian and the others know of these horrors there, and so it was his purpose to capture the city at all costs.

General Vivian had decided to strike at Norma first, and Brigano, especially strife against these two places simultaneously then to march southward on and strike through Calvernia and sweep all before him and end the bloody war as quickly as possible. Violet and her sisters were excited when they learned of general Vivian's intentions for they wished to see that section of Calvernia once more. At first however they were going to face bitter disappointment for general Vivian was not going to advance general Zimmernann's armies, and which if he did not do they would have to stay behind, as he did not wish to take them in that dangerous location where the worse of all the Landelinians were, where there were no kind hearted Landelinian general as to help them out if they got captured. But general Vivian soon realized that he needed both the armies of Zimmernann and Hansonia for he had learned that Manley had retreated in the direction of Norma and that his armies would show stern fury when he learned that Julio Gallic was threatened. So the two armies were suddenly called upon to make the advances soon as possible and as soon as they could get started and head the Manley's off.

In the meantime Violet and her sisters had taken notice of what had been going on and knowing that the Christians would advance before long decided to find their way back to their fathers army and to be with their friend and guardian Jack Evans. Of course they knew that they would have a long journey before them and wondered if they could reach him before the march began. They started out early on Sunday morning after his bidding farewell to the officers who cheered until they were almost deaf. They were in a large touring car Violet operating the car herself and the three little girls hoped to make good time and reach general Vivian's lines quickly. They set off and had been going only a few miles, when violet had flew off and the ring of a bullet came simultaneously. Where ever the shot came from none of the little girls knew, but nevertheless expecting worse they ducked while the two soldiers who on the car drew their pistols.

"Be careful I earnestly advise you for it may be one of the enemy," said the lieutenant. "Be wary in the bushes over there."

Violet had stopped the car, and then waited to see what would happen, but nevertheless they stayed down not taking a chance. They were very lucky.

Nothing as yet happened the lieutenant took a small pole found in the seat and immediately raised it up having attached a white piece of cloth to it immediately four Glandeliniers approached out of the bushes headed by a Colonel.

"So you little snips got scared after all," Hiss & the colonel fiendishly. "Got 'bred of our perquisitions, eh?"
"If you move about near to us or make a break for the bushes you will be dead men," said the lieutenant. "We surrender to you who are our prisoners. What foolishness."

"That trick is this anyway," Roared the colonel in a rage. "That was the meaning of the white flag!"

"It was arranged that you Americans show yourselves," answered the lieutenant seriously. "You will have to submit yourselves to be tied up as we would not trust you if you were loose in a car." Violet and your sisters you have plenty of rope. Tie them securely by the arms and march them into the car. We will turn them over to General Avian."

The -landelindians started a wild protest, saying that it was not right to treat officers in this way, and making prisoners of them without provocation.

"We were only lying down and taking naps." Said one of the

"We were not going to do anything." Said another.

"High." Said one of the lieutenants. "Then jurnapping must have been pre pt prett y far reachi g. How was it that Violet's hat flew off?"

"It must have been the wind." Was the answer of one of the landelinians.

"And nothing. There was no wind blowing toward the direction from which the hat went, and also she heard the sweet music of one of you Mandolinian bullets. You say we arrested you without provocation, and yet one of you fired at the children while hiding in ambush. Who ever he is he is a coward, and will suffer for it."

The landolinians were secured by Violet and the sisters who lifted their arms in such a way that there could be no way of escaping whatever, and then the rascals their weapons being taken from them were made to get into the machine.

"None of your fraks now." Said the lieutenant to one of the islandelians seriously who was trying to get out. "Make a breakfast we will fill 1 you with shot. Have three little girls daughters of mil mine suffing untol! uh untold horrors in your damme hell in Sulo -alliland that is making me itch to kill all islandelians I can for pleasure well as necessity. So be careful and do not tryz trifle withme."

At this the Landellinian sat in the seat quietly and the trip was resumed. This time a soldier drove the car, the little girl kept watch on the Landellinian snipers. The weather was very cold that day and snow was beginning to fall not heavily but lightly, but Violet fearing that it was the outbreak of one of those dreadful Germanian flu epidemics begged the soldier to run the machine a little faster. The soldier indeed knew soldier to run the machine a little faster. The soldier indeed knew that a severe blizzard was approaching, and opened the lever all the way and away they went at the speed of sixty miles an hour. The road was smooth and even, boarded with the thick wooden boards and it was the woods in particular that the little girls watched closest to closely as they believed that some enemy may be hiding among the dark pine and who believed that some enemy may be hiding among the dark pines and who may attack them to rescue their four comrades, help held prisoners on the machine. Indeed those dark woods looked very forboding and they dreaded indeed that some ambush would be there. However mile after mile went by under the same harsh words as the other mile after mile went by and nothing unusual happened, though now the snow was falling fearfully heavy, and in five icy flakes, which in striking the windshield made a noise like fine hail. The wind was also rising, to a gale, which fortunately kept the roar from being covered quickly, and so there was no danger of their being the sound of the wind, the wind was blowing, yet, before they would reach general Vivian's lines, at a distance now of perhaps ten miles or more, and it was already snowing so hard that they could not see objects fifty yards from them, indeed of the flakes, mixed with flakes as large as man's eye flying among the shroud here and there. The approaching fury of the blizzard storm made the little girls fearful and anxious to reach general Vivian's lines, as quick as possible, for the wind during a Galvianian blizzard rises to the violence of a hurricane and so this is the cause of their anxiety.

After they had covered about five miles more, the snow became so thick that objects about fifty feet away became wholly invisible, and the wind fairly roared through the trees, whirling blinding clouds of snow into the faces of the children, confusing even the driver who had to slow down for fear of an accident. However the car soon reached the Christian line, after being halted by several sentries, and then drove into the heart of the Christian lines. . . . Several days after the storm which had laid over two feet of snow on the ground in level depth, and ten to twelve feet in snowdrifts, violet and her sisters were glad that they were in general uniform. Violet had been making a speech to the men, then the reason of the great crowd of men that had gathered. Evans had created the little girls as if they were his sisters, who had been lost and who had just returned. The soldiers demanded Evans to have one of the little girls to give a speech. They all crowded around and finally they cried in unison: "Violet!"

"Violet! Violet! let her give a speech! She knows how to do it!" Violet the cry stood up in the auto and made assign for silence. "Friends! She began. "You all know that I am going to march with all his arms to the front. You all remember that I and my sisters experienced in those treacherous cities, and what Hanley did to us after all the good we done for him, when he had his trouble with Hanson our uncle. Well all that is nothing, compared to the children's poll. On the night of July 10th, when it is my wish and also my sisters that you men do all you can to help drive the enemy from those two cities, to punish the landelinians severely for the cruel treatment of the prisoners. There and mama and auntie had it joined the Red Cross after the battle of Florin. Francis and we have learned went went to take care of the wounded soldiers there, and that they had been taken by the enemy, and were now prisoners in Julio Gallo, where they were treated like rats in a trap. We feel the loss, are all out broken hearted and would be happy indeed if they came back. Won't you men go to them, gather out and save them!" At this moment the soldiers set up a universal shout, and a moment the little girls were in the midst of a cheering throng of soldiers while Evans himself said:

"You need not fear for them Violet. They will be rescued and brought back the day Julio Gallo falls. And it will not be long. I'm sure." "Oh won't it be wonderful day!" Said Violet clasping her hands.

THE ADVANCE. GENERAL VIVIAN'S WHIRLING GAP CAMPAIGN

It was on the 21st of December, when the christian advance was well under way and it was the swiftest advance that general Vivian ever made during the war, the double timing the troops every three or four hours. The artillery forces had went on ahead, the cavalry being in the rear, but the whole army was the same quickness in the movement and indeed it resembled a swift orderly rout rather than a march. General Vivian's army was the first to start the advance, Hanson and Zimmermann and Hanson's going on in another course to head off the main forces of the enemy under Francis Schmitt, and it was Hanson who came in sight of the two of Brigano first and found himself confronted by Germanian men in whole landelinian army maneuvering to force him back, but Hanson side stepped him, struck a blow at Angelina Turner, and moving around another course placed Hanley and Germanina between Julio Gallo and general Vivian. General Germanian who had moved upon Brigano to bar general Vivian's advance had been taken by surprise by the armies of Hanson and Zimmermann and so demonstrated against both simultaneously. Hanson in fact was outnumbered two to one just now as his main forces were slow in coming up, and just now being separated from Zimmermann's and Hanson's armies decided not to engage his nephews in a general battle until one of those armies came up.

As he found out general Vivian coming on Brigano had a an army large enough to overwhelm him, general Hanley ordered Germanina to retreat warning him of the danger he was facing, and advised a retreat, but general Germanina having the advantage in artillery was bound to go right his way out of the trap he had fallen into and which was closed around him and so had ordered a severe demonstration upon Hanson immediately.

But the counter demonstration and maneuvers of Hanson's forces had been so skillfully planned and carried out, that the city of Brigano was in the hands of the christians five minutes after the terrific attack began. Rearing upon the side that faced one of the fortresses where numbers had laid in concealment, they had surprised and driven into the first landelinian divisions that had opposed them, and driven them in flight toward Madge Wene now, toward which general Sampson's main army withdrew with as many landelinians as could get away from that crushing advancing tidal wave in purple. Council hall crack was successfully crossed by the christian troops, and also with the fortresses, the christians had the main section of the enemy central works in their possession. The main strength of the Zimmermannian armies being concentrated toward the left double line of march was the chief religious and principal objective of the christians. The change of fortune however was so swift that general Zimmermann in command of the landelinians there could hardly grasp the significance of what was happening. His left wing within two hours had been crushed to fragments, the surviving divisions being rolled up in the greatest confusion, as could ever imagine, and his right and center having been threatened with annihilation also withdrew, the tidal wave of christians pressing on their firing making them appear as a line of advancing fire on some wide plain. The christians were now coming forward like a frenzied mob, the confusion and confusion indescribable, and just then there was a rending straining sound, a screech of splintering wood, a mighty roar that set the whole battle field echoing, shouts, on the, screaming guns, a small explosion and the ground itself shook from the concussion. This noise was the general crash of landelinian artillery and as it grew more intense a large force of landelinian artillery appeared, headed by a general.

They struggled about in vain to recover the captured position, men and horses going down in thousands, and confused intermingled and tangled heaps the mobs of landelinians presenting a twining bristling tumult of bayonets forcing the christians cawing backwards.

"Follow me! On to Julio Gallo! Capture the works! Follow me!" Screamed the general again and again until a shell laid him low. General Sampson had already cut down the bridge or blew them up, intending to secure himself against a general attack until the main force of landelinians could come to his aid. All the while another general on the christian side amid that roaring smoky inferno was following with blinding triumph and ferocity.

"Follow me! Seize the landelinian works! On to Julio Gallo! On to Norma! Down with the Free Man Machine! The Free Thinkers! On to Julio Gallo!"

The mob of landelinians in front finally broke and dissolved before the irresistible christian advance. One bridge across the Rainy a Run River went down loaded with dead and dying and living, as a high explosive hit it and wrenched it from its piers. The whole line of landelinian artillery was now brought up to meet the charge of the christians.

Fire seemed to rush from the christian works, there was wild cheers from the landelinians and the christian line crumpled into a bloody windrow of dead and dying, the next life came on, and the next, and the next, while the landelinians worked at their guns madly, amid a storm of shot and shell flying among their own pieces from the return fire of the distant batteries the roar of cannons being maddening.

In their white and reddish glare of death and destruction the christian lines withered like grass in a prairie fire, but through it and over the bodies of their slain comrades the oncoming surges of purple coats moved steadily. All this while the landelinian fire kept up a horrible intonation of a uproar horrible unbelievable noise, as if all the thunder storms hurricanes and typhoons that had ever been since primal chaos had been gathered into one mighty storm breaking upon the scene. The din was terrific and amid the dreadful slaughter fourteen christian general commanders and his ding went down, having tried to reform their cut up and shattered commands. The fury of the battle was now something terrible to relate. The landelinians however being overwhelmed by the christian moral assaults had now given way at this section of the line, but the landelinian chief generals had been massing immense bodies of troops to the aid of the others and soon the christians were facing a curtain of fire from the landelinian musketry also. Having thus gained so far however the Angelinians were not going to allow themselves to be beaten now, and they only redoubled their exertions, attacking as hard as they could, and as luck would have it the main line of landelinian batteries which opened fire all along the line was unable to support the main line of landelinian infantry which began to recoil the whole line of christians following closely. However the christians still had to face the main line of landelinian batteries which now opened a general fire all along the line and the christian front was rapidly going to pieces. Nevertheless the main line of landelinian work was already of the in possession of the christian troops, and as many batteries along this section had also had been captured the landelinian front had been badly weakened which enabled the Angelinians to immediately capture the main line of batteries, trained upon them.

Unsupported by their main guns the whole landelinian line finally gave way at a eve eleven thirty in the morning near noon the christians occupying all the works and batteries, and also the tabular line line of communication fortifications or fortified stockades which the abandoned hastily abandoned in their retreat. In the meantime while the battle of Brigano was raging so furiously, both the Alandelinians and the child slaves had leaped of the advance of the main christian armies under general Vivian. Zimmerman and Hanson sent Julio Gallio and the different fee line between the two armies. The child slaves hailed it as the sign of their coming deliverance, for they knew from all the news heard that these armies hailed Vivianians were the fiercest fighters and that nothing could out do Zimmerman and the main christian commander Hanson Vivian. As for the Alandelinians it was unpleasant news, and though many of the Alandelinian generals were alarmed they nevertheless hoped that Johnston Manley would win the race against the christian army. Julio Gallio first. If Manley did so they knew that general Vivian drive would be completely unsuccessful, and that the poor children whom they hated would be utterly die disappointed in their hopes of deliverance. In fact Manley did get there first. But held a convention over it with Vivianians that I'm sure he won't wish to hold again. Just ask Francis Atlanta and she will tell you. Though he had such luck in getting there first it was with horrible losses, and a terrible rout, and he never got a chance to go to the aid of the Alandelinians. Indeed there God was angry he beyond description over the news. In Julio Gallio, was horrified even, broken hearted and disgusted, and now was about to hurl his terrible vengeance on the child soldiers. Indeed Zimmerman any failing to be stopped on account of Hanson's successful attack on the enemy at Brigano had been able to continue his advance. He left the and Hanson were fifteen miles from Julio Gallio and moving swiftly toward Norman Bridges.

Manley himself had been delayed several times on account of the slowness of the army under Shoemannia, Bicknell, Adala De Garbe, Accountants, and Joseph Joseph, probably on purpose or failure to advance swift enough on account of the advancing desolation wrought by the christian armies in their campaign. Both Raymond Richardson Federal and the Manleys were terribly angry.

Manley declared that if it had not been for the slowness of these generals he would surely have reached Julio Gallio far ahead of the christian armies before colliding with his greatest enemy Vivianians. He declared that they purposely delayed because they abhorred the cruelty to children, that they disobeyed his commands, and ought to be put to death or discharged in disgrace. But he knew that if he lost even one of these generals of whom had clever heads, he would surely be overcome by his christian enemies. Federal himself had been delayed by a terrible hurricane of inconceivable violence followed by a blinding blizzard of three days duration, then by forest fire, and wreckage strewn trees caused by christian engineers. He appealed to Manley for aid under these circumstances but Manley could not even get into communication with him and both he and Federal had leaped out of the frying pan into the fire. Federal himself was in dire peril for Zimmerman's army was moving like a cyclone of human beings upon his beleaguered army, and not knowing the strength of his desperate enemy he was alarmed and anxious. In vain he retreated, wreckage strewn plains, snowdrifts eleven to thirty feet high.

and desolation of every description barred his way. So anxious and alarmed was he that he almost wept though no one ever knew of him too weep before.

So fast was Zimmerman's pressing upon him that Federal saw nothing but to do but to make a stand of the greatest desperation and this he prepared to do. He first committed to the destruction of 4 bridges and small towns then barricaded all the roadways and fields with wreckage of trees piled snow all along the right of way of the Evangelical line. St. Clare road to the height of thirty feet, wrecked all passenger and freight cars on the tracks the fell back toward Zanagustopolis where the work of building trenches and breastworks of snow and dirt commenced. So quick was the christians advancing despite the barricades, that Federal had to lower the snow walls along the railroad to make fortified works out of them and all the heavy guns that could be brought up were placed at these barricades. Another furious blizzard more furious than the first delayed his working armies and so only when the christians on all the faster instead of delaying them and Federal made up his mind that he would generally attack first usually wins.

WE THE BATTLE OF ZANAGUSTOPIUS.....

So the day for the attack was planned. Federal saw all this while but if he did not do something soon Zimmerman would close in upon him and either capture or destroy his army.

So the attack was planned and was to be executed on Christmas day but the christian forces had not time to get quite at some point before four o'clock on the morning of December 25. 24th after a night of intense quiet at some point the dreaded abysses of war starting desolation a storm of untold horror broke loose at once. The Alandelinian columns under Gann Cannonia making a sudden and desecrate assault on Zimmerman's left wing. The whole series of divisions of the Alandelinians had took on the column shape, a veritable surge of men in gray moving unexpectedly toward the left wing, and within an hour there existed a frightful volcano of flame and din for perhaps thirty miles. So terrible was the uproar that it was not only heard at Julio Gallio but broke place in the windows of hundreds of thousands of houses from the concussion and Julio Gallio was over one hundred miles from this raging battle. However this surge of men had become what is called drunk with frenzy and rage, and the opposing surges of Alandelinians which had been apparently subdued after the battle of Gironia Francis was to try to accomplish its revenge, yes revenge, and as a mighty surge of gravitate upon them, a part of the christian left wing was to place before the crushing crush of men in gray on a front and flank and then collapsing the piles of dead and wounded, the surviving columns being forced back and scattered and driven into confusion by the irresistible pressure of the furious Alandelinian onslaught.

Across the christian networks, and over the shell battered plains the Alandelinian surges accumulating an intense force in the roar of battle, though incurring the full force of the fire of the christian batteries hurled themselves fiercely but unsuccessfully on the other portions of the wings still holding firm but the christian fire swept the them with the almost preternatural hoses of cannon.... and destruction.

Many strong front lines, some pitifully vanquished christian front had alone successfully bore the brutal impact of the unimpeded onslaught now developed, hurling the enemy back with their arms crushed and torn to pieces, while the rest of the christian columns were retreating in confusion. About three hours had elapsed on the morning of the 24th, when the main great Alandelinian surge, amid battles extreme horror and desecration, after having made its appearance was now in a horrifying condition, broken columns here and there falling back, while whole lines had been the whole Alandelinian force was jeopardized, and the christian guns laying waste to whole forests, had taken such heavy toll of lives, and causing such wide spread destruction that not only the surviving Alandelinian soldiers, but all their officers were stricken with horror.

Fatal news of the threatening disaster and the approach of overwhelming slaughter, which left in every morning and misery in its wake, was sent out to Federal by Gannonia, by signal stations communicating with Federal's main forces. It was a terrible situation for the Alandelinian army, the arriving christian reinforcements having overwhelmed and crushed Federal's main right wing just when on the point of success, and the wildest rumors concerning the fate of the declining Alandelinian columns now counter attacked, was that thousands of Alandelinian divisions was smashed, mangled, or shattered to pieces like forest forests in a typhoon typhoon, and monstrous heaps of mangled and bleeding forms in gray was yet more horrible, and scores of partially shattered Alandelinian columns were streaming to the rear in the greatest confusion, and that nothing but ruin and desolation was left to tell the horrors of the christian fire.

The two armies under Aronburg and Phelan Federal had now advanced to the aid of the panic stricken Alandelinian columns but prostrated by losses could not hold against the crushing pressure of the christian onslaught, and while the whole vast scene became an inferno of death and destruction, Phelan and Aronburg Federal fell severely wounded, their shattered armies were thrown into confusion and began streaming to the rear. Even general Vivian and Hanson at Brigano more than a hundred miles away heard the battle plainly and had at first believed it a counter assault upon their own lines. The counter charge of Zimmerman's whole line had swept everything before it, crushing the Alandelinian center, and rolling up the the left putting out hundreds of thousands of lives, tearing the biggest Alandelinian forces to pieces and carrying all before them, destroying and mangle the still remaining Alandelinian columns to the extent of twenty miles in length.

Hundreds of thousands of Alandelinians were taken prisoners, danger from shell explosions and explosions threatened the Alandelinian officers on every hand, and scores of them trying to rally their panic stricken armies. Picture these horrors, of this mighty christian counter onslaught as it overwhelmed Gannonia's largest forces engaged in actual conflict. Everywhere for miles what had been before a solid and strong Alandelinian front was now storm and tattered line. Not one division here and there, but whole sections of divisions had been engulfed by the racing avalanche of christian soldiery, which carrying all before them was crashing against the line still holding and throwing these glandelinians into a confusion. On the horrors. The voices of hundreds of thousands of men being blown into the air by gigantic explosions, and divisions of rallying glandelinians soldiers struggling fiercely to keep back the advancing christian hordes, amid the artillerylike roar of their musketry, and what was that..... Shocks of scores of thousands of crashing explosions from christian shells that threatened threatened destruction to all regiments, brigades, and divisions or companies that they fell amongst all that did survive not buried amid tons of debris.

Glimpses of untold horrors could be seen from those frenzied general officers whose whitened faces staked in dismay and agony through the fragmentary patches of their panic stricken divisions. Thousands of glandelinian soldiers were blown to pieces or dismembered by shell fire. Poor torn tabernacles of human beings torn from limb to limb by the force of the ear-splitting explosions. The destructive glandelinian fire now extended over four miles along the whole line of trenches still held, and apart of the front line of assault melted into confusion.

Fragments, fragments, hundreds of thousands of all ranks were seen running and fleeing but despite the terrible drum-drum fire the other parts of the christian line advanced successfully amidst the roar of glandelinian batteries and christian batteries now swelling to the clamor and though indescribable numbers were killed or injured the christians went on driving the glandelinians back at all points. Indeed Julio Gallio was the center of the worst battle and whose report had stunned the whole world as much as the battle of France-Artana and Aronburg gun or Glorini anana did. Great Greater rumors of almost unbelievable disasters trickling in among Federal main armies and yet in the engagement, and as the christian forces poured over the captured works, scores of millions of glandelinians had been concentrating at the right of way of the Evangeline St. Alars and the cannons from the snowdrifts there mowed down hundreds of thousands of the christians, but now the whole battle storm had laid upon these glandelinians with stupendous violence and turned the whole line of action into a mad-hell of carnage, the christians not being again so fully all along the line. Had general Federal at the beginning of the battle been aware of the strength of Zimmerman's army and of their flash back like a storm he would have continued his retreat, before his force were enveloped by the christian surge. He realized that he was in a trap for one that he had not been aware of, and now saw that to escape the trap which he had fallen into he would have to fight like a cornered lion and this could.

He was gradually concentrating heavy forces at the work along the railroad tracks and even now no one could have any idea of the almost preternatural fury, with which the christian storm of attack struck the front and a part of the flank the main of the new glandelinian flank and force simultaneously. Amid the deafening and appalling roar of millions of glandelinian musketry, and thousands of cannon discharges the christians poured in and among the glandelinians, the tremendous and universal clamor of the storm of the christian return fire as the glandelinians here began to give way was indescribably severe and violent, and not was the screaming and howlings of the barbarians could compare to the glandelinian yell of rage, and derision, as the survivors witnessed the shattering of their receding lines. Simultaneously deafening and indescribably appalling was the savage roaring of the glandelinian musketry, as they increased their firing, the shrieks and howls of the fallen christians, the million cannon like roar of the firing all along the line, rattlings of clubbed muskets, and ring of bayonet against bayonet, that filled the air, and despite all this appalling tumult all could be heard the shrill serpent like hissing of bullets and then as the whole glandelinian front again receded, the whole scene became almost obscured in smoke of musketry and shell explosions. For nearly three hours this awful tumult of firing continued and now the whole new glandelinian front being broken and crushed to fragments receded in a final withdraw, after a burst of heroic thunder of thousands of discharged cannons, which almost deafened and blinded whole multitudes of christians, drove many thousands insane from the din, and almost threw the whole charging column off their feet from the concussion. Every christian column exposed to his sudden general fire was torn to pieces and by the shell fire not a tree in this region was left standing. However the loss of life among the Glandelinians was more appalling, than among the christians, and more frightful was the loss of injured and dying or buried amid the wreck wreckage strewn forests and deep snow.

The right grand division of the glandelinian center was struck about the same time, and just as the christians swept forward they how their own went down before that blast of glandelinian artillery, and horribly mangled christian columns, with their hundreds of thousands of dead and dying, lying among the snow, stood appalled for a moment, the long lines of the enemy's rifle blast giving forth millions of undulating flames through the dense clouds of smoke and the noise of the sudden discharge of the glandelinian artillery as it sent racing destruction through columns after columns sounded as if the whole world was coming to an end, the uproar being ear-splitting. Whole divisions of christians were made to be scattered to the four winds by the glandelinian shell fire, thousands being buried under the wreckage of fallen trees, but the few surviving surge in purple had come on and struck the glandelinians here a terrible blow galling the enemy's line with the shattering fire of their own artillery which was supporting their charge, and frightful was the toll of human and material life. The whole of Federal's line under the personal command of Cannonia and Cannonia were struck with full force, their wings were either routed or rolled up in the most indescribable confusion, and heart rending misery was left among the many wounded. At this moment general Hedda signal station twenty miles west of Zanapustopolis sent out the warning to Federal of the threatening disaster to his army, and then from other glandelinian signal stations which had only got the fringe of the roaring battle storm reported that general Sherlock and Watsonia were killed and their forces streaming to the rear. Hedda had also witnessed the main assault of the christian forces, but fortunately for him there was not such a heavy toll of lives here, and his lines in gray had still held firm against thirteen fierce onslaughts, the trees in this vicinity having been totally destroyed by the terrific rain of shell and shrapnell fire.

General Zimmerman, Francis and Winstonia who had witnessed the havoc among the battle with glandelinians had sent many sad harrowing tales to arouse the action and ardor of Federal. From the signal station of Mc-Holleston's army which were also in confusion some reports as follows;

"Your excellency general Federal;

A battle storm of the most disastrous effects has swept upon your lines in full force and never before in the history of battles or wars, is there such a warfare of manhood which progressed forth in his location. Millions upon millions of the glandelinians are in the worse confusion ever seen in an actual battle, including the whole main line of our left and right has already been crushed to fragments and are retiring in panic across the Eminie run. Hundreds of the highest glandelinian columns being shattered at the very first onslaught of the christians which last fully five hours already are in confusion, streaming to the rear. The fury of the christian onslaught had torn asunder the whole right wing of general Cannonia's army, his divisions have been scattered and it is up to you to hurry forward all the remaining forces you got to, stop the confusion and rally them before it is too late.

HANDON M. HOLLESTER....

This indeed was only one of the reports. Everywhere in the path of the advancing christians the glandelinians were retreating in terrific panic and confusion, and this indeed gave an idea what the christians in their sudden rage over the horrors in Julio Gallio can do when many are or were fathers of the children in Julio Gallio. Another report sent simultaneously ran as follows;

Your Excellency general Raymond Richardson Federal,
 In the midst of a storm of battle;

Two main divisions of our forces under Cannonia, Cannonia, Phelan and Aronburg Federal, has been almost annihilated, and the mighty surge of Angelinians are tearing across the Eminie run and shell swept plains with the fury and noise of a million demons and avalanches of hell. The Angelinian columns are moving their way through all the glandelinian front leaving nothing but ruin and death and all will be over if rescue does not come. The situation is exceedingly terrible, and the death list is 1,225,000 in the armies of Aronburg Federal and 1,165,000 in Phelan and Federal divisions and please hurry your main forces forward.

General Mc-Holleston Loganna.

These reports however were not as correct as they ought to have been, a three hundred thousand more had perished in Aronburg command, six hundred thousand more in Federal Phalans, and four million in Gannonia. Of the number of injured it could not be estimated. Even the Federal received another report;

YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL FEDERAL.

I never saw such a terrible sight during a battle before. The whole of our line is transformed into a vast scene of death and instant destruction. The christian onslaught has terrific force and lasted fully five hours. The battle is still raging with unknown fury, and the christian onslaughts are so terrible that the Angalinians are sweeping all before them. Whole forests by the fire of our batteries in a vain effort to stop their wild onslaught is devastated. Thousands of my men have been killed every minute and it is awful to see the mangled bodies of the officers. Our Glandelinian forces need succor straight and right away and if it does not come pretty soon the whole battle will be lost.

GENERAL ADAMS.

It was indeed a frightful scene of battle that Federal witnessed when he rode up close up to his main lines. His columns numbered by acres had been literally torn to pieces by the ravaging christian fire, and all the fragments of his columns were being swept away by the force and pressure of the christian onslaught. The christian line was seemingly scattered and crushed into flying fragments and the loss in killed and wounded could not yet be correctly estimated. One of the reports which came from General Hedda as he was surveying the scenes is as follows;

YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL FEDERAL.

Millions of your soldiers are in confusion and all the panic stricken survivors are in danger of destruction from the explosions hurled by the enemy batteries supporting their tremendous onslaught. All the fields are crammed with panic stricken Glandelinian refugees, fleeing before the christian advance and though the christian are falling as thick as a cloud hurled against the christian lines assaulting us they are not checked in the least and supported by their own battery fire are pressing on steadily. General Bernard Aronburg is wounded and so is his aid Phalan Federal. If you only could picture the horrors of the mighty christian surge which has overwhelmed our largest armies ever mustered against a general christian onslaught you would send aid. The horrors of the confusion and carnage are indescribable and did not come as quick as possible.

GOVERNOR GENERAL HEDDA.

This is surprising to depict the intense roar of battle. Everything was in a pandemonium of carnage, confusion, and death. Just five hours ago had the strong massive Glandelinian columns. Whole sections of the enemy columns leagues long had now come up to stem the tide of disaster but they also were driven into confusion, at the very first shock of the christian onslaught and now none of the Glandelinian officers could stem the tide of disaster and only fell one by one for their attempts. Oh the horrors of it! Almost as bad as hell itself. Another general sent this note;

YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL FEDERAL.

I saw the most massive Glandelinian columns streaming across the fields in the greatest confusion and disorder ever witnessed and many of the officers amid the seething storm of destruction and carnage fell killed or wounded. I never saw a sight more serious.

Indeed the Glandelinians not driven into confusion as yet were struggling frantically to keep back the desperate frenzied battle-maddened Angalinian assaults. The artillery like roar of the crashing musketry, sounding a thousand times louder than the worse roaring of musketry and cannon at Demonodon which seemed to rend the heavens. How the Glandelinian hordes did shriek with rage and fury as they gave way before the shock and the overwhelming surges of the Angalinians then these Glandelinians fled in a rout. Whirling plumes of untold horror could be seen in the whitened faces of many of the fleeing fugitives who stared in terror and agony through the thick curtain of powder smoke only to disappear in a roaring rending storm of explosions. Another eye witness also gave this report;

1172

The most horrible sight I have ever seen was of the human currents seemingly borne and dashed about before the advance of the Angalinians that the panic stricken Glandelinian soldiers had to throw away everything as that they could run better. Many of the officers have been torn from limb to limb by great shell explosions. I also witnessed all the horrors of the rout. Thousands of the Glandelinian soldiers and even the officers dashed hither and thither among the panic stricken mobs trying to rally them but were horribly mangled by shell explosions, hundreds of others having their very insides being battered the ground and so many others so badly cut and brushed bruised and cut and crushed that they could not be recognized. The christian onslaught had indeed swept upon the whole of our main line with the most terrific fury advancing as fast as men could run and facing all the while the fire of our heaviest artillery. Appalling numbers of dead and injured of our side are exposed to view.

THE MAIN GENERAL COMMANDING THE GLANDELINIAN CENTER DECLARED THIS;

YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL RAYMOND RICHARDSON FEDERAL;

The whole of your line has been probably in the worse grasp of a rout that surpasses any other, or that has ever occurred during a battle. When you probably will discover this disaster you will be stunned. Every Glandelinian division crushed to fragments in retreating in general rout and hundreds upon hundreds of all my officers of all ranks have been killed or wounded. Indescribable damage has been done by our shells by both the landscapes and christian columns by the explosions of shells having been so strong that thousands of the largest Angalinian regiments have been wiped out, divisions have been shattered, tangled masses of dead and wounded are lying everywhere and my whole line is shattered to fragments.

His report was not exaggerated either, and having been so successful the Angalinians had swept on in grand array toward the Glandelinian batteries. Just as the van of Federal reinforcements arrived. In the meantime while the advancing christians were working this horrible havoc upon the retreating Glandelinian columns the advancing surges in purple from its frightful losses had lost some of its length, but not its force and fury. The first reinforcing Glandelinian divisions of the rest of Federal army facing the oncoming force in purple was the first struck by the great Angalinian surge and so furious became the battle that it seemed as if the region had fallen into the bowels of the earth amid a thrillion titanic volcanic eruptions. Cities hundreds of miles away shaken by the concussion of the battle suffered millions of dollars damage in shattered windows alone.

The whole of the christian columns charging upon Wickey Lannins armies was torn to pieces by the furious blast of musketry and thousands of cannon and whole multitudes by the score hurled into internity, this fragmentary christian column retiring in confusion before this annihilating blast of hellish destruction. But two other purple surges of men were piling far beyond Wickey Lannins brigades broke upon his flank, hitting Nelkingburg simultaneously and though they were with the same determination managed to throw these opposing waves of Glandelinians into great confusion. But nevertheless though at this point the christian advance was checked the firing of both sides becoming so furious that the smoke was unusually thick. While this was going on Federal was forming the rest of his lines for attack, and for a time most of his officers did not have any idea what was coming next. That the noise of the battle far to their right sounded like the approach of the end of the world. In the afternoon of December 24th the world was beautiful and with a serene sky and a fine cold wintry breeze. Moving from the northwest. The previous hours of battle in the distance had been easily heard by Federal, and now the sun had begun to grow dim under the monochrome white mists of gray clouds appeared streaming to the rear in confusion, and when the panic-stricken columns came nearer a purple surge in multitudes of frenzy-stricken soldiers appeared in their rear, and it was as if the whole world from the landolinians with great rapidity, and when it came near a hundred million demons seemed to be let loose in the distance from the one oncoming purple surges of of christians. It took a long while before the panic-stricken hordes were considerably rallied and sent to the rear, and then the firing along Federal's lines began first, being a dull booming clattering roar of wholesale lines of musketry, which increased kept on steadily and which seemed to keep time like the furious roar of the heaviest waves against the rocky shore and then increased gradually but quickly mingling with the roar from the discharge of cannons of the heaviest calibre. Then such a wild destruction and carnage as followed could never be correctly told. Before the violent blast of the landolinian fire all along their front lines of christians, hundreds of thousands strong were practically annihilated, whole divisions were torn to pieces and the best and strongest main wings of the assaulting columns almost destroyed by the storm of shell and d canister shot.

ASERTHING CALDRON OF HELL AND DAMNATION!

You would not believe this horrible tale, but who could ever imagine it. The An Angelinians had come on like mad rushing oceans of demondrushing with the most insupportable fury and savagery upon the landolinian front only to go back again and again shattered to fragments.....in that pitiless storm of fire. Zimmermann saw that Federal had thrown forward his main divisions, that the christian columns were receding under heavy fire of the greatest intensity, and commanding all his main batteries he cannonaded Federal's lines fearfully, and in the meanwhile rushed large forces forward to the rescue of those falling back. Federal realized that he was outnumbered ten to one and was determined to hold Zimmermann's army at bay until he could withdraw safely out of the trap he had fallen into. So seeing that his armies were cutting down the christians annihilating and driving them into confusion also, he ordered a general counter charge, and with a yell like millions of demons the whole landolinian surge extending for over forty miles made a sudden move, a movement of the greatest alacrity, threw the whole christian line into confusion and sent them flying into a total rout.

Zimmermann saw this rout, saw Federal's terrific human waves rushing forward and immediately issued an order to his officers. Within a few minutes the whole line of christian works were aflame, the landolinian surge long as it was melted to fragments, and there was a terrific rattling roar of explosion everywhere that seemed to split the earth. The surviving waves in gray nevertheless reached the christian works and made the most desperate attempts to cross them. One wave after another melted away, and still on came the others only to dissolve before the terrific christian fire. The line which had been over forty miles long was now completely torn up, there being only large patches of men here and there. Then while the surviving landolinians were in confusion over this terrific slaughter the whole christian line swept forward rolled up the whole of Federal's line and sent his men flying. It had indeed been a terrific slaughter. Think of a line of men ten deep forty miles long and ten million strong torn into huge gaps and their columns shredded to fragments. What an awful cost! Federal paid for his foolish attack on a force ten times his size.

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS ARE IN PERIL FROM THE GLANDOLINIANS

In the meantime while the battle of Brigano was in full swing and Sana guetopoliou also both raging the same time but at different locations, Violet and her sisters hearing the sound of heavy firing went off with several soldiers including Evans to learn what it was about from curiosity. Violet and her sisters felt full of spirits, that snowy morning and the cold icy but balmy weather put a rosy color on their cheeks and made them feel fresh and happy. They went on slowly not talking to one another this time, not even to Evans for they were used to doing the utmost caution and several times Violet's face flashed when she saw the curly head of some young girl darting out of a clump of bushes, and believing it funny that one would be out bareheaded in such cold weather, and out alone, she decided to find out if it was only her fancy, and immediately made for the bush, followed by the others. Suddenly what seemed to be the head of a little girl proved to be the head of a Gorgolian Kurde for at once they were surrounded by all circles of fierce landolinian soldiers who demanded them to surrender. At first Violet and her sisters were thunderstruck at the suddenness at which the landolinians had appeared. It had been an ambush into which they had run, and seeing the long bayonets pointed at them the little girls were at first demoralized for these were the barbarous Gorgolian Kurdes which had surrounded them the fiercest landolinians ever known if they were not half Gergolian from the shape of their eyes.

1-173

But realizing that if they allowed themselves to be taken by these landolinians they would surely be executed, as they knew those fellows would take or sent them to Julio Gallo and put into the prisons with the other children to be murdered because they were pretty, Violet and her sisters determined not to surrender despite the fierceness of the situation, and so suddenly wheeling their horses they dashed off fairly at the savages in black uniforms of ragged men knocking several down while Jack Evans and the two soldiers with them slashed with their sabres at the landolinians with their sabres. In the mass in the two christian soldiers were mortally wounded, but in the confusion created Evans and the little girl managed to get away and dashed at breakneck speed down the snow-crooked road. It took several moments before the landolinians recovered from the panic and drawing their horses out from the bushes they leaped them and dashed on after the fugitives at a tearing speed firing wildly and incessantly in their hopes of shooting down every one of the fugitives.

THE DESPERATE MEANS OF ESCAPE FOR THE FUGITIVES.....

Evans heard the wild clatter of horses hoofs and saw to his amazement that the landolinians were gaining at every yard and there was danger of their being overtaken at every moment. Evans had only one cartridge in his gun and the little girl had not brought hers with them and so there was no means of stopping the wild mad warlike race in black. The Gorgolian Kurdes were blinded by rage over the way the fugitives had outwitted them so cleverly and had intended to overtake them at every cost or shoot them down as they were, and if capturing them alive to put them with their guardian Jack Evans in the worse prison in Julio Gallo. Not far away was a steep depression in the ground about one hundred and fifty feet deep from the bottom of which there grew tall pine trees. To Violet and her sisters this seemed to be their only means of escape. It was a hazardous deed to do, and the slightest mishap would cause them to fall to their deaths far below. But the sense of their desperate peril in the hands of their wild pursuers drove them on, and reaching the brink they quickly dismounted, Evans preparing to use his only cartridge and bring down the leader of the landolinians, which causing confusion would give them some delay.

The landolinians were coming on at a thunderous gallop yelling with derision and quickly Evans aimed his gun at the officer who appeared to be a captain and fired. The bullets struck the horse in the eye and the animal staggered and fell throwing his rider headlong. This caused considerable confusion the other landolinians being compelled to halt. Quickly Violet and her sisters made a spring one by one over the abyss grasping the tops of the trees which swayed threateningly. It was one of the most daring feats the landolinians or Evans had ever seen before and they yelled and hoisted with rage and disappointment, while Evans gasped and held back his breath, as he decided the abrupt decline not daring to do what Violet and her sisters had accomplished.

"Shoot them from the trees." Violet yelled the captain. "They must not even a escape."
But Violet and her sisters had climbed down as fast as they could and as were out of range of the glandelinians who waited their bullets needlessly. Evans had now been compelled to spring for another tree, and he was down as fast as the little girls, and reaching the foot they dashed off toward a rise in the distance. The desperate glandelinians had now separated such a column into dividing and going in an opposite direction to cut off the fugitives. One of the glandelinian soldiers happened to be riding a racer and he outdistanced his comrades coming upon the fugitives just as Evans reached a railroad crossing. At first it seemed as if their situation was desperate, but Evans seeing the glandelinian dismount, with his gun drawn, leaped at him, and grappled with him like a ferocious beast. The glandelinian was immediately thrown and as both combatants rolled over and over pummeling each other Evans managed to shout:

"Get on that horse four of you little girls." "I'll get this man and get off with your sisters."

Violet and three of her sisters got on the steed and away they raced while little Catherine tearing off a piece of her dress, suddenly drew these around the glandelinian wrists before he could get up, and tied them securely. Evans having plied the man's legs together and bound them up with a rope he happened to have with him. Angeline drew the soldier's gun, took his cartridge belt and lay out and waited for the glandelinian to be carried to a hiding place than as this was done they waited for the other glandelinian soldiers to appear. They did come on at a dashing speed. Immediately Angeline blazed away bringing down two of the glandelinians at two quick shots. A yell came from the others who recoiled in confusion. Angeline and Catherine and Hattie immediately jumping on the two fiery steeds, just emptied of their masters, and instead of racing away as the glandelinians expected they would, made a sudden dash right at them firing the pistols which they drew from the hostlers at the horses' sides.

With a yell of confusion the panic-stricken glandelinians wheeled their horses and dashed away.

"Now is the time to join our sisters, before the glandelinians recover from the panic," cried Angeline. And away they went Evans leaping on another horse abandoned by a wounded glandelinian. The glandelinians saw them dash off and recovering resumed the chase having been joined by another party coming down the road. Some of them separated, and dashed down the road the other three had gone with Violet, while the rest dashed after Evans and the two other little girls. In fact these kind of glandelinians though they knew who the little girls were did not know what to make of their bravery, and so were utterly flummoxed over the whole performance and finally gave up the chase knowing it was useless.

But this did not relieve the fugitives, for other glandelinians not knowing the children but taking it for granted that they were Christians nevertheless, had dashed upon them from another direction and though surrounding them, they had expected the little girls to be frightened, and cry out like children, and instead found them to be regular daredevils for they were out of the ring before the glandelinians could realize what had happened and that six of them were down and others unhorsed. These glandelinians pursuing them wildly had separated in many directions, coming upon Evans and the two little girls unexpectedly. Angeline and Catherine dashing through a glen bringing down three glandelinians apiece while Evans downed two with their horses. The others came on recklessly two managing to dash in front of the fugitives and meeting, making a half right wheel and dash toward them, but the little girls when they led their own steeds firing wildly they dashed off and four glandelinians with their horses sank to the ground in sprawling heaps.

"Why don't you return their fire you fools!" hissed the lieutenant savagely. "You are risking your very lives for their foolhardiness. You men do not know them little brats but I do."

"We can't hit them if we do fire," growled one of the men. "They have charmed lives. They're little human witches."

"Three of you go this way, and the rest will go down this road," said the first lieutenant, and away the glandelinians dashed racing so fast, that they came quickly upon Violet and the three others on the single horse, and the other pursuers and the fugitives simultaneously. There was a lively mixup for a few minutes, Evans, Catherine and Angeline firing blindly bringing down six glandelinians, the glandelinians having simultaneously returned the fire, and Evans Angeline, Catherine and the horse Violet and her three other sisters sank to the ground throwing all except Hattie and Daisy, but in the indescribable confusion confusion, Violet and her sisters jumped on the six horses, deprived of

of their former owners, drew the reins from the hostlers. The horses sidled, and dashed away knocking down two glandelinians who had dismounted in their way, causing the two horses to dash off into the woods though Hattie caught one as it fled and away the whole swarm of fugitives went firing again and again causing the most conglomerate confusion they had ever witnessed.

"Aw, shaw, what's the use? We can't catch them brats," growled a sergeant sullenly. "They ride horses like the wind."

"Who are those little girls anyway?" demanded a lieutenant nursing his wounded soldier, as he had been one of those dismounted in the conflict with the fugitives. "I never saw such desperate Christian children before. They are worse than fugitive soldiers armed to the teeth and little girls as they are, they fight like fiends. They are regular dare devils and though I hate them all the more for it I cannot deny that I admire them for their inconceivable bravery."

"Aw, they are those damned Vivian girls," cried another sergeant riding up. "You men are no new of course and never heard of the before. They are very dangerous when pursued. We might as well give up the chase, as nothing can be done with that desperate fighter Jack Evans, leading them."

"Nothing doing," said the first lieutenant. "They have got to be caught."

"But how are we going to catch them?" protested another lieutenant. "They will annihilate us if we attack them like that again."

"Get a couple of blood hounds, that will bring them at bay," said the first lieutenant. "There is a dog pound over yonder." The glandelinians immediately dashed on when to their surprise, they heard a confused confusion of sound, and thousands of dogs of all kinds were dashing this way and that. The little girls had known that their pursuers would try to get some bloodhounds to bring them down, and so in spite of the wild protest of the men in the pound, turned all the dogs loose. There had been a terrible confusion of barking, as the glandelinians came dashing up, but it was already too late, the full fugitives were too far off to well on the way again, and as the dogs confused their horses the glandelinians were disheartened and refused under any conditions to continue the pursuit. It was at this moment that General Francis Haddock came up with a hundred men, and he demanded that the lieutenant was all about.

"Where are those pesky Vivian girls, who seriously wounded ten of our men, and killed six horses?" said the lieutenant. "My men are discouraged and refuse to continue the pursuit without more help."

"Which way did they go?" demanded the general. "Down that road," said the lieutenant pointing. "They even wounded sergeant's Burns, McVernon, Sergeant Darger, sergeant Cecil Haveland, and Lieutenants Barmore, Reck, Graham, Evans, and killed our main leader Captain Reynolds."

"Thunders of thunders, but they must be caught," said the general.

"Who are those Vivian girls anyway? What are they like?"

"They are the daughters of general Vivian," said lieutenant Cromer. "They are of course an exceedingly pretty little girls, more beautiful than any Christian children than any I have ever seen before. I myself do not know much about them but one of my sergeants does. He says the little girls are very dangerous when pursued."

"Dangerous or not they must be caught," said the general, and he ordered fifty of the men to dash across the fields and down the roads, and gave the lieutenants instructions to follow the road they had seen the fugitives go, the general then dashing off in another direction, and the pursuit was on on general.

The glandelinians rode at breakneck speed and soon saw the fugitives far down the road. Evans and the little girls heard the shouts the thunders of horses' hoofs, and seeing the sudden peril they quickly dismounted, drove the horses into the dark woods and skinned up the tallest trees as fast as monkeys could climb. Just as soon as they reached that the gray coats appeared and the glandelinians seeing no signs of the fugitives halted.

"Well I'll be jiggered," said one of the officers. "Where did the little imps go to?"

"They certainly have disappeared, and there is no use of further pursuit," said the general. "We can report to Germania of this affair and he will have the whole country side scourged for them, and we had better get a move on for we are within the Christian lines now. And also I see a large party of Christians coming and if they see us we will be in a fight with un even odds."

Butting the action to their words the glandelinians rode off slowly the little girls and Evans watching them disappear around a bend in the roadway.

"I guess it is safe to go down now," said Violet. "The Christians younger are coming tonight will be here as we reach the ground."

"No, no," said Evans. "The Mamelukes are now far enough west and may go at us again if they see us. Wait until the Christians come up and then we will attack them."

The soldiers were now surrounded when they were almost there they started to descend. They reached the ground just as the Mamelukes in purple came upon at first the soldiers surprised and alarmed drew their pistols. But seeing that they were Evans and Violet and her sisters they put back their guns the leading Mameluke exclaiming:

"Well if it is not the darlings of the Nation. What were you in the high trees for. Admiring the view, or spying on the enemy?"

"We are admiring our escape from the most desperate Glands."

"We are persuading that ever chased me and the Syrian girls," said Evans and he told the whole story.

"You little girls had better be careful where you go after this," advised one of the Mameluke men. "Those Mamelukes are out looking for children every day when they can carry off to Julio Callo to place in the horrible pens, and they may have you there some day too if you little girls become too reckless."

"That is true," said Colonel Jack Evans. "That is a terrible place as I hear. There are horrors there that are beyond imagination. If these poor things ever went there, I would not give up hope for them as long as I could rescue them. Sent them there if they dare and bet any one they would be free again inside of a week."

Violet and her sisters however shuddered at this but said nothing and saluting the captain of the Mameluke force ordered the men to turn back and escort the Mameluke girls to the Christian lines.

"I have a little girl who is in one of those places of horrors," said the captain sadly. "She is crippled and very pretty."

"You don't say," declared Evans horrified.

"Yes, but nevertheless I even believe now that she is at rest with her best friend Jesus Christ. She was too young to stand the tortures long."

"How long has she been in the hands of the Mamelukes?" asked Evans with emotion of pity.

"Two years," said the captain. "She would be six years old now. Her name is Francis Schmidt. She was lying in St. Joseph's hospital at Julio Callo with a Terribular of the foot the doctor even having been forced to remove a Mameluke bone from her foot. She suffered something terrible and it was at this time that Julio Callo fell into the hands of the Mamelukes. As I heard they had raided every public house in Julio Callo and some of the fiercest Mameluke Curdes and Zimmermanns burst into the hospital, making all the Sisters of Charity prisoners, and beating the old Mamelukes with their fists because they could not walk fast enough to suit the Mamelukes. Every one of the hired hands fought desperately against the Mamelukes with broom brooms mops, and brush handles, and even used axes and threw buckets of scalding hot soapy water, but being without the ordinary military arms, they were no match for the brutal Mamelukes who quickly dispatched them. Even a saintly old man whose name was Thomas Phelan was arrested and several others also. The nurses were all shot down by the Mamelukes and all the men patients as well as the women patients who dared offer resistance were out or shot down. Patients who were in touch a condition to be removed from the beds were hacked to death. The Mamelukes smashed every article of furniture in the hospital and all children found unable to work, or too pretty to satisfy the murderers were hacked to pieces in their very beds and their entrails torn out. Francis had a she was with her tortured foot was hurled roughly out of the bed and thrown violently onto the floor. The Mamelukes were going to dispatch her when one of the hired hands working on the first floor having escaped the Mamelukes before, a friend of the child, shot the Mamelukes who threw her down dead and in the confusion secured the wee ping child and escaped. He was overtaken however in three hours the child taken from him and placed in the house of doom. I heard that he had been jailed and escaped again, but I heard nothing about the child. I do fear she is dead."

"Maybe we can find out something about her," said Violet. "If that good brave man escaped I'm sure he has secured her again and is in hiding with her somewhere."

"You are not going to go to Julio Callo to find out that is one thing at that," said Evans seriously. "I won't let you under any conditions. I do feel for this little girl, feel worse than I can describe but you little girls are more important and it is my duty to see to your safty. It is I who will go and find her. Inoog can do it and get away."

"But you are risking your life," protested Violet. "And I don't you to go and you shan't. If you insist there is nothing that can hold us from going either, neither my father or uncle of the whole army."

"Well don't any of you go either then," said Evans. "If you insist I will report a general Mameluke and have him watch you there no getting out of there if you once get in. It is like entering the mouth of Hell."

"ALL ABANDON HOPE. YE WHO ENTER HERE,"

"We never talked about going," said Violet. "You started the argument yourself." Evans you go too quick at our words. It would take the Angels alone to make us go there, and they would have to accompany us if we went. But don't you dare go. Or well too."

"But that little girl of mine!" "I then the nation started to say when Angellie cut him off short."

"Something will turn up without our running ourselves into committing suicide over it," she said realizing that Evans was right. "If one won't go as long as Evans don't go."

"Neither will I," said Jennie.

"Nor I," said John. "We went through enough horrors. I will not go." The other little girls were of the same opinion but insisted strongly that if Evans goes he is not their guardian any more but Evans showed his sternness right here by telling them plainly that there was no danger of his going on low as they stay by him, that he will do anything for them, declaring that he knew it was suicide and that under no circumstances would he go along as they drop the matter about it themselves.

"Oh Evans you are too hard, we know you will go," protested Violet pouting. "Surely we or you can have escape and a lot of good it would do. You talk like it anyway and that makes us suspicious."

"Now Violet for God's sakes be sensible," said Evans. "Why should I go. Even if I did go how can I get even into Julio Callo when the Christians there would stop me. They are under instructions from your father general Mameluke, arresting all who try to go through their lines to go into that city of Hell. It is more hard any way to pass general Heddes lines and Mc-Hollisters than the Mamelukes. Even although no matter what nationalities are being interned. So stop this useless argument for our sakes for there is no way to get to the child that I can see and so why should I commit suicide about it by going to Julio Callo. The Christians suspect all who try or do enter their lines to go to Julio Callo as enemies of the Christian cause, and as they do not know either me or you little girls we would be arrested or detained. So there is no entering Julio Callo by any means. So don't be so anxious for I swear and cross my heart that I'm not going."

"That is true too," said the captain. "They allow no one to go into Julio Callo. Christian spies are even forbidden under pain of abandonment. Many have been arrested, even children at the ages of ten to fifteen minute years of age and being detained were all found found to be alien enemies. The children were Mamelukes by birth and were searched closely and questioned, and it was found that they were child spies trying to give information to the army."

Violet did not say anything for a few minutes but then half crying she said:

"I think it is cruel. I can't see or understand why God himself allows such things in Julio Callo. Why papais so enraged over it that he almost swears as good as he is."

"Oh you don't say!" snapped Evans angrily and scornfully. "Why the Manleys whom you even pray for so incessantly are the fault of it all. General Vivian your father is going to follow Hanson's advice and if there is ever comes a sanguinary battle at Julio Callo I bet the horrors will be a thing of the past. Manley lost thirty six million in his first terrible battle though he was victorious the damn old skunk. For his lack of hearts and brains which I fear he is without and still lives like a bilge, the Christians would have given him a shameful beating if it had not been for his darn overwhelming numbers, a hundred to our one. Why most of the officers think your father is the most dangerous enemy Manley has got. I won't even pray for that damnable beast in human form though you little girls can, as the affair going on over there makes me feel that I could curse and blaspheme at him. He is a stinking stinking rat that ought to be strangled in a small trap and cut in slices and burned up in fire for his deeds the old King of Satan in human form."

"If it is too late," said the heroine bitterly. "Put I am afraid he will never succeed in this campaign though for the Hanleys are too strong, and increasing in strength all the time. It seems hopeless to capture Julio Gallo."

"But we must and shall," said Vivian. "We must not fail this time and you know we have the great fighters Zimmerman with us."

"Julio Gallo is now a city of great horrors," said the captain. "And a Calverinian city at that. Millions of helpless children are condemned to the most horrible torture because they are either pretty or else defectives. Children are crucified by thousands and tortured in every way imaginable. I have heard of children whose clothes were soaked in gasoline who were held over a fire and burned to death in that manner."

"Surely the Good God will do it some day," said Jennie. "Oh it is terrible," said Matt. "To think of those poor children in Julio Gallo suffering the tortures equal to those of the soulless inhumanity and nothing can be done. Oh God when will it end?"

"It will as soon as we can capture the city," said the captain. "We are driving hard enough to start anything now, and as long as general McHolster can continue the siege will be well. General Hanson is bound to capture the city, smash the Hanleys everytime he interferes, and so on. Oh we will make it hot for the Landelinians never fear."

They had now traveled quite a ways at a slow gallop when they saw general Howell, Master John Johnston coming with a party of officers. It was the first time that Violet and her sisters had ever come face to face with this great Abbeinnian general. He was a handsome but fierce looking man with a long horseshoe mustache, but a bearlike. It was also probably the first time that general Howell, Master Johnston had ever come face to face with the Vivian girls. He had heard much about them and of their darling deeds but not how they looked. He was a man practically speechless when approached by any child, and he could hardly find voice to speak when he met them so suddenly. He however issued some orders to the captain of the cavalry force and then continued on his way muttering to himself:

"These little girls are surprisingly pretty. Pretty to behold. If I could only assume the nerve to speak to them and my how they looked at me as I came up. I could almost have believed that they were celestial children reproaching me for impoliteness."

But to his dismay and embarrassment one of the little girls rode up to him and said:

"Your excellency I would like to speak to you for a few minutes. If I'm not delaying you."

How taken aback, and his heart seemed to leap into his throat as he said slowly:

"Yes, w-w-w-what is it?"

"I would like to ask you something about Julio Gallo. Is it really impossible for you to know?"

"Now one is allowed to pass through the Christian lines there," answered the great general taking courage to speak to them. "And those who ever do get into Julio Gallo never come out."

"No captain of this cavalry force has his only little girl in that horrible city," continued Violet. "I and my sisters and Evans could save her if there is any way we can do it without going near the city. From what the captain said, we believe the child is not with the enemy at all but with some friend who is hiding."

"I don't know anything about that," said the general. "And pray what is the little girl's name?"

"Her name is Francis William," said Violet. "And he has another called Francis Schmidt." "The captain is their father."

"Nothing can be done unless the city is taken," said the general. "You and your sisters even with Evans could never get there, for the Christians besieging it would not allow you to pass through their lines. They are awful struck of every stranger for fear they are spies."

CONCLUSION OF THE BATTLE OF BRIGANO, AND THE INJURY OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS. HOW EVANS FELT ABOUT IT.....

In the meantime general Germainia during a slight lull had reformed his forces, and receiving reinforcements also made a fierce concentration upon the Christian line which had captured their works and the battle was on again this time with redoubled violence. Germainia trusting to luck had thrown his left against the Christian right and though the frightful onslaught was not successful only resulted in fearful slaughter it seemed for a time that the Christian advance was checked, for the Christian columns could not progress any further and their own columns were dwindling to fragments very fast. A part of the Christian line was shattered by the frightful onslaught. General Co. Gallonia took command and resumed the onslaught with redoubled violence, and the terrible roar of the two battles, of Zanagustopolis and Brigano raging simultaneously at different portions of Calverinia shook Julio Gallo to its foundation and in fact as Brigano and Zanagustopolis and others were raging at the same time it indeed did cause damage in the city far away as it was. The Landelinian onslaught however was terrific, but it made no impression on the Christian line, and general Vivian seeing that Hanson was fiercely attacked and knowing what was going on advanced a good part of his army to the rescue and ordered it to follow at double time. He massed hundreds of big guns where the enemy was making the hardest and this terrific artillery being opened all at once tore the whole assaulting line to fragments, half obscured it in terrific explosions, and threw the remainder into confusion. However general Bernardson with some commanding the right wing of the Christian line and many of his staff were down and as the right of this wing was threatened with annihilation, they began to recoil despite the efforts of their commanders to stop them, that is the officers that survived. The enemy saw this receding fire, and encouraged by this lost their fear of the Christian artillery fire and accumulated all their force sweeping upon the whole line with the noise and fury of a great cyclone. General Vivian seeing that they rallied despite the havoc caused by the artillery, advanced heavy reinforcements to the aid of the right wing and learning that Hanson was wounded early in the fray, sent a notice to the rest of his force to hurry, and ordered Hanson's line to hold firm at all costs that reinforcements was coming, and now as more and more Christian troops continually arrived the conflict was increased with tenfold violence. The Christian fire preading along a line or front of ten to forty miles was annihilating and every wave of Landelinians five hundred thousand strong as they were melted into fragments as they surged forward their officers going down by the score.

The Landelinians were amazed by this murderous fire, which slaughtered their columns by the whole numbers, and again they were driven into terrific confusion. General Joseph Hoin who took Smithson's place decided to take advantage of the confusion among the columns of the enemy, and ordered his whole line to counter charge. With a yell of derision derision the Christian line swept forward in one long surge and the shock was terrific and inconceivable to a man's imagination.

The Landelinians delivering a general desolating fire which cut down the Christian columns like the tornado does the corn or tears a small town. General Joseph Heller went down mangled and bleeding and general Hendric was killed and his whole line went to pieces before that withering fire storm of the enemy. The shock however was greater for the enemy and they receded the Christians pushing on long lines of smoke before them. The Landelinians found themselves overpowered and they fought, fiercely, stubbornly as they receded, always keeping up their general fire which the Christians returned in as fierce manner. Germainia saw that his for onslaught were failing and that the Christians were advancing again, so he started massing his strongest batteries and filled the whole section of the battle torn field with a storm of terrific shell explosions. The noise now was unspeakably terrific, and ear-splitting, making a detonational roar as if God had filled the earth and heavens with the loudest thunders imagined in a perfect drum-drum salvoes and which was plainly heard at Julio Gallo.

In the meantime the assault on the Christian center was still greater and at this point all the Christian guns did as much to the enemy as the enemy did to the Christian line. Assaulting their left? The Landelinians had swarmed up close to the Christian works at the first of the onslaught, and had left three quarters of their number among the Christian guns after their first repulse. During the resumption of the onslaught, the left of the enemy's center had made a sweeping put together their extreme right and left, and made one terrific sweep which at first threw the Christian line into a pandemonium of panic and confusion. The Landelinians at this point had captured the works and guns turning them upon the Christians and cutting them down by the hundred thousand. The slaughter was horrible but general Vivian had happened to see this and made such a fierce concentration, that not only were the guns retaken, which done such appalling damage among the Christian line but the enemy's assaulting columns were crushed to flying fragments, ten of their main important generals were shot down and all their battle flags were shot to pieces. So terrific had been this terrific storm of fire on both sides that for a time a man of smoke almost obscured everything. Though the guns and tanks were recovered the enemy was not driven back and gathering together in another severe concentration they tried with the fury of desperation once more to retake what they had lost and the roar of battle was frightful. Suddenly reinforcements of German soldiers shattered the Christian lines and the Christian front again and again by making furious counterattacks themselves and the enemy recoiled leaving their fallen behind them. As nothing as yet occurred on the Christian main right general felt it unsafe to draw some troops from that wing and these he threw forward to reinforce the left which was retreating under the cannon fire of the enemy. The concentration of reinforcements seemed to work fine, general Germania however had seen his father weaken one of his main wings and decided to take advantage of the moment while the opportunity presented itself and make a tremendous onslaught, supported by a terrific drum-drum fire of his heavy artillery not knowing that general Vivian his father had done this only as a ruse and that he could support that apparently weakened wing with a whole army if necessary. And besides this the Christian right was not so considerably weakened as General Germania thought, as the first assault was hurled back like a baseball is from the bat, the column of Glandelinians suffering excruciating losses was put out of commission completely, and suffered the deaths of two of their best generals. General Vivian had seen this occurrence and just what he wanted General Germania to do at that, and as he had a large force coming on toward his center, a part of his second division, and as there was no place at first to use it, he now saw where they were needed. Those he ordered to the support of his right and they arrived just as the enemy's second terrific onslaught, increased by fresh divisions was in full swing. Nevertheless the right had been still holding its own, the battle here being a regular tug of war, and when the reinforcements arrived the enemy was swept back as again with their whole line fifty miles long shattered to pieces and the loss of many officers who fell in that mad onslaught. The right wing of the Christian line had won its charge carrying even the Glandelinian batteries again at fearful odds when countercharging and sending the Glandelinians flying like a ball from the bat again. Three more desperate onslaughts were made by the enemy to retake the batteries but three times their main assaulting line was decimated and routed with the loss of their leaders. Night compelled the enemy to abandon the fierce fighting for a while, but having large fresh armies at his hand, Germania was as yet not disposed to give up and decided to resume the action as soon as his broken forces could be regathered. . . .

Evans and Violet and her sisters had not been near the region of the battle at all in conversation with Roswell Buxton, Johnston, but they had heard it plainly and had continually dreamed the outcome of it. But they learned later in the evening that the Christians had been successful, but that nevertheless General Germania Vivian had large fresh forces at hand and there was no signs of the battle being over yet. Fires started by the battle in the distance reddened the sky for miles despite the fierce blizzard raging, making a fantastic sight for Violet and her sisters, who watched the glow for hours. Then seeing that the light was growing brighter, and fearing a forest fire they decided to go down that direction and see if it was one. They told Evans of their intention but he said it was only towns, piles of railroad ties and fuel freight cars burning there, having been set on fire by the enemy as they retreated. Now in the meantime Germania Vivian learned that the Vivian girls had caused some havoc among the troops chasing them and being angry and finding that they must be somewhere outside of general Vivian's army, he decided to have them captured at once. He sent thousands of men at many different localities with the instructions of bringing in the Vivian girls dead or alive and their guardian colonel Jack Evans with them. What his purpose was he would not say but nevertheless it was something serious for this was the closest search ever made by the Glandelinians before.

The leaders were even instructed that they were not to return until until they had the Vivian girls in their hands, or blown them up by mine. The Glandelinians were to start this search during the night and were to get the Vivian girls even if they had to be pulled out of the heart of the Christian lines.

"If you cannot catch them, blow them up." Was the instruction. So while the roar of battle still continued, and echoed over the field of carnage the thirty thousand Glandelinians deployed for the capture of the Vivian girls, set out first on the march, then separating into companies and went to the various locations assigned them by general Germania. The Glandelinians had armed themselves to the teeth to be prepared against any scouting parties that might be out and also against their intended victims for they knew how desperate the Vivian girls were and that it was more perilous attacking them in the dark than it was in the day time. In the meantime Evans and the little girls were just going to sleep in their tents outside the Christian lines, when they suddenly heard a volley of scattering shots, that crashed deafeningly in the quiet of the night. This was followed by wild yells and answering shots and then one of the Angelinian pickets rushed up to the tent of Violet and her sisters shouting:

"The Glandelinians! Make your escape to the line before it is too late."

Evans was the first one up and grabbing his revolver he darted behind a tree just as a score of shots were fired. Hammersed with a volley from his pistols and though he did not bring any one down he had fired so rapidly that the assailants hesitated long enough to enable Violet and her sisters to slip away.

"Come follow me," hissed Evans. "It is probably a night surprise attack made by the Glandelinians."

Evans led the way down a narrow road, plowing through snow knee deep in places, but making good headway nevertheless. The Glandelinians had by this time reached the tents and entered the opening they dashed only to find no one there.

"Set the tents on fire," roared the leader. "The Vivian girls may have been in here and are now being fired upon. Have probably escaped. The fire will light our way somehow."

The tents were at once set on fire but Evans seeing the Glandelinians in the light of the fire had blazed away with his pistols bringing down three of the men. The rest of the Glandelinians saw Evans and the little girls and started after them. They however made slower progress through the deep snow and drift than Evans and the little girls could have done and half blinded by the clouds of snow falling so steadily the Glandelinians were confused. However the light of the flames though dying out however still revealed the fugitives, and the Glandelinians brought their muskets to their shoulders and let loose a deafening volley. At the moment the volley was fired, Evans and the little girls seemed to drop and with wild exultant cries the Glandelinians pressed slowly to the spot only to find they had gone down a steep descent and were far ahead. Confused by the snow the Glandelinians had not aimed well enough, and the bullets of the second volley flew wild. The Glandelinians fired again and again, but of no avail and as traveling here was very difficult they had to abandon the pursuit, trusting that the escaped fugitives would soon run into one of the other searching parties and be captured or shot.

Evans and the little girls had continued on for some distance when all of a sudden Violet and her sisters heard voices say: "What in the hell did general Gerl Germania want to send us in search of those pesky Vivian girls in such a night for? And I know we will never find our way back to the lines if we do capture them." "What does he want them for anyway? I'd like to know." Said another voice. "I asked him and he only told us to do as he ordered and not to ask questions."

From the conversation Jack Evans learned now the cause of the sudden appearance of the Glandelinians. They had been sent out by their brother general Germania Vivian to run the Vivian girls down like cattle the poor little fair creatures who had done him no harm to no one under any conditions hardly unless their lives were at stake and then only slightly disabling the Glandelinians. . . . He realized that thousands upon thousands of Glandelinians were hunting the little girls and knew that if Germania Vivian ever got the little girls it would be all off with them. At first he did not know what to do. It was a long distance to the Christian lines, over ten miles as it seemed to him and no telling how many of the Glandelinians were between him and the Christians. However as it was pitch dark and as they were unseen he decided to trust to luck and whispering to the little girls to be cautious he drew his guns and shouted:

"Here you men you quit your fool grumbling, and do as I commanded. I'm out here on the same errand. Go get the Vivian girls and shut up or I'll report you to his excellency."

An explanation came from the Glandelinians and the sound of foot steps was heard to be retreating. Evans had succeeded by this trick but he wondered what he could do if he came upon them again. The wind was blowing fiercely tormenting the fugitives with the cold icy snow and the all felt uneasy. They continued their way carefully not being able to see on account of the pull made by the falling snow and had gone only a quarter of a mile further, when a sharp voice rang out:

"Advance neither a step and no all! fire. You are under arrest and don't think you can get away because we cannot see you for there are too many of us here to miss our aim."

Seeing no one on account of the darkness and the snow fall the fugitive fugitives remained perfectly quiet, Evans having drawn his guns and held his piece. After a few moments the voice cried again:

"Who's there! We heard you advancing. We got you well covered with a machine gun."

Still Evans and the little girls remained quiet for several moments then Evans said:

"Go get the Vivian girls as I have commanded. You go and get the Vivian girls."

"I will see to it," cried the voice. "You pesky prowlers have ran into us before you knew it. I go and get the Vivian girls oh! Yes I will to save them from your devilish clutches. And you leave them little girls alone and you Olandelinian folks fools. What did they do to you?"

"Angeliniens," gasped Evans. "We are Abyssinkilians. Thrown down your arms and surrender."

"Im colonel Jack Evans should be the guardian of the Vivian girls." "We are paused and at first thought you were some of the Olandelinian skunks that were after us. That is why I gave you that order in answer to your challenge. I was pretending to be one of their officers as I and they succeeded in escaping the second bunch we ran into. The little girls are here with me."

The Abyssinkilians advanced flashing their electric lights they carried with them and saw it was true.

"How in the world did you get here in the dark, and in such a snow storm?" Asked one of the men. "We were on guard duty here, and hearing shouts, firing and other confusion remained here longer to see what it was. You are in general Vivians lines. Right in the heart of it."

"We are in the heart of general Vivians lines?" Gasped Evans. "Why I thought it was ten miles away."

"You were only a quarter of a mile away from it." Replied the Abyssinkilian soldier. "Hurry and pass through before the troublemakers come. I will detail my corporal to go and report this to general Vivian as I'm sure he will be interested....."

Evans and the little girls passed the guards, the sergeant ordering the corporal now off duty with him and the others to report the matter to general Vivian. However it happened that general Vivian through some friendly Olandelinian, who had given himself for that very purpose, had learned of his wicked sons intentions and it happened an hour afterwards that most of the prowlers had been lost in the darkness and blizzard storm and so had been trapped by the Christians and all who did not escape were shot down or made prisoners. General Vivian now feared greatly for the safety of his daughters. Especially the horrors of Julio Gallio haunted him and he literally shivered with fear for their safety. He remembered all they went through before and was bound to protect his little saintly daughters at all costs. He had only captured only one sight of the prowlers and from one of them he who was really spiteful toward Germania he learned what his sons intentions were.

"I'm a born Olandelinian, a full blooded Omerian, but I went on this search greatly against my will. Said the man. I'll do not approve of the war, am against it and all its causes, and am heartily glad I'm a prisoner. I do not care to harm little children, no matter who they be and am glad to say I overheard Germania's intentions. He was plotting it among his officers. He intends to have the little girls captured and sent to Julio Gallio to get them out of Wankers way, but most of his officers disapproved of it declaring that no one could take them there as no one could pass through the Christian lines. Well then he changed his plans, of that to having them slaughtered, and sent back the cut up remains to you. Do not send me back to him for I can not for the war on their side. I'm a prisoner and I want to stay one."

This news alarmed general Vivian more than the other had, and he decided to place Violet and her sisters under the protection of a heavy guard. But he felt that this would not do any good either for there was no telling how many of the Olandelinians would make the attempt. The other Olandelinian soldiers sent on the same mission had returned with the report to Germania that the Vivian girls were safely within the Christian lines, having escaped the other Olandelinian soldiers and that many of the other soldiers had been captured by the Christians. By this news general Germania was terribly incensed but did not punish the Olandelinians for their failure though he raised Cain in general fury. To tell the truth Violet and her sisters felt nervous and alarmed for they realized that when the Olandelinians were after them that manner they surely meant a serious business, and no one could get them to go outside the Christian line that night. Even the little girls again wore their cartridge belts and carried their small guns with them so they could use them and not be caught napping as they had been before. It was toward midnight when the little girls seemed to find themselves rising off their beds while all around them roared a terrible crashing sound. To them it seemed as if all the world was blowing to pieces, the horrid shrieks of millions of demons assailed them, while all to them seemed red a pit of frightful crimson redness.

They even fancied that they saw our Christ appear before them all dripping in blood, that Olandelinians were slashing him with their sabres sticking him with their bayonets while he hung on the cross, and that he seemed to look horrified and pointing toward them saying:

"Those Olandelinians who are murdering the children in Julio Gallio and brutalizing them are doing the same to me. Come to my rescue dear ones please do."

Then he disappeared. There came a frightful hellish blackness, a terrible rumbling roar, a mighty prolonged crash, and then they fell from their beds and awoke. In fact all this noise was no dream. At midnight being determined to capture the little girls no matter what the cost Germania had launched a general onslaught on the Christian line. The assault had continued for over an hour since it started, and the whole battle seemed like a line of flashing lightning of various colors. The assault had been delivered with the most terrific violence, but the soldiers fearing that since the kidnappers failed, that a fierce attack would follow had been prepared and twice already the enemy suffered the destruction of their columns and a crushing and bloody repulse. Indeed a fearful battle was raging in the midst of a blizzard that showed no signs of abating. Though repulsed two times already the shattered Olandelinian columns had rallied and now again swept forward, every man yelling like millions of demons. This time the push was more desperate and driving and violent that it had been successful, a succession of volleys having been delivered by both sides, and now the Christians at this point had given way.

After passing through four frightful days of battle last Brigado the Vivian girls on the fifteenth were caught in the advancing inferno and prepared to join the Christian soldiers in their retreat. The enemy capturing the Christian cannon had turned these upon the retreating columns, the explosions blasting the drifts of snow into the air in rolling clouds and dowl downing the Christians everywhere. These explosions tearing up the snow everywhere filled the air with it to a terrifying thickness so that at times objects a few feet away were obscured and the retreating Angeliniens could hardly distinguish foe from friend. The storm of terrible explosions put the Vivian girls in greater peril, but rather being killed than by the sabres of the enemy, the little girls boldly called out which if they had not done so the tragedy which occurred would never have happened. A terrible scene now met their eyes. The air was filled with flashing lightning from the bursting shells, eruptions of smoke snow, and ground debris seemed to rise hundreds of feet, and the noise was too horrible to stand, and they shrieked in alarm and terror as they saw a perfect surge of purple coats rush past them only to cumber the ground by hundreds at every step. The enemy advancing under cover of their artillery were pouring a terrific storm of fire with their musketry and the little girls realized that they were about as safe in the open as a hen would be under the butchers axe. The din and confusion was fearful and they hardly knew what to do. Evans at this time happened to be absent being in general Vivians headquarters, and the little girls seemed helpless in their peril.

"Oh God what shall we do! What shall we do!" Cried Jennie desperately as a deafening crash roared near them from an exploding shell.

"We are done for," said Violet indispair. "We will be captured and butchered sure or killed by this mad hell. And here comes a surge of gray coats now."

The landelinians were coming at the double time yelling and firing, and oh only the quick pronouncement of mind of voice saved herself and her sisters from the raven raving manna in gray. A deep snowdrift untouched as yet by shell or shot was close by and the little girls quickly dove into this just as the fearful surge of gray coats came swarming up. None of the landelinians had seen the little girls but as the surge had passed several parties of the landelinians seeing the depression in the drift at started for it when a shell exploded in their midst killing a score and frightfully mangle the rest. It was a lucky shell for this saved the little girls from detection.

THE HORRIBLE TRAGEDY.

As soon as the landelinians were out of sight and the cannon fire was ceasing the little girls came out of their hiding place and started for the nearest town reaching a large city. It seemed their only safety just now and they sprang forward. Just as they reached a house there came a thousand withering flashes followed by a terrible damanating roar, and the little girls felt something like timbers strike them, and then all seemed dark except to Angelina who along remained conscious for a few minutes. An hour after they came to and found found themselves lying in snow with heads and suffering fearful pain. Evans was hating over them with tears in his eyes.

"You little girls came close to twenty deadly mines which blew up." He said sadly; "They may it was our mines that to trap the landelinians which which you ran into, but I know it was Germania who gave the shock for I with my very eyes saw him do it the damnable skunk. I'm awfully sorry that all of you are so horribly mangled and will take revenge for for it."

Indeed the little girls were horribly mangled. And were fairly tossing in agony. Their bodies had been frightfully lacerated. Violet's leg and arm had been frightfully torn and broken in three places and all had injuries as equally as bad or worse. It had been an awful tragedy, but never theless Violet and her sisters had not been the only victims. Thousands of the Angelinians had been blown to atoms, and whole divisions had been shredded to fragments. But none of the wounded Angelinians had been so frightfully mangled as the Vivian girls were. The doctor who was preparing to operate on them had great doubts if the little girls would live but afterwards he had declared that they could be saved if kept perfectly quiet, but that nevertheless they maybe horribly disfigured and crippled for life.

All of the little girls had been later on operated on and had to say without any antiseptic as not none could be had. And who can imagine what they suffered when the operation was going on. A kind hearted soldier that had been wounded had yielded his antiseptics but it had been spoiled by some secret enemy before the operation. The operation was ready to be started. After the operation the little girls looked like lost souls.

"The enemy were the cause of it all." Said Evans angrily to the doctor when the operation was through. "Their wicked traitorous brother had persecuted them, and persecuted them for four or five days, and during this battle they got so confused that they lastly literally ran on top of the mines I saw Germania blast. If this had not been for the work of Germania this would not have happened. General Vivian is fairly raving about it. He is preparing already to smash him down for this tragedy."

It had indeed been a tragedy. Evans' regiment alone had stood its ground against fearful odds and during the very second repulse the Christian engineers had set a score of mines, which unknown to them had been exploded by the landelinians at the command of Germania as the reason saw the little girls approach the location, and the poor little girls springing for refuge had run close to one of the nearest mines to which blasted that shelter to fragments and mangled the little girls. Several of the Angelinian soldiers besides Evans had seen the tragedy, and called the stretcher bearers who had the little girls in the army hospital in a quarter of an hour. This was probably the worst thing that ever happened to the Vivian girls, that anyone can remember. According to the doctor it would be months before the little girls would be up and around again but never as before and probably would be in wheel chairs for life. General

General Vivian in fact half blamed Evans for the disaster, for it had been his mines that did the damage, but nevertheless knowing that Evans was really innocent of it all and that the landelinians had blasted the mines instead, he was afraid to say anything to him, when he knew how grief stricken he himself was. Poor Violet and her sisters. After all they suffered so bravely all the time during the war, and now have this happen to them. Evans was sore afraid of the consequences, loathsome and heart sick, and broken hearted. But better they were dead, than both disfigured and crippled for life. The doctor had told him that every one of the poor little girls received serious injuries to their eyes, and at also probably blindness would be the result. Evans offered anything to the doctor he could spare, even a higher commission to save them from this horrible fate but the doctor only answered;

"God alone can spare them from what might be. Pray my boys."

I don't believe any one could have seen a more broken hearted personage than poor Evans. He felt that he was mainly the cause of land cursed himself for not making sure that the enemy would, not blast the mines themselves. He was mad at both himself and Germania. Vivian, at Germania for his foolhardy persecutions and for blasting the mines, and at himself for not watching the mines more closely. He had left the room where the little girls lay, unable to bear the sight, and half weeping himself he went out into the cold blizzard, another of which was raging not caring what might happen to him now. The attack of the enemy was still continuing so violently at many points of the Christian line still in possession of the ground they had gained. As he trudged on through the deep snow he could hear the sound of the distant battle, the crash of more mines going off, but he did not pay any attention now. He plunged on caring not where he was going, when suddenly general Vivian came plunging through the snow, shouting after him, but at first he heard nothing except the wild roar of the battle, the howl of the wind and the hiss of the swirling snow. At last however he heard general Vivian calling him and he halted.

"Why are you running off like this for Jack Evans." "Grief General." "If you are not to blame for the accident stay with them. You are their only consolation. Don't be a fool. All the officers are speaking about your going off like this and leaving them without anybody to give them comfort."

"It not that." Gasped Evans. "I can't stand it. I can't stand it to see their awful suffering. It will kill me."

"Ah nonsense. Your presence will make them forget their suffering. Come at least for their sake. Be game. Why all the officers are thinking you are running off from them and committing desertion."

Evans staggered slowly back the way he had come, general Vivian following close behind. At last after being buffeted by the wind and swirling snow they reached the hospital and staggered slowly into the room where Violet and her sisters lay. They were lying quiet now but to him they were a pitiful sight and falling down beside Violet's head he wept like a child. Violet indeed was suffering but she felt his grief still more and placed her only good hand on his head gently but could not find voice to speak. Her face was all swathed in bandages and her conditions was most pitiful to see. How long he knelt there he never knew but when he did lift his head it was daylight. It was still snowing fiercely outside in bigger flakes but not so thick as before and the frost was starting to climb on the windows. In the meantime at the camp of day general Vivian had moved his forces in a strong concentration against the landelinians still attacking the shriveled Christian line opposed to them and soon such overwhelming numbers told on the enemy who was swept back.

On account of the severe weather general Germania did not feel it wise to continue the severe battle. In seeing that his night attack was a fair failure, but general Vivian enraged over the pitiful condition of the little girls which in fact was Germania's responsibility, decided not to let the weather interfere with him. Having large forces of reinforcements close at hand general Vivian ordered a general attack to be made once on the enemy's lines. The advance started at nine o'clock in the morning and the assault raged until two o'clock in the afternoon amid the worse fury of the blizzard. The struggle was more fearful than on the previous days, being extremely sanguinary, but so violent was the attack that at the end of the day the fighting was over. Germania's right despite all the rain forcing he did, was continually cut up and finally thrown into the wildest confusion. Already even now the Christians had come in possession of the most important works. At two o'clock the Christian assault was rolled back by heavy landelinian reinforcements with frightful decimation, and then followed a lull until two thirty. After the half an hour's lull general Germania threw heavy attacks against the christian christians holding the works, and this indeed gave general Vivian a chance to revenge the pitiful condition of the landelinians. The landelinians unfortunately were attacking in overwhelming numbers, and the christian right shrank to fragments as they about to yield its ground. The action here was extremely severe, more severe than in the morning and the enemy was suffering the most terrific losses. General Vivian through messengers discovered the condition of his right before a disaster occurred and massed heavy reserves to its support even brought up all the artillery that could be placed at the worst work. The enemy made desperate attempts to carry this position and stormed with their horrible fury. The first assault almost successful at the right wing of the christians was cut down by the reinforcements suddenly arriving. The second assault was more extensive and though desultory at first became general and ended the same way the first one did. The third assault was a regular tidal wave of slaughter. The landelinians surged against the christians in a long wave of men, but only remnants returned.

The fourth was equally violent and resulted in the breaking of the christian line at many points, but finally the surviving landelinians broke back in confusion under that merciless christian fire. The other six assaults were successive at different points of the line and ended in the same terrific slaughter. Then the christians crashed down upon the demoralized landelinian columns, and routed them once more, capturing many hundreds of thousands of prisoners, and shooting down thousands for miles during the rout.

Germania prepared to meet this second general christian assault with all his strength. First he threw forward one main division, and then another to repel the christian advance, but without success, and only fragments of these divisions came back. Another series of divisions, and still another series were thrown forward, but they were only cut up and thrown into confusion, the christians taking many more divisions of prisoners, and routing the survivors. The slaughter was division after division was thrown against the christian line was horrible to witness, and oceans of blood was spilled.

Germania was indeed frantic to keep keep or stop the wild progress the battle was making against him. The battle raged more fiercely now than ever the christians driving at the landelinians with all their might, the carnage being terrible and the sea of silent bodies that were strewn upon the snow covered ground told mute but eloquent tales of the fury of the most violent battle ever raging at this section of Calvernia. Germania was unable to hold his ground however especially against the fearful odds thrown against him, though he did his very best. He had thrown every available division against the christians, but his right grand division had been destroyed, thousands of his men and horses having been killed in a tearing christian cavalry charge. First the landelinians along the extreme left broke and fled, then the rest of the line gave way, and once more the christians were completely successful having crushed Germania's army a second time. It was however late at night up to eight thirty o'clock before the terrible awe and inspiring roar of the battle ceased to echo for hundreds of miles. Evans had been in the thick of this terrible storm of battle, and he showed his hurt feelings by shooting down many of the landelinian officers as he could until amid the dreadful carnage he himself was brought from the field of battle severely and dangerously wounded. Broken drums everywhere gave evidence of vandalism, and many bugles lay but the brave buglers were no where to be seen. Even when the battle had ceased at eight thirty the snowstorm was still raging. Now Violet and her sisters were with out Evans for he was lying wounded in the hospital further away from the one Violet and her sisters were in. After the conflict had ceased general Vivian heard that Jack Evans was wounded, and then he was all upset, for now there was no real friend like Evans to console the little girls in their misery and pain. They had been constantly calling for Evans all day long and now he was fearfully wounded and lying in a hospital far away from the one the little girls were in. Even now they were calling piteously for Evans and yet it was a long long way to the hospital where he lay. General Vivian tried to go in communication with the hospital by wireless, but could get no answer, and so he had sent several soldiers to find out if Evans could be removed. The soldiers returned in an hour saying that he was being transferred, and would be at the hospital as soon as the difficult travel would permit. However Violet and her sisters did not know that Evans was wounded and it pained general Vivian to tell them so but he had to than have it come from somewhere else.

1-129

They did not show as if they cared but he saw that the news had been a shock for them. When they he left they almost cried their eyes out. Indeed it was a sorrowful campaign for general Vivian and if he vowed that if better luck did not come the Vivian girls recover without being disfigured, crippled and blinded for life, he would denounce the horrors going on there in Julio Gallo back out from the Julio Gallo campaign as the term is. "Let George do it."

Indeed from the awful tragedy general Vivian was broken hearted and discouraged. Yet he was not going to back out in his fight against Germania. Vivian decided to give him another dose if he did not retreat. Indeed he was bound to fix Germania's traitorous son. It was fearful for him heartrending. He indeed intended to see how his poor little daughters suffered, that frightfully stormy night, when once again the horrible roar of battle broke the stillness to announce that Germania again was making a frightful onslaught. For half the night the terrible thunders of battle shook the hospital which trembled to their foundations.

The din was a great disturbance to Violet and her sisters, but it was a greater disturbance to general Vivian to see his very strongest divisions go to pieces before the enemy's onslaught, which was a screaming fury. All the time the battle roared Violet and her sisters had cried again and again in their agony.

"Oh, oh God, I wish that horrid old noise would stop."

But it was a sleepless night for them, for though the enemy was repulsed it did not stop, and the enemy only resumed the assault with redoubled violence. This time the line of battle was a regular roaring emanation of volcano of flame and din, and one division after another of the landelinians crushed themselves against the christian line before they desisted in their headlong attack. The enemy suffered the most fearful losses in their attacks and many of the fallen were general officers.

Early in the morning Germania Vivian seeing that all his fierce assaults he made was unsuccessful, started a general withdrawal along the line. He had intended to make a general retreat not caring to fight any further in the battle as his losses was too great. General Vivian however was not satisfied and decided to wait until general Germania started his retreat and then strike a parting blow. The snowstorm had ceased, and though the sun was shining brightly it was fourteen below zero and still dropping. Before ordering the advance general Vivian sent to see Evans.

"I believe you were a little reckless," said General Vivian. "Your brooding over the Vivian girls made you reckless as I know."

"The conditions of those poor little girls are so enough to make any one reckless," said Evans. "But I feel better to day and will be around soon the doctor says. How are they?" "Just the same," said general Vivian sadly. "They are suffering miserably. Many of the officers declared it was your fault because you darted off so suddenly last night."

"General Germania did the damage for a fact," said Evans. "Though I saw Germania's foul deed, I did not see the little girls in the darkness quick enough to warn them and the only objects that I saw in time was the landelinians about to set off the mines. I'm broken hearted I am and I don't care what those officers say."

"I suppose because they will be disfigured for life and old crippled you will lose your love for them," said general Vivian seriously. This he said to try him. "Most people love women and children because they are only pretty and if anything happens to disfigure them they are only in the way afterwards."

"General Vivian if you mean what you say then you are no friend of mine," protested Evans. "Beauty has no outward beauty more than the devil. Violet and her sisters were beautiful, more beautiful than I have ever seen children before but that hardly noticed. Their manners were more beautiful than their features, their beautiful clean loving souls is what struck me. And their kindness to all the wounded, enemy or friend to the poor children in Calvernia and other cities and the misery and torture they went through was what took the greatest effect upon me. Not a sin of any kind ever stained their souls, and whenever they heard blasphemies and curses it made them cry. Their condition now only makes me saddened and almost broken hearted, and when I think of their being disabled figured and crippled for life-----oh I can't-----hear to speak-----of it. Do they know it was Germania who caused the mines to go off?"

"No indeed," said general Vivian bitterly. "I'm afraid to tell them Evans. They think it was you who did it accidentally." "I told them but they must have been a delirious then," said Evans. "Go tell them I'll bear the consequences."

Confidentially Vivian left and reaching Violet and her sisters in Violet with the bandages over her eyes was unable to see him but she knew of his grief and to cheer him up she told him she was feeling better and that the doctor said that she and her sisters may live after all. And that they may be able to sit up in a few weeks. Evans did not believe this but then knowing that the little girls never told lies he had the opinion that the doctor told them this to keep up their spirits and so he decided to at least have hope. Indeed the little girls were not recovering from the danger of death, disfigurement and the other calamities were not past and also the threatening blindness, but their suffering was somewhat spent and that the doctor had said that they could be up on wheelchairs in a few weeks.

OTHER SAD EVENTS.
A FEARFUL DISASTER. BATTLE OF FRANCIS ANNA. DECEMBER

TWENTY FIFTH.

While general Vivian was brooding over the condition of his daughters, several of his officers had already reported to him that the enemy under Federal had completely leveled the city of Francis-Anna to the ground with his fearful cannons, when the city refused to refuge him and his army from the advancing Christians under Hanson, who had been frightfully worsted in a severe action not far from the place with losses too frightful to relate and his army reduced just like general Vivians had been.

In fact the glandelinians showed themselves the masters under any conditions just now. In the city not hardly a single building had been left standing. In fact the rescuers had hardly found the remains of many two buildings as the wreckage of thousands of other houses completely covered the places where they lately stood to thirty feet deep. Everything all around was an indescribable sea of wreckage. Of the courthouse in the center of the city, only one fragment of a wall was left standing, and this was the only frontal part that faced the north. Even the Christians of Mc-Hollisters army besieging Julio Callio could faintly observed the fatal scenes of the wrecked cities and in the distance where the two disastrous battles had raged the dead bodies of many millions of Christian soldiers still lay as thick as straws among the wreckage of the battle torn forests. It was along Hanson's central wings and on his right that the most dead had been gathered, and along these two wings of Christian soldiers the enemy's deadly curtain fire had done the worse damage. Hanson had surveyed the wreckage of the shattered woods and the horribly mangled bodies with his keen eyes and almost wept at the sight. After traveling some distance Hanson and his officers came upon the wreckage of a long passenger train and also several freight trains half buried in the debris of broken trees, and also found nothing but dead bodies in purple. Hanson learned that these trains belonging to the Mc-Hollister and Pandorlines had lain here in wreckage for three days and that when he advanced his forces against Federal a large force of glandelinians had taken post here and yet despite the coolness of their officers three quarters of the glandelinians here were killed. The glandelinians here during the outbreak of the battle had been pulling up their heavy cannons to support their stand but the approach to the Mc-Hollister and Pandor crossing had been impassable on account of the barrage of Christian shells exploding in that location. This train having eleven wrecked steel coaches made a strong defense for the glandelinians as the sea of dead bodies in purple on the other side testified. The glandelinian general had examined the whole battle line during the engagement and noticed what he declared to be a big wall of purple coats with white convulsed clouds of smoke rising among them and as the scene became as if hell had opened, he had seen several twisting lines in gray fire in front of his line disolve into fragments, and then the survivors moved in disorderly streams toward him. All of his officers brought to attention by the sudden gathering of the purple coats toward the retreating glandelinians in front had ordered the glandelinians forward to their positions at the wrecked trains immediately. In fact every one of the glandelinians at their positions were scared and many of the soldiers knowing the hopelessness of coming with that yelling roaring avalanche of demons in purple began to make a rush for the rear, but were shot down by their officers for their cowardice. Several times a long hourly crash or ear-splitting rolling thunders of thousands of glandelinian cannon had seemed to split the earth. "Keep cool and give them hell when they come." Their officers had shouted. "And remember when they come to close quarters every man for himself. Don't dare give ground under any conditions." And probably we will drive them all back down close to the works. And fire when ordered. Goodness, talk about our yell which those Christian dogs call the "Devil Yell." Why their hearts the very devils. Give it to them boys when I give the command." They set the example by doing so themselves and every one of the soldiers followed and in another moment every bit of glass remaining in the coaches were shattered to shivers by the fierce storm of bullets from the advancing Christians, all the wreckage was remangled by the thousands of grenades they hurled, and the surviving glandelinians were sent careening across the fields in total counter charge, but when the Christian surge was beaten back only a quarter of the force of glandelinians were left of all who defended the trains. Masses of timbers, tons of debris were hurled with the most terrific force high into the air and against the coaches left standing, by high explosives, when the glandelinian centimeters let go their rain of hell fire, but the purple surge had kept on until annihilated rudely by Federal main line. Hundreds of thousands of heavy trees had also been uprooted. When the attack had passed far beyond the coaches, all the coaches had been left in a worse condition, and the suffering of the injured had been terrible.

A hastily appeal had been received early that morning by general Vivian:

"Your excellency general Vivian/
"Can't you send some aid to my army and the stricken city of Francis Anna. I had been caught in a welter of slaughter with Raymond Richardson Federalist Francis Anna and had been worsted disgracefully and my army is almost wiped out, I having suffered ten times as much losses as the enemy had."

The whole battle field looks like the "Valley of the shadow of death." If aid does not come I will have to abandon the campaign. A large force of the enemy had showed great resistance for a long time a long line of passenger coaches annihilating the Christian columns assailing them, despite these waves of my Christian troops being overwhelming despite the coolness of their officers. Very bit of glasses were shattered by the storm of advancing Christian fire while masses of shattered trees and tons of flying debris were hurled into the air by the most terrific explosions.

General Francis Hanson...

During the ruthless bombardment of Francis-Anna by Federal artillery thousands of houses had been blown into the air every hour and their wreckage as to say scattered to the four winds. And that the horribly crushed bodies of men, women and children, had been carried one hundred miles by the glandelinians on trains as suffering as they were placed in the houses of doom in Julio Callio despite the regiments of Mc-Hollisters seige. Mc-Hollisters besieging army being swept away in a terrific onslaught made by Federal. Every bone in the bodies of the children were broken, during the tortures meted out by the glandelinians, and most of their clothing stripped from them. Unsuspecting by the foe and led to it by desperation Evans had managed to slip his way into Julio Callio in disguise as a glandelinian general and witnessed all the hellish tortures of the children ever imagined. One child a little girl, who had been caught praying in her cell, was before the horrifying sight of Evans extracted by from the blast blasted by the glandelinians with her chest and abdomen almost gone with all her intestines strewn about mingled with blood. What a sad sight to be in such a condition, he knew well. Even when he went to Francis Anna he saw how the glandelinians treated those surviving the disaster. One little girl was dragged out of the wreckage, and found still alive but too badly crippled to work in the slave houses in Julio Callio was pinned to the earth by the glandelinians who used an eight by length of three by four timber which passed through her back and out her abdomen. This child being now in the same condition, when the butchers applied their sabres most of her intestines falling to the ground. As Evans passed on he saw the horrible effects of Federal bombardment. Thousands of telephone poles lay across the streets and perfect networks of still live wire made it for a moment impossible for the rascally glandelinians to get to those still alive, but nevertheless for revenge the glandelinians set fire to those after houses and these fires threatening to become a general conflagration, burned many of the hel ples under the wreckage alive. Even even witnessed other piteous sights. Thousands of buildings in Francis Street were in total ruins, these buildings having been shattered to fragments by the terrific outburst of high explosive shells. Sixteen visiting bishops had been taken alive from the ruins by the glandelinians and sent slain, and twenty priests who had been fatally wounded with two Cardinals by the glandelinians were also crucified. Many of the wooden houses near by, by the force of the high explosive shells had been scattered into shattered timbers, many men smashed and scattered to mere splinters by one single high explosive. By the explosions as Evans saw thousands of strong walled houses had been dumped completely into tangled heaps being dumped into tangled heaps of ruins onto the pavements and streets below making the wide streets completely impassable.

Thousands of whole brick houses from four to five stories high had been blown into tangled windrows into the streets, many great trees lying across the streets all the wreckage making a complete barricade that prevented the passage of Evans, quite dangerous. In this vicinity there were scores of houses so badly damaged that Evans was unable to still tell where any of these structures lately stood and the debris was so heterogeneously mixed that they formed an impassable barrier.

Blown over on its side by some terrific explosion was a electric engine and this was found jammed against the stone wall of some ruined church. Part of the wall itself was riven into grotesque ruins, and the main gate was seen ten hundred yards away from the building. A great church near by was also in ruins, where the loss of life exacted over sixteen hundred, most of the injured having been pulled from the wreckage only to be massacred by the frenzied glandelinians. Even in the near distance Evans could see the ruins of a big school house which had been badly damaged by shells. The whole building had the upper part cut off and the interior was in ramshackle ruins. From here as Evans learned thousands of mangled and bleeding bodies of children had been dragged out by the cruel glandelinians and nailed to hastily made rude crosses, and these could be seen yet.

Another big schoolhouse within plain sight was seen to be badly battered with its whole roof blown off by shells, its western wall was partially blown away exposing the interior and the roof of the annex blown away. St Anne's five story school house which had twenty big rooms had been razed by a single shrapnel shell alone and all the children in it had been buried in the wreckage and could not be released from the conglomerate mass.

Ascertain priest on a visit at the time had a harrowing experience during the sudden bombardment. He managed to save five hundred children of one of the schools that was wrecked from injury, and as he and the children were taken from the wreckage by the glandelinians half an hour later the children he had saved were literally massacred before his eyes, and then he himself shot down in cold blood for his saving them. Hundreds of great resident houses had been completely cut in two by the mere concussion of shell explosions, Canotina street itself was full of wrecked houses in hundreds of degrees of terrible ruin and one big public building in total ruins with its walls down and its floors crushed resembled a large junk pile. Ninety-two children in this region found alive by the glandelinians had been massacred and three thousand five hundred others were found nailed to crosses and still alive in mortal agony. The scenes along this street was terrible indeed. A line of one thousand wooden houses were found in a long parallel front of strange ruins and hundreds upon hundreds of telephone poles lay across the street making a perfect network of wires, wires and rendering it impossible for the glandelinians at this section to get at their wounded victims.

JACK'S RESCUE OF FRANCIS LILLIAN.....

But during his two weeks stay in Julio Callio in complete disguise Evans saw worse scenes in that city than he had ever seen in war when he was there assuming the name of a beguinary. In war generally in quest in little but could get no word of her. One day however he managed to work his way undetected into one of the horrible slave houses, where, it being evening and the coal for the machine run short the machine mill shut down thus allowing the child slaves more rest than they had before. Most of the children were disfigured by the many torture they had undergone so terribly disfigured that if any one of them had been pretty they were not now.

He pretended that he was looking for work there to avert all suspicion and finally was made chief foreman. Indeed the child slaves along suspected his real character but because he did not act as the overseers under him and on Monday as he passed the long line of bedrooms of one child being in each he saw slowly advancing toward him a pretty little girl who was in a wheelchair with one leg on a pad and though he would insist on passing by as if you to act as if he hated children, she kept on following him. He managed to control himself as several glandelinians appeared as he pretended anger and rage and turning abruptly on the child said furiously:

"Out of my way do you here! Get out or I'll throw you wheel's chair and all into the furnace. And what in the duce are you following me around for in this fashion. I'm going to take you right into your room now and give it to you." And grabbing the wheel chair he rushed the startled child into the room slamming the door shut. But the expected violence did not come. In fact the little girl had not followed him so purposely, for to her he did not appear as a brutal glandelinian and so trusting that she was a friend of children instead had followed him where ever he went. At first she had thought that his furious rebuke had been intentional and that his rudely wheeling her into the room, had been a sign of coming torture, but when he stood still eyeing her closely and primly she was felt queer. As he knew that the glandelinians were still at the door he said:

"You are the very kid I was sent here for my Manley. They tell me that you are one of those pretty Vivian girls who pestered Manley all these years or of war, and so I was sent here under pretense of looking for work to track you up, so that I would have you. I'm general Calinsbury of Manleys command in disguise as a working man. Have a warrant sworn out here for your immediate arrest, and to be taken to Manley. And he produced a large paper with real type the exact warrant which he had stolen from the original owner after killing him in the struggle for it. The soldiers hearing this came in.

"I claim my rights to take this Vivian girl to general John Manley our main chief commander." Said Evans. "This dastardly Vivian girl is here, assuming the name of Francis Lillian to escape detection to spy on your child slave concern. She is a spy and I demand you to give the little girl up to me."

The soldiers read the warrant and one of them an officer said: "Al! I right sir if it is in Manleys wish I cannot prevent you. When are you going to take her?"

"RIGHT AWAY." Answered Evans. "I must reach Manleys lines by to morrow night."

Evans got the written permit and when the soldiers left for the outside and were gone, Evans bending over the poor child who was starting to weep bitterly said soothingly:

"You poor poor little crippled angel don't cry it is all a lie. You are really in the hands of a friend. That warrant is true one but I stole it for it is my only means to get you safely out of the hands of the glandelinian brutes. So don't take it too hard. Your poor father is still alive and it was he who told me where you are. You will be in general Vivian's army to morrow or probably to night. You will never see that SNAKE of a Manley Manley."

He poor child could hardly believe this good news but Evans meant all he said. In a few minutes he had her in his arms all bundled up in heavy blankets to keep her warm and then he stole out of the house and into the street which was now vacant. It was snowing heavily a gain but this was better to his advantage and not being far from the outskirts of the city he had hopes of getting out without being detected.

However there was no such luck for he was suddenly halted by several glandelinian guards who demanded him to show the, what he had gripped so snugly in the bundle. He at first refused but one of the glandelinians threatened at the bundle and as he resisted another of the glandelinians wounded him in the head with his sabre making a serious but not dangerous wound. After this Evans laid in a hospital which he had went to himself for a month and when he was finally recovering one of the glandelinian sergeants showed Evans a bullet he had taken out of a companion during an operation.

"I am a glandelinian but I feel I sorry for you and that little girl." Said the doctor. "You are now a prisoner and when you are well you will be taken on a train to the worst glandelinian prisons way down in glandelinia. I wish I could help you but I do not see any way unless you try and help yourself. But in case you manage to escape which I'm sure you will I will at least tell you where the little girl has been taken to. Her foot was injured when the guard struck you and she is in St Joseph's hospital. If escape go there and get her."

"They will never take me into glandelinian alive." Hissed Evans. "I came here on purpose to get that little girl and I will."

"You made a great mistake in bundling her in the blankets as you did." Said the doctor. "That is what aroused the suspicion of the guards."

"But I had to keep her warm somehow." Said Evans.
"Why did you not put her clothes on?" Asked the doctor. "You are a boy but in case of such risk it does not matter if you dress a little girl."

"I did not take time to think of it." Answered Evans. "I was in such a hurry to get away."

When the doctor left Evans for a time, turned his thoughts to his friends far away in the christian lines. When ever he thought of the Vivian girls and their condition it made his heart ache. In the meantime shocking horrors had occurred in Julio Gallio. Hundreds of escaped priests and sisters running for a cellar from the glandelinians for safety, had reached it too late for every one of them were rolled and thrown about for nearly three blocks by the brutal glandelinians and then forced to give acrobatic stunts of leap frog and cartwheels perform once and then sent spinning head over head before being dashed to the earth by the great coated savages. However strange to say they escaped uninjured. From these glandelinian but they were shaken up quite a bit. This terrible scene occurred in St Mary's ave where Evans had his first squabble with the guards and where he had been injured. St Catherine's cathedral in Julio Gallio had been recently wrecked by the glandelinians. At the sudden outbreak of the glandelinian fury this cathedral which stood three hundred feet high had been blown clean from its foundation and pushed across several yards against a windrow of wreckage from the convent next to it and left standing in the position like the rakish appearance of a hat tilted hat on the head of a drunken man. Every window in the cathedral was or had been stoned out the whole roof had been blown away and the walls were shattered into shapes of ruins and sagging threateningly.

The inside of the Cathedral was a terrifying sight the inside being filled fifty feet deep with timbers and debris. The loss of life in this cathedral had been heavy as one thousand had been killed by the glandelinians for their attending to the forbidden devotions. The greater number that were massacred were children. When Evans had been spying around he witnessed an awful scene on Tracelastree a sight which almost froze the blood in his veins. There was left standing on a siding belonging to the Evangeline St. Alaric Railroad a long string of freight, passenger and other coaches, most of the freight and other coaches being cattle and box cars which formerly had been loaded with cattle and other things. On the slope to the east had stood one thousand six hundred powerful frame houses which had been shattered into complete wreckage by the glandelinians. Every one had perished in these houses, hundreds being killed by the glandelinians as they tried to escape, the rest burned at the stake and among the wreckage which the glandelinians had set on fire. In the cattle and box cars jammed to overflowing Evans had seen torn and lacerated bodies of children covered with gore. Many of these bodies naked, were mangled by the glandelinians. Indescribably horrible was the sight of these bodies which was also loaded on the passenger and flat cars and such sight had sickened Evans. Even many children most of them little girls stark naked were found reclining against the trucks of coaches or under them. Their condition was indeed pitiable, their arms being half cut off and lacerated beyond description, with also their legs and bodies, their chests and abdomens had been lacerated and opened wide, and blood had gushed in floods from their wounds. Their tongues were protruding and all their entire intestines had entirely disappeared.

Hundreds of great buildings and residences on both sides of the siding had been cleaved and razed by the glandelinians with mostly explosive shells, and dynamite, all their floors being mere kindling the roofs having been entirely blown down and not a window pane was seen remaining. Hundreds upon hundreds of the dead in the cars had been lying in these ruined buildings and indeed the dead lacerated bodies of the children made a pitiable, at the same time most most terrifying sight to behold. All the children who had survived the tremendous cruelty of the savage glandelinians had lamented the slaughter of their playmates such sorrow and weeping being seen generally in the slave houses.

Numbers of the children per hour had died of sorrow alone and misery over the massacre of their parents and relatives. In this vicinity every single resident or school house were in various degrees of terrible ruins. Every street in this district had literally been made impassable with dead corpses by the glandelinians, the dead mangled bodies being found here by the thousands. In a big school building two hundred crushed bodies of little children, and even their christian teachers had been seen by Evans and these had been so badly mangled that most of them were completely unrecognizable and twenty nine of them were found lying in crushed pieces. A great big convent, called St. Anne one of the strongest buildings in Julio Gallio had also been totally destroyed by the rascally glandelinians who in its blasting with many sticks of dynamite had leveled it to its foundation leaving nothing to it but immense mounds of bricks mortar and timbers. Even the roof of the church near the convent was totally wrecked, the entire roof having been torn to shreds and the huge building itself had been razed to its foundation in many parts. All the windows had been stoned out of the walls had been crushed in the rest displaced and hundreds of thousands of tons of debris surrounded the ruined buildings. Where the walls had been skinned off all the rooms with the beds and mangled inmates were exposed to view. Thousands of women and children had been stripped to pieces here and left exposed among the wreckage by the glandelinians, and so horribly crushed were another children that they had come apart intestines and all when lifted from the wreckage. Indeed in their rage the glandelinians had left an awe inspiring conglomerate of tangled wreckage out of the houses they had so ruthlessly damaged. On St. Anne avenue whole blocks of two buildings had also by the fury been razed to the total ruins many having been swept clean to their foundation. The ruins of St. Anne's hospital was exceedingly remarkable. By absent of dynamite the entire roof had been blown off and lay in wreckage about two hundred yards away, while all the windows on both sides had been shattered by the enraged rabble and with cannon fire, all the walls being badly shaken by the shell explosions and great parts of them torn away and great heaps of ruins dumped along. This whole region was indeed a horrible appearance of ruin and desolation. Thirty thousand had been hanging on crosses and every house on both sides of this street no matter what size had been by the glandelinians in blasting torn down to their very foundations, and windrows upon windrows of wreckage six or seven feet high packed up all the beautiful winding graceful driveways and boulevards.

In these boulevards the glandelinians had committed some of the worse massacres, for here the heaviest loss of lives among the children had occurred.

One single convent in this street had been razed into a hundred remarkable ruins as if it had been torn to pieces by a ton of Nitro Glycerine, and before they destroyed the building which was also riven into big sections the glandelinians had made prisoners of all the inmates and enslaved them to death. In deed this building was sure surrounded by debris three stories high, the mangled bodies of nuns had been seen nailed to crosses near by, even hundreds of children crushed until their intestines protruded were also nailed to crosses. Ten thousand had been massacred here in which three thousand three hundred fifty were nuns were nuns, priests, and women and children. This whole district of buildings for miles had been fairly blown to pieces for miles and scattered into a level mass of wreckage by the glandelinians. Factories of all kinds even with Catholic goods however had been spared but the Catholic articles had been damaged and some factories not fit to be used as slave houses were reduced to ramshackle ruins or set on fire. Fifty dead bodies of children had been found in one of the ruined factories, and about one hundred and fifty crippled children found in various parts of the city had been transferred to the houses of doom.

One big school house was leveled to the ground because the glandelinians could not make use of it and was left in remarkable but terrible ruins. Before wrecking the building the glandelinians had forced their way into the school among the terrified children and all pretty ones counted as defectives were slain. Five teachers who had tried to show resistance had been killed and nine hundred fifty nine children had been lined up for inspection, the homely looking ones were parted from the pretty ones and then the glandelinians like a raving mob commenced a massacre, crushing the heads of the children, smashing their arms and tearing the insides out of every one of them and lacerating their throats so badly that the interior was exposed. When the destruction to the building was completed it looked as if it had been shattered by shell fire, all the floors being crushed into kindling wood and all the massacred victims left buried beneath the tons of wreckage. All the interior of the building had been left an mass of indescribable wreckage. Some other buildings near the school had been cut into immense pieces, where in all the upper stories all the beds and rooms had been exposed, the tons of wreckage having been dumped into the streets. The glandelinians had even razed whole blocks of buildings with their explosives and the of San saint Marias had been horribly damaged by fire. Five entire sections of the beautiful building had been also razed and it was possible for any one to see through the structure. Even here appalling numbers of children injured or mangled with their religious attendants had been horribly crucified, because found unable to work in the slave houses. The scenes of these miseries and horror had exceeded all description. Nothing for days had been heard but the sighs, groans, shrieks, moans, and screams of the crucified victims.

And no one could have taken a step anywhere without the possibility of treading on the mutilated bodies on the ground and intestines in the intestines lay every where. Even hundreds of mothers had been seen with their mangled and bleeding bodies of children crucified, and even to the richly dressed, hundreds of priests, gentlemen and merchants, had been driven to the slave houses. Many of the children who had been cruelly crucified had their bodies crushed by the glandelinians and all their intestines protruding. Five little girls had been seen with their bellies or bodies opened wide on the co co co co and even hundreds of frightfully injured children crying out in vain for succor had been crucified like the rest.

The glandelinians had ravaged certain parts of the big city with terrible fires, which had been especially among most of the wrecked buildings, and these blazes had at times made a light so bright, that hell with its sea of fire had seemed to break loose. Without exaggeration the glandelinians had set a hundred different fires in the city and it consumed everything of the best value to the horrified inhabitants and the whole wrecked portion of the city had appeared in a blaze which made such brightness that the glow was seen for a hundred miles away from the city itself. Though the glandelinians had set fire in a hundred different portions of the city at once they had seen to it that it burned very slowly, and if it had not been for the pluck of the glandelinians who fought the very fires that made themselves, to confine it only to the ruins, the fire would have formed a general conflagration among even the still standing forests in the valleys. All the prisoners had stood by in silent grief which was only interrupted by the shrieks and wails of the men being crucified on the gallies. Angels and Saints for aid. In fact all the scenes of horror could not be correctly described, and wherever prisoners were found, there was nothing heard but sighs, groans, whimpers, weeping, and lamentations. A pretty little girl whose name was Francis Dolores Schmidt was picked up from the wreck wreckage of a house with a leg so badly crushed that amputation would have been necessary, but even in that condition the glandelinians had crucified her.

In the meantime learning that three of his daughters were falling fast general Vivian was alarmed and decided that if they died or anything else happened he would at once give up the Julio Callio campaign and return to Angelina and retire from the war and allow the foe to have full sway, for just now he felt that he on account of the condition of his daughters did not care a darn about the children in Julio Callio. Recently during Evans' stay in Julio Callio General Vivian had been after receiving fresh forces to refill his sadly depleted army had been in action with Huebman Manley at Francis Alicia who had managed to rush in like a furious cyclone and bar his advance. General Vivian all the time that the battle was raging had felt a foreboding of evil and as he watched the frightful slaughter of his divisions of men his eyes were filled with tears. It is not worth while to explain fully how the fury and violence of the battle progressed, but I may say that Brigano and Zangustopolis together did not look as bad. The ground in front of the christian works was fairly smeared in mangled bodies of glandelinian and christian soldiers combined, and one surge after another of the glandelinians had successfully swept over this sea of dead and bodies and crushed the christian line, only to be repulsed with damnable slaughter.

However an hour after the battle when it was won by the Angelinians general Vivian had gone to the hospital to see his daughters and find out how they were getting along. In the hospital general Vivian met the doctor himself.

"One of your daughters alone shows relief from her terrible sufferings now," he said. "But just the same I fear she is going to die, so I think it you had better come quickly before she goes."

In a few minutes general Vivian entered the room where the frightfully mangled figures lay. Catherine along was sinking and general Vivian remembered with a pang the beautiful singing of the Vivian girls. How sweet the child tones as they had for the army masses sang the beautiful hymns. Many times general Vivian had stood quiet and listened in emotion. How little did he and Hanson ever imagine that it would be the last hymns that they may ever sing and it would probably be several more days that three of them may soon be with the celestial ones.

Never again would he hear those celestial like voices in the beautiful hymns around the sweet test echoes of their voices, unless by the mercy of God they hear it among the angels. His very soul had been touched as he had heard the words of his little children unconscious probably far away to a earth, but when the sweet little children had reached the last verses, every single word which had fallen on his sharp ears with distinctness that had been so awfully strange, he had been moved to tears.

When general Vivian stood by Catherine had she opened opened her eyes:

"Papa I have a strange feeling that God may have mercy on me and my sisters, and-----" At a sudden a terrible spasm of almost mortal agony overtook her, and her father whose kind face bent over the little sufferer did his best to relieve her of her terrible plight, but alas his desperate efforts were certainly useless. Angelina alone was not quite so miserable any more, and she spoke to general Vivian:

"I'm going to do all I can with the help of Jesus and my friends in heaven to get well but I hope my dear papa, will stay good so that we will see each other in heaven."

Angelina then with a wistful smile on her face dropped her golden head on the pillow seeming to be brightly transfixed. The sight was enough to startle anyone and unable to bear it general Vivian dropped on his knees and sobbed like a child. Violet had tried to sit up when he sobbed, but suffering pains from the efforts she lay still.

"Papa I was some of the bandages taken off, A good deal of it."

She said:

The wounded child tried to rise but the efforts only brought excruciating pain and shaking down her long golden hair she said rather painfully:

"I just want some of the aboriginal bandages taken off. There is too much of it and it only makes me suffer more."

"The doctor is the only one who allows it to be done," said general Vivian.

"But doctor take care when you remove them and do not take off any more than is necessary, as you know the wounds must be covered. Oh God I fear she is disfigured."

"Oh papa," said Violet sadly.

"Yes and I have lost all now," said general Vivian gloomily.

"And I wanted you to remain so beautiful against the time we go out west again to Abbiennia. But now one of you, a girl of you may die at any time and if not dying be disfigured for life and we even blind. I do not even believe that you and all my daughters are wounded mortally. I even in fact that any one will believe it so for I positively know it is true."

General Vivian closed his lips and stood gloomily eyeing the once so beautiful figures, who though beauty was separated from their body was still on their souls.

"It is just what I have been forboding," said general Vivian to himself. "It is just what has been preying on my mind from hour to hour bringing me even down to the grave though no one sees me care. I have seen this long. Since the fatal tragedy at Brigano I have not had any luck since."

Violet indeed felt and appreciated the difference between their father and Hanson who knelt by her bed. Her strength as he knew was fast fading away and he feared that if his daughters were able to live with these cruel wounds they would be disfigured for life and also blind. Angelina alone as proof showed was the only one not blind.

"There is some thing I want to say and do that I ought to do, and you must be willing to have me speak," said Angelina. "It must come now. There is no putting it off. Do be willing that I should speak now."

"My dear little girl, I am willing," said general Vivian covering his eyes with one hand, and holding Angelina's hand with the other.

"Then I want to see all your general together who can come. Have some things I must say to them," said Angelina.

General Vivian dispatched a messenger and soon a large number of officers were there including general master Johnston. Poor little Evangelina lay back on her pillow, her beautiful hair hanging loosely about her face her crimson cheeks contrasting painfully, with the intense whiteness of her complexion and the thin contour of her limbs and features, and large soul like eyes "fixed on everyone of the christian generals. Indeed all the generals were struck with sudden emotion.

The spit spiritual face, her long locks of golden hair, the condition of her sisters, her father's aged face, and the sob of her sufferings sisters struck at once upon the feelings of the sensitive and impressionable Christian officers, and they looked at one another, sighed, and shook their heads sadly, while their eyes were a flash in their eyes, as they thought who was really responsible for it. There was a deep silence like that of the grave. As Evangeline raised herself and looked long and earnestly at every officer general, who looked sad and apprehensive, many who put their faces in their hands and sobbed.

"My dear friends I have sent for you all, because I have always loved you, and I have something to say to you, which I want you to remember always. I fear I and my sisters will be sadly disfigured for life and you will even probably never see us any more for papa-----39"

Here Evangeline was interrupted by bursts, of groans, sobs, and lamentations which broke from all present and in which her slender voice was lost entirely. She waited a moment and then speaking in a tone that checked the sobs of all she said:

"If you generals love me you must not interrupt me so. Listen to what I say. I want to speak to you about my sisters. Some of you were very careless I'm afraid about what the enemy do. You are in danger for you all know that God proclaimed it a sacrilegious deed to leave us in harm's way when we could have been carried off or injured, and one of those things happened as you see. I want you generals to remember that we were no once more beset a fearful and useless than any one else serving Abbeinnia and so our peril means death to you all as much as to me. But if you want to save your selves you must unite in a desperate effort to capture Francis Anna and rescue all the poor children who are suffering worse than I and my sisters did over there and in Julio Gallo or, some. You must remember that each one of you, had or have a little child of your own, and how it would feel to have them in the clutches of the brutal Mandolinians. If you want to help us recover you must also pray to God as to ask his aid in rescuing the little children. You must also-----"

The child checked herself, looked pitifully at them and said sorrowfully:-----

"Oh dear if you only could find Evans." And she hid her face in her pillow and sobbed as if her heart would break, while many a motherly sob came from the general's she was addressing, who were kneeling around her and her sisters.

"Never mind." She said raising her face and smiling brightly through her tears. "I have prayed to Jesus to cause Evans to come back to me, and have also prayed to Jesus to help you find him. Try to do all the best you can, pray as every day, ask him to help you and you will succeed."

"Amen." Was the murmured response, from the lips of Roswell, Buster Johnston and some of the other generals. The Christian generals were completely overcome and were sobbing with their heads bowed upon their knees.

"I know." Said Evangeline, "You all love me and my sisters."

"O yes, yes oh indeed we do." Was the response of all the generals simultaneously.

"Yes I know you do. There is not one of you generals that haven't been always kind to me and my sisters, and I want to give you something that when you look at it think that I and my sisters love you, and in case you find Evans give him one also and tell him that I'm going to Abbeinnia with my sisters when we get well, and that I want to see him there."

It was utterly impossible to describe the heartrending scenes, as with tears and sobs they gathered around the saintly child, and took from their hands what was to many of them a last mark of her love for these officers never saw the war though. They fell on their knees and kissed the hem of her garments, and the generals poured forth words of endearment, mingled with prayers and blessings. As each of one took their gift apprehensive of the effect of all the excitement on the little one, her father signed to each one to pass quietly out of the ward. At last all were gone except general and Vivian and Roswell Buster Johnston.

"Here Roswell is a beautiful one for you." Oh I'm so happy Roswell to think that I have seen you for the second time. And my dear kind papa.-----She added fondly. "I know you won't back out now. Lay siege to Julio Gallo for my sake."

"Oh dear Evangeline I don't see how we can do it, when we are discouraged over your condition, and that of your sisters." Said general Vivian. "It is just like taking everything off the place at once to see my only ones disfigured." And general Vivian gave way to a piteous passion of weeping. Roswell, Buster Johnston himself was wiping away many tears of his own. General Vivian had been sitting during the whole time with his hand shadowing his eyes and when all was gone he sat so still.

He stayed with his mangled ones for an hour and it already being toward evening general Vivian still sitting by her bed was startled by Angelina calling him.

"Papa." Said Evangeline gently laying her hand in his.

He gave a sudden start and shiver but made no answer.

"Dear papa." Said Evangeline.

"I cannot." Said general Vivian rising, "I cannot have it so I won't stand it. It is too much. Oh"

THE REAL TORTURE THAT THE VIVIAN GIRLS WENT THROUGH.

The next morning Vivian and her sisters were still suffering terribly, and general Vivian was doing his best to comfort them when general Rudolph came in.

"Your excellency those are the mangled saints?" He asked.

He took off his hat as he halted and gave a salute.

"O yes." Answered general Vivian in a surly manner. "Why?"

"It was sad news for you general. You know the guardian of your little girls do you not?"

"Yes." Answered general Vivian going growing pale. "Has anything happened to them?"

"The general hesitated fearing the news would be too much for the little girls. But the little girls realized what the news was.

"He is killed." She gasped.

"That is what I heard." Answered the general. "He was taken prisoner by the Mandolinians in Julio Gallo when trying to make away with the little girl called Francis Millian, and that he had been shot as a spy. I was very loath to tell you little girls or your father, but it had better to come from me than from some other person."

Vivian and her sisters were shocked at the news and burst into tears.

"We the poor little girls never going to be happy!"

"Oh don't tell me he is dead." Wailed Jennie. "Oh my darling Evans will I never see him again?"

General Vivian could not check their wild grief. The news had literally broken their hearts and they were wild with grief. This in deed had been above to the little girls but by the frightful battle of Gloria Francis had been a man then news had reported anyway been deprived of their brothers and best friends, and now Evans was gone and they themselves mangled and crippled, disfigured, and blinded for life. It seemed as if it was more than they could bear. Rudolph could not stand the sight of their wild grief and tears came to his eyes as he had never seen children in such distress before, and not being able to stand it he left the room. A few minutes after general Vivian left the room one of the red cross nurses found the poor little girls unconscious. She immediately sent another nurse to bring the doctor or somebody. In a few minutes a two orderlies came dashing up.

"The children have swooned." Cried the nurse. "I'll go and fetch general Vivian."

Another nurse quickly appeared and a alarmed look on her face.

"The poor little girls have only fainted." Said the red cross nurse who first found them. Sorrow over the death of their friend Evans caused them to swoon. One of the orderlies has already gone to summon general Vivian to come."

He pale face nurse bent over Vivian with a glass of water.

"I would not do anything, until general Vivian comes." Warned the nurse. In a few minutes general Vivian came in with general Russell. No sooner had he brought the little girls to their senses than in came general Roswell Buster Johnston.

"Your excellency." He cried, "Do you know what has happened?"

"No." Answered general Vivian.

"Your right wing has been torn to pieces, by a sudden fearful onslaught of the Mandolinians. The loss in life is already something fearful. I tried to get fresh forces to concentrate on the Jennie Wren own gun but cannot check the fearful headlong onrush of the enemy, and all our officers are down. If something ain't done soon the enemy will swarm here, and it will be all up with your daughters."

"Good God." Gasped general Vivian. "My daughters. Can't we try the wireless?"

"I have done that but I can't get no answer and I believe the wireless stations are in the hands of the enemy."

"Oh papa don't you dare go there." Shrieked Jennie at this alarming news.

"You will be killed."

Her sisters broke in a piteous fit of weeping.

"We simply have got to do something to check them some way." Said general Russell desperately. "Oh God, God I fear the worse has happened. How did you find out the news?"

"A reporter just came from there." Said Roswell Puster Johnston. "Our strongest wing is a mass of panic stricken hordes." All morning long the two generals tried frantically to check the foe's furio advance but in vain the battle was totally a landelinian victory. Four hours had passed and though the little girls had come to the their senses they seemed to be sinking lower and lower, and the doctor having attended to them at this moment came to Robert Vivian who had returned in despair and distress and said:

"My friend you have got to find some way to have them stopped for if the foe comes here your daughters will surely die. We have got to stop those landelinians."

"But how can we?" General Puster Vivian turning suddenly upon him while Roswell Puster Johnston remained silent. Hundreds of my officers are down the fields are anarchy with the victorious enemy who are advancing like an irresistible tornado through a corn field, and it is impossible to approach the firing line. The battle then roars like another Cedernine."

It indeed was puzzling to them all. "Your little girls had better be moved then to St Anne stockades for better shelter." Said the doctor and Roswell together.

"But it seems impossible no the snow fields are almost impassable." Said Roswell. "There is a doctor there also who could probably fix the little girls up so they won't be disfigured, crippled or blind for life. This poor doctor cannot do it alone."

"We have got to get them there somehow." Said general Vivian. "I believe we could check the enemy though in time, though it is slow progress."

"No it cannot be done." Said Roswell. "The battle is du surely lost."

For Violet and her sisters. How they all suffered from their frightful injuries. When she had been picked up Jennie's whole leg had been found covered with blood and even her foot her pretty little foot had been found severely mangled. All of the little girls were brave but their suffering was intolerable, excruciating, and when Jennie had been picked up she could not help giving a scream.

"Oh please be careful. My leg is broken."

At this the man had lifted her as gently as possible and carried her where she lay now. The surgeon had examined every one of the mangled little girls and as stated before they had declared it to be serious injuries and that even an operation would have to be performed on them all which could not be performed without the help of two other doctors. And that if no operation was performed within half an hour, nothing whatever would prevent their deaths. He pitted the lit poor little girls and as they had been so unnaturally prettily he could not help loving them. He had made a full examination of the little girls, each having broken legs and arms, and they had suffered excruciating pain as they first lay there after recovering, and suffered worse after the operation operation and still worse during the operation. It unfortunately however had been more than a half an hour before four other doctors had come and the operation of the little girls who received no sleep medicines as none could be had, had lasted four hours on each one singly I mean, and not all combined, seven doctors having performed the operations of them all at the same time, and their sufferings during the operations was like the tortures of the damned, but not as could the little girls utter, though they offered their horrible agony to God, who was looking down on German and his bands of landelinians with an anger that was terrible to imagine. German lay our doom will soon come.

For three days after the operations so severe was their misery that every sound had made them wince and moan. Violet had been in a bad fix, a crushed leg and foot, two broken arms, scarred and mangled face, and cuts and bruises and slashes all over her body.

All the patients in the ward being children pitted them, admired their bravery, though they knew indeed how intense was their suffering. One of the little girls narrowly escaped an amputation of two legs and one arm, and had cried, and moaned for days in terrible agony. This was poor Evangeline. Indeed now the little girls realized the horrors of war, and the misery and sorrow caused by it. When ever the thought of it came to them they shivered and vowed they would never go near a battle field again not even within hearing of it. They even imagined they still heard the noise of the battle of Brigano and the ear-splitting destruction caused by noise of the battle of Brigano and the ear-splitting destruction caused by the landelinian cannonade, when in fact it was the battle now raging which they heard, and which the enemy were really winning.

Today when Evans disappeared a soldier had come in followed by a sister whose name was in a sibling.

"I believe you know these pretty little children." The soldier had said to her. "They are severely wounded, and not only are they disfigured for life and suffering the loss of their brothers and dearest friends, including their guardian Jack Evans but their sight as well."

The Holy woman who was sister Angelina their old friend had walked quietly to the white cots, the soldier making a bow as he left.

"Too bad. Too bad." The sister had said sadly. "I wish that you dear little girls had not remained in this region of terrible war."

Violet had tried to answer and so had her sisters but tears had come to their arm eyes and their lips had quivered vehemently.

"Don't try to speak." The sister had said kindly. "I know how much you little girls are suffering."

Violet had taken the sister's hand and held it fast. The sister's presence had seemed to cheer her and her sisters and her painful expression had made the sister realize that Violet and her sisters had wished her to remain. The poor little girls as they laid there looked like injured angels. Their hair were all in curls, half wrapped in bandages, and the sight of them in that condition made the good sister cry.

Recovering the sister said:

"Violet, you and your sisters are brave little girls. I never thought you had such daring in you when I first knew you, and you poor little girls have looked as timid as if you knew nothing but dread. You bear your injuries and misery so patiently that sure surely the good God won't allow you and your sisters the horrible sorrow of being disfigured, blind and crippled for life. How did you little girls get hurt so badly?"

"We ran into what exploded by the landelinians." Was Violet's answer.

Indeed to the little girls it had that a day so mad as if the world was wounded. Such moaning sobs and cries, from wounded soldiers brought past the hospital. Indeed it seemed to be heard everywhere though now general Vivian was gaining ground again in this horrible battle. Sister Angelina felt sorry for poor Violet and her sisters. She realized how bad their injuries were, and she wondered herself if they would ever be able to walk again. And what had really happened to their good guardian Jack Evans? Had he shared the same fate or worse? And my how loud the hiss of the snow blowing from the roof was. Would it never cease? And horrible was the roaring thunder of the distant battle. She looked long at Violet and her sisters who who resembled beautiful celestial creatures, with beautiful long hair which had been so curled so beautifully the day before the fatal accident.

The day of the Alice struggle the little girls had showed some slight improvement, but sister Angelina was not there. General Rudolph Rassendale, had been in to see the little girls and so had general Harry Thorndale. He had come to know them since the Cedernine and Glorinia Francis disasters and now when he had seen them prostrated with their injuries he felt sad. It was Rudolph who had intended to move the little girls to St Anne Stockade as soon as possible though just now it did not seem necessary as the enemy was giving way.

General Vivian had returned at this moment and was surprised to see Thorndale.

"How in the world did your army escape in the disaster this morning?"

Asked general Vivian. "I heard you were killed."

"God alone knows." Said Thorndale. "My whole line was caught in a regular maelstrom of slaughter, but I held my own until the enemy despite their surrounding was outflanked by another Christian force and routed. How are your little daughters now?"

"They are still in a bad condition." Said general Vivian. "They

They all had a narrow escape from instant death, and all except poor Angelina had their eyes almost gouged out. They seem to be improving but tremendously slow."

Thorndale stepped to Angelina. "Ed."

"How are you little dear?" He asked.

"I feel better already, but I am very weak." Said Evangeline. "The doctor says that I'll soon be able to see out of my wounded eye. My hand feet are still sore and though I may be able to sit up in a few days, I may never be able to walk."

"I'm sorry to hear of your misfortune." Said Rassendale himself.

"We ourselves had a narrow escape during the battle to day which we finally won. The enemy struck out side our lines with all his tremendous force, but we cut him to pieces."

454

"Did the Angelinians do as much damage during the onslaught as I hear?" Asked general Vivian. "I hear that the Angelinians damaged one of our wings."

"That wing was almost wiped out," Answered Thordale. "The Christian columns tried to hold, but to the enemy's fire tore every Christian division that opposed their assault to pieces. My line relieved the enemy's whole center. The loss of life is more appalling than at Briganco."

"Good God," Gasped general Vivian. "How many were killed?"

"I can't ascertain," Said Thordale. "The furious onslaught struck the crushed wing without warning. I hardly could get aid as the enemy assaulting my line had extended his line to such great extent that the Angelinians almost surrounded my army. The destruction was really worse throughout your right wing. Some of the works are buried in the bodies of the slain. So furious was the battle that it had seemed as if hell had changed places with the earth, so fearful was the clamor, and the various red color colors in the sky. General Garance's army was annihilated and he is in the hospital wounded."

"Well I'm glad that Violet and her sisters escaped the threatening danger from the at first successful enemy," Said general Vivian. "The poor little girls have suffered terribly for these past weeks as their injuries are dangerous. Their wounds are almost mortal, every one of them being badly mangled by the great explosion, and maybe helpless for many months. I myself had a narrow escape from serious injury yesterday when my horse losing a shoe while on full gallop fell and threw me."

Thordale bent over little Evangeline....

"How did you get caught by the mine?" Mike asked. "Was it too quick for you?"

"We did not know the ground was mine," Said Angeline. "We were surprised before we were aware of the existence of the mine. The house was blown or torn to pieces, without my being able to get away, and was almost buried in wreckage with my sisters, and indeed I thought it was the end of us."

"Who took you from the wreckage?"

"O I do not know," Said Angeline. "I must have been knocked to sleep as a heavy beam gave me an awful blow on the head as it was sent flying through the air by the force of the explosion. My wounds, and those of my sisters were considered fatal."

"It certainly has been some battle to day," Said Thordale. "It was a hundred times worse than any I have ever seen before. It lasted about near six hours all day long."

"Did you have much trouble in driving the enemy back after the reinforcements came?" Asked general Vivian. "You told me an awful number of you men were slain."

"No sir," Answered general Thordale. "The reinforcements happened to be a large force of Christian cavalry about one hundred and thirty squadrons, and these charged like a roaring avalanche, cutting the enemy's lines which surrounded us to pieces, and routed the survivors."

MANLEY ATTEMPT'S TO RAISE THE SIEGE OF FRANCIS-AT LANTA..... THE RESULT. JANUARY 17TH... 1911

Three weeks more had passed since the Vivian girls had been injured and general Vivian for revenge had made a vigorous advance laying siege to the large city of Francis-Atlanta, which was held by the famous Manley's armies..... General Johnston Jackson Manley himself was impatient over the length of the siege, which was already many weeks since the battle of Briganco and inspired by the preaching of his councillors, and the apparent destruction of the poor Vivian girls decided to raise the siege himself, by going to his sons rescue and waging another terrible battle.

He had advanced large forces upon Repon Maria Lanta, which the Christians there had abandoned after fighting with the fury of millions of mad dogs in which inconceivable losses were suffered by the enemy alone, a dearly bought victory for Manley. His battle occurred on December 31st.

7-126

General Vivian who had taken Hanson's place the request of his brother to lead for a while in his stead, was still broken hearted over the loss of his best troops at Briganco, and over the disaster to Hanson's at Francis, and of the injury of the Vivian girls and now was in a mood to stand any further nonsense from either his wicked brother, who had been responsible for all the recent horrors or the Manleys, and decided to prevent Germania from rejoining Manley at all costs.

Manley himself had taken possession of Repon, but on the afternoon of that day general Vivian came up with his forces, and Manley soon found himself hurrying off faster than he had come in with nearly sixteen million one hundred thousand of his men as prisoners. Of course the sudden blow angered him, but Manley for a time did nothing while in the meanwhile general Ebellina Tamerline disheartened by the outcome of the battle of Little Florida Francis Anna, had did all in his power to gather a large army and was succeeding. Even yet on the side of the enemy general Calmanina Shoenannan was appalled over the Julio Gallo horrors was not in favor of Manley any more, but nevertheless wicked Manley to try and daunt this glorious Angelinian general placed general Raymond Richardson in the main command of his army. Manley on the following day before the advance for Francis Atlanta held a public speech but most of the things said during the speech would probably cause God to strike me dead if I wrote it. In the speech he blasphemed God most shockingly and had even challenged him to come down from heaven with all his angels and fight him and his army.

In the meantime however general Vivian having no time whatever in the horror of the Julio Gallo situation, had went off with Vivian and Wienstien to the north to hurry on the Christian officers with their newly formed armies to move forward and strike again against Vivian Wickey. General Hanson had received a note from general Francis Vivian two days later which to the joy of all predicted that he was advancing armies with Zimmermann to strike Vivian Wickey simultaneously and moving against the foe near the location of Logan-Zoe-Rue-Run.

Evans still wounded in the Julio Gallo hospital had known of the coming hell storm long before this having discovered the true identification long before, and was anxious to get out of Julio Gallo with the child before the city would be blasted to destruction by the terrific fire of the Christian guns. Manley himself learning of the truth, despite his boasts, and defying God to come down and fight his wicked army was scared. He had believed that his most dangerous foes, the Calvinians had been facing Julio Gallo, but when he learned that general Vivian was advancing large armies under Shuemaucherd Wienstien with the famous Vivian and Zimmermann upon Vivian Wickey and Logan-Zoe-Rue-Run he became alarmed. Federal himself had been excited to the highest pitch, by Manley's recent speech and afraid that Manley was delaying too long decided to justify the prediction by making a desperate assault upon Hanson's lines now confronting him, to forcibly raise the siege of Francis Atlanta which was so surrounded by general Ricknell's Calvinians.

During the siege of Francis Atlanta the famous Manley's lines extended far in front of general Vivian's superior forces, to the extreme left of the Lanta Hills, through the Franciscan plains, added by a long line of formidable field fortifications, including many closed forts and batteries, defended by hills, ditches, earthworks, and protected by every device in the way of obstruction, slash slashed forests, abatis, and including many chains of the most destructive cannon. Huetaum Manley was so confident in the strength of his armies but wished his father to hurry up in his advance.

Manley however arrived, and came into collision with general Hanson's right wing concentrating toward Lanta.

THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF ILLENIA.

Stanislawa's mighty force of Angelinians made a desultory onslaught which finally became general and though the plunging fire from the Angelinian batteries had become annihilating, larger forces of the foe advancing by blasting their way through the Angelinian defenses with terrific gun fire of their own covering batteries moved swiftly forward in a driving attack, upon the center of the wing, annihilating Mc-Hollister Shuemauchers right wing, capturing three hundred thousand men but failing to capture three hundred guns which were fired again and again during the whole Angelinian retreat. In the meantime new batteries of Christian artillery had been brought up, and general Rookie's Angelinian divisions making a most frightful onslaught on the left of Shuemauchers line were shelled to pieces and driven back with the most heavy losses. The Christian artillery men also silenced some of the Glandelinian batteries which had been keeping up a most spasmodic hammering during nearly the whole time doing incapable damage. The direct attack of the Glandelinians on Vivian's lines had been made at the same time but after suffering mutual losses not worth describing, the Glandelinian forces were stormed back and shattered and broken, McHollister, Silverbell and Vivian being killed and their Glandelinian divisions reduced to fragments. McDonalds impregnable position was also desperately assaulted and amid slaughter that startled both sides, the Glandelinians were repulsed, and the Christians holding against terrific odds routed their assailants, capturing over four hundred thousand prisoners.

Glandelinian attacks on Percuans lines were also a failure, the Angelinians holding out heroically, their guns reducing the Glandelinian waves, firing the woods and the Glandelinians with the greatest difficulty extracted the greater part of their army from the trap into which they had fallen.

Thus ended this severe action as a Christian victory. In one of his statements after the frightful carnage at Arigano, General Vivian had declared that despite the public announcement of the Glandelinian preparedness to fight till the end, at Julio Gallo were in reality tiring of the war and already to talk peace, based on the growing conviction in official circles that the Glandelinians have about reached the end of their string so far as offensive movement were concerned. His view point was that Glandelinia had been dealt a blow at little Gloria.

Franciana that will nullify her offensive power for a long time, that General Johnston Jackson Manley realizes his inability to push the Christians out of the region of Julio Gallo which can be and will be forced by a Christian army of any size. That all the Glandelinian general generals defending Julio Gallo will have to be abandoning the city or be annihilated as they would expect no quarter for the treatment of the Christian children in the city. General Manley himself had declared that the safety of the city from the Calvinians and Angelinians was alone, Glandelinians only peace and that mighty Glandelinian whose cues is in the right, will win at a cost. Another week passed however before Manley started to work generally upon his plans. Then he sent word that was incoming and of many new divisions to try and make a breach toward Francis Atlanta Federal however, however knew the true conditions of general vanconias line and thought this a foolhardy task, but as he was ordered to do it, he prepared for the movement, gathering his whole command.

THE SECOND BATTLE OF ILLENIA.

Indeed Federal had a long advance to make and dreading that it would take a whole day to get there, decided to march by a short way and flank the Christian army situated there. It was about three hours later when the Glandelinians reached their destination and met a heavy force of Abbieannians and Angelinians under General Zeigler and Greatheart. Greatheart had in the meantime formed his divisions into immense squares and when the Glandelinians appeared he launched a sweeping attack which continued with unabated fury for three hours despite the awful losses that the Glandelinian fire inflicted. The Abbieannians and Angelinians during the fearful and onslaught came close to Federal's lines many times, but the desperate first line of gray coats had taken defense, in ravines and gullies and Greatheart found it impossible to force the Glandelinians from their position. His line of assault had already been broken into many parts, and elated over this fresh force of Glandelinians arriving to the assistance of those already attacked, swept fiercely upon the disordered Christian ranks and drove them into the greatest confusion. His whole line indeed was threatened with destruction, during the terrible counter charge of the frenzied Glandelinians, but Greatheart had noticed this threatening disaster, and threw forward fresh troops to repel the assaults. Indeed Greatheart's whole column had now received reinforcements and now again the fire along the enemy's line began to recede.

The Angelinians now started to pour down and after the retiring Glandelinian returning a fire so fierce that the multitudes of Glandelinians were seriously handicapped and before the fierce Christian advance fell back in confusion. Baldwin's batteries were being brought up during the meantime and these soon began to pour shells which burst in large explosive puffs and revealing terrible numbers of dead and wounded Glandelinians. Another

Along another portion of general Greatheart's line, the enemy had kept up marvelous activity, which had increased to a fearful carnage. Through all the lanes and made meadows, the enemy had attacked in fearful numbers, advancing with indescribable fury, and for a time did have everything going their own way. At this time ten thousand guns of Baldwin's batteries had been massed upon these advancing columns and roared in a series of most violent detonations which succeeded each other so rapidly as to produce almost a continuous roar.

Appalling was this charge of the enemy. The Glandelinians swarmed up against the massive Christian line in great columns, the Christian line soon becoming hidden in immense wreaths of smoke. Indeed the ravaging Christian fire was terrible, but with fierce and bold dashes the enemy came on, dashing toward the Christian line, plunging recklessly to their deaths like a monstrous pack of yelling gray demons. The Glandelinians swarmed upon the Christians only to be shot down in thousands. The carnage was now appalling. The left wing of the Christian force was shuddering violently from the impact of the Glandelinian onslaught, but nevertheless was standing firm, and met column after column, until their line was riven to fragments and the dead and wounded piled in heaps.

Then heavy with the weight of pressure the hard battling left wing was slowly bent backward and the assaults went headlong into them with crash and roar. But redoubled efforts soon checked the headlong sweep of the enemy, and though the Glandelinians seemed to borrow into the massive Christian column, hastily arriving reinforcements were flung viciously against the reinforcements.

....of the enemy too.

The many Glandelinian columns were jarred wildly, and general walters columns catching them on the left flank, forced them into confusion, and the next minute a whooping billow of Calvinians pounced upon their retiring center. Center, right along the whole length and the Glandelinians were borne along before the Angelinians, and Calvinians like the leaves before a screaming gale. It was at this moment that the large Christian force under Kindermine arrived and he pressed on after the retiring enemy while one of his cavalry divisions made a clean sweep of their flank. The whole gray line was not shattered, many ranks going down, Zeigler's big columns also rushed forward amid the ominous roar of musketry and rushed clean upon the mighty mass of Glandelinians who were trying to rally with a tremendous shock. The Glandelinians were now like a ship run aground but as they pressed on their line of retreat, more great columns of Angelinians caught them on the rear of their central line and hurled them foremost upon the bayonets of those of front, and the frenzied sweep of the Angelinians caused the Glandelinians to break into a frightful panic.

Every Christian column, every column as they came swooping down upon the rest of the retiring Glandelinians broke the line amid the roaring carnage, and rushing upon them like avalanches soon had them trotting full speed, their lines all broken up to pieces. The Christian Christian batteries to add to it all were roaring with increasing fury, the ponderous volleys of shells, exploding with ear-splitting crashes among the Glandelinians. The battle had raged furiously for six hours, and stretched away for four miles but now the great columns of Angelinians rushing on amid the thunderous tumult seemed to be carrying all before them, every Glandelinian column seemed to be fleeing the Angelinians crashing furiously upon their flanks. Federal however had seen this rout, and within another hour had massed Gandonias forces against the successful Christians, and so great was this new concentration of Glandelinians that it seemed as if the whole nation of the enemy was coming to the aid of their routed comrades. And here at last the battle swelled to its greatest fury. The great columns of the Glandelinians came rushing on like avalanches of human beings, and the thunderous roar of Glandelinian cannon that increased with redoubled fury, then the whole Glandelinian Glandelinian musketry and machine gun fire became general and so terrific was the slaughter among the Christian columns that it seemed as if they were facing a trillion rifle blasts the hundreds of shells in their shrieks making a noise like a screaming tornado.

Never before in this region was there such an uproar of cannon and musketry and the yelling of the Glandelinians was deafening. The very heavens seemed rent with the cannon fire and all the front ranks of the Angelinians dissolved like snow before a furnace. Whole regiments were shattered badly or crushed to fragments, the whole battle line of the fleeing Glandelinians with their fire. But during this Titan throes of battle, the whole of Federal's line was forced back, though far and wide along their whole line, their musketry still roared terribly. As Federal's columns were falling back the fire along the Glandelinian front soon began to slacken immediately, and their generals meeting on all sides disordered groups, were forced to order a general retreat. Other main columns were also falling back, and as they retired Federal fol followed last, but the christians attempted no pursuit. The firing gradually ceased altogether. All night long work was on ingathering the wounded and burying the dead. The losses on both sides had been incredible, and the main numbers were not yet known. So many trees were split and broken by the rushing shot and shell that the ground was strewn by their branches and the Lincolnian grounds or glens had hardly a tree standing, so many having been uprooted by shells or kanwed off by bullets from the indescribable firing of both sides. The heaviest losses of all in this conflict occurred here, as three immense Glandelinian divisions had been annihilated, over nine nine hundred and seventy two thousand having been killed or wounded.

.....WICKWELL IN ACTION.....

The next day the greater part of Manley's army seemed to have arrived as Leonia Meldonia Picknell concentrating upon Illenia, drew from a good part of Hanson's army a furious storming attack of the most violent ferocity. Indeed the Glandelinian boy scouts had warned the Glandelinian officers of the approaching christian columns, and the enemy's front supported by batteries seemed as if suddenly swept by sheeted flame, and following the cannoning roar of artillery, a very storm of shells crashed heavily among the christian columns, wiping out whole companies. The christian columns continued to press on with swift and intolerable fury, and as the Glandelinians let loose with their machine guns the christians seemed swallowed up in the smoke of canister.

The Angelinians were now coming nearer and nearer despite the fearful volleys that poured fast the Angelinians advancing with a fury that startled the Glandelinians. One column after another of the christians was torn to flying fragments by the stream or barrage of exploding Glandelinian shells, tearing along the enemy's lines becoming annihilating.

Tearing many columns to pieces, and as the christian advance still continued the torrents of shells and grape came faster added with musketry fire the discharge of arms along the whole of the enemy's line assuming its most deadly and destructive fury, increasing the carnage which rendered more fearful the christian losses. The cannon fire and the deafening up roar of musketry now became more and more frightful fairly heaping up the dead and wounded christians. Every column exposed to this fire melted to a thousand fragments. Hundreds of thousands upon hundreds of thousands of Angelinians and Calvinians neared the enemy's work held by Adelsdegarbes fierce Glandelinians Glandelinians and as they poured over the Glandelinians vainly strove to make themselves as immovable as rocks and drive back their assailants.

There was now a frightful tumult of bayonets, pikes, musket and pistol pop pistol shots while in vain did the stubborn cannoners try to plow or cut them down as fast as they came but they could not check the christian onslaught. The big seemingly immovable surge of Glandelinians was only like a reef before the whirlwind. They only made a feeble barrier as the succeeding waves of purple coats had rushed forward like an avalanche of soldiers and the Glandelinians were soon forced to give way, the christians carrying all before them.

After this there was a lull lasting two hours, and then the Angelinians who had won this engagement beheld five large columns of Glandelinians consisting of Calman Shoemans ninth corps advancing at the double time, almost like a retreat while a thousand feet away was their commander urging them on.

This big force of Glandelinians had formed a line which reached as far as eyes could see, but in their awful advance they did not shift or waver and with every movement they looked frightfully ominous. Then from the direction of the enemy's batteries there suddenly broke the awful stupendous roar of cannon fire, which was simultaneously echoed back by the fiercer and sharper detonations of their canisters, and soon their whole line of batteries blazed forth with a most indescribable and intolerable uproar. This announced that the batteries were covering the Glandelinian columns rushing forward to make this general attack. The very earth under the feet of the christians shook from the concussion of the cannon fire which committed incalculable havoc among their lines, the shells blasting the christian lines horribly.

The large column of Glandelinian soldiers had now spread out into separate divisions and began to move forward with the fury of a frenzied multitude while now the whole christian line received a frightful shower of shells mingled with vast volleys of highpowdered explosive explosives which tore and mangled many of their most massive columns. Among all the bushes and trees fell that frightful shower of explosions in perfect torrents and as the Glandelinians were coming on like a monstrous tidal wave the Angelinians found themselves so utterly outnumbered that they did not any longer believe themselves safe, and as the enemy amid in the inferno of flame and uproar swarmed over the works, with high universal yells the christian commanders had to order a retreat, and the panic stricken Angelinians meeting an ear-splitting roar of the enemy's musketry fled without firing a single shot in return, leaving the works strewn ten feet deep with their own dead and wounded, dashing madly pressing furiously and crushing against each other.

Indeed the christian troops had broken into a frightful panic and in their blind precipitate retreat began to trample recklessly over the fallen, amid a volume of groans, prayers, and sudden shrieks and curses. From many avenues of trees enormous crowds of purple coats were vomiting forth as if fleeing from a tornado.

Many of the christian generals that this panic like retreat would mean a serious disaster, and tried frantically to rally them, while there was yet time, but the troops dreading annihilation from the showers of shells that still fell fast torrent upon torrent among their columns and added by grape and canister by the guns captured by the foe, rushed into ravines, narrow orchards, and into the woods seeking shelter. If any kind of protection from the awful terrors of the annihilating fire of the enemy while all the while Shoemans extensive line was seeming to grow mightier and larger. The left wing of the christian line though joining in the retreat was not in a panic, and tried twice to cover the retreat of the other columns while officer after officer continually raced up to Hanson's headquarters, crying again and again:

"The enemy. The enemy. They are beating us back. The christian armies are going to pieces."

Hanson and his whole staff knew of the threatening danger brought on by this furious advance of the enemy should they overlap his main right, and as the trampling rush of the scattered christian christians under Lieutenant general Wallen came into view he decided to withdraw and let the enemy have the field as further resistance at this point was useless.

Time. In a few minutes a goodly portion of Hanson's force was also rearing swiftly across the shell swept plain and even the fire of the Glandelinians as more christians cannon was captured had increased so rapidly that columns were torn to pieces in shameful numbers. The fire of the Glandelinian batteries had ceased to avoid shelling their own comrades. General Hanson's christian columns hastened onward, for already so fierce was the advance of the pursuing enemy, that the brave heroes of Christ with the ear-splitting detonation of shells shells shells among them could not rally a line, for line after line was torn to pieces not being able to contest a foot of ground with the enemy without annihilation. So fierce indeed was the enemy's advance that all the Angelinians were encompassed with doubt and horror. The retreat of the christian army was now complete. It was an awful day indeed. To increase the terrors of the panic first aroused by the frightful volleys of shells and shrapnell the Glandelinians began to catch up with Hanson Hanson's rearguard, and harass it with a murderous storm of volleys, that mowed down hundreds of ranks.

The whole Glandelinian column rushed forward with the fury of demons and full upon general general tetrahooks divisions, one of the fiercest of the Glandelinian columns consisting of the Mc-Hollistians and McHargolian curdes poured and mingled with the Angelinians in awful death struggles, capturing thousands of prisoners and routing and set so shooting down the survivors. Upon the whole of Hanson Hanson's columns the Glandelinians dashed the dead and wounded purple coats strewn the ground thickly for miles during the retreat.

One division of Omorian curdes, and McHargolians managed to pass a portion of Hanson's retreating force from a certain direction the Glandelinians pouring a murderous fire into the very faces of the christian soldiers. However it happened to be that the christian commander, general Francis

Francis Mc-Hollister had misunderstood Hanson's order to retreat, and so had failed to obey the order, and his line alone proved a barrier in the way of the advancing foe. The main overlapping column of Glandelinians came suddenly upon Mc-Hollister's lines, and such fierce resistance did the Glandelinians meet that the gray coats finally withdrew with their leaders generals McWhirther, Estabrook and Henry Wallen who were killed. The fire along McHollister's line had been fearful having mowed down thousands upon thousands of Glandelinians, and heaped up the dead and wounded in that centhing inferno. McHollister's right had in the meantime made a slow swinging movement and soon outnumbered by the new christian force, and almost surrounded with the shrieking shells from the christian guns, killing those thousands, the Glandelinians sought in vain to escape, howling among gaps in the solid christian line. Most of the christians who were first routed were now being supported by a thundering fire of a long chain of christian batteries, and all these panic stricken Angelinians who had been in danger of being dispersed were rallying under shelter of the thick clump of trees, almost half a mile away from the still-advancing foe. And here the sea of dead purple coats that met their eyes horrified them. Here and there the footprints of the fugitives crunched in the snow, all their faces were pale and haggard and as they retreated on, but more slowly and in order, they saw the blue glare of thousands of shells far to their rear among the advancing Glandelinian columns.

THE FEARFUL CRASH, AND HELLSH UPPOAR.

The enemy along Francis McHollister's front was now retiring in confusion, and though now the firing of musketry had ceased, the hellish explosions kept on thundering. All was still along McHollister's line, most of Hanson's retreating platoons being reinforced by a part of the main army and had now rallied, and now a strong barrier was presented to the advancing enemy. The awful columns of Glandelinians which had routed the Angelinians had now had now formed into a seemingly impenetrable surge of gray coated yelling demons and started again in their wild onrush.

Hanson's command had already reformed 8,300,000 of the routed men, but the resumption of the enemy's advance was so quick, that they could not completely rally the others, and so all those not rallied had to continue the retreat, under cover of the christian batteries, which was increasing their vivid and booming roar as more guns went into action.

The advance of the enemy was magnificent, the horrible fire of the christian batteries though it did awful havoc, could not check them in the least, and they fairly tore the air with their horrible "Devil yells," nor was the horrible beauty of all the advancing Glandelinian banners confined to the usual usual and awful hues of fire from burning houses near the battle lines of the opposing forces. All those varying and prodigal dyes of the opposing banners, no rainbow ever did yet get out rival. Many were a bright blue, prettier than the most azure depths of the southern skies. Others were of a livid and snake like green, and the rest like fields of flowers. Terrible torrents of shells were tearing through the advancing columns of Glandelinians making immense gaps all along the line and along the whole christian line there was no pause or slackening in the awful firing now.

The rumbling of far distant cannon could even be heard, and the roaring of Baldwin's batteries, mingled with the grinding and hissing screaming roar of the showers of shells and canister. Many times by the increasing severity of the increasing fury of the christian cannon fire, the solid line of gray coats were time and again torn into mimics of small jagged shapes, the broken portions seeming to stride fiercely in their herculean advance, fairly shaking and rending the air with their horrid devil yells, which resounded resoundingly frightfully bloodcurdling, setting up a general universal tumult.

Hundreds of volleys of shells exploding among them incessantly was now causing frightful decimation of their longest and deepest ranks and lines, and as the smoke spread, the mangled nearest columns seemed to vanish swiftly, only to reappear again in fresh numbers, and to the eyes of the christian cannoners the awful columns of this gigantic Glandelinian wave seemed like one monstrous surge of screeching yelling cursing and blaspheming demons advancing against heaven to contend for the every everlasting bliss once more, and the supremacy over God and his host.

A portion of Wallen's divisions unsupported by artillery was forced to retreat rapidly without striking the enemy a single blow, the enemy along this point not meeting any shells, advanced faster as they came on the Angelinians retreating swiftly without the proper protection which the main christian columns had been ordered to offer them.

During the second withdrawal of the christians the whole element of civilization seemed to be suddenly broken up and the firing which had threatened to become heavy before was not only slackened, but completely stopped. A rush of hundreds of thousands of christians swept past Hanson's, who was riding back and forth among his main columns, and realizing the danger was long before this, the great christian general had made preparations to make a desperate stand and was now slowly starting a concentration of millions of troops and ordering up thousands of machine guns to help the infantry repel this headlong charge of the foe.

Many hundreds of thousands of the defeated recoiling Angelinians, wearied, bewildered, and disappointed, passed along the pursuing enemy coming after them and spreading their lines. Suddenly the mighty and deafening noises from Baldwin's batteries seemed to gather in fury again and the hurst and awful roar of the fiery explosions of gang-gang-shells shook the ground and galled the enemy's surge horribly tearing immense avenues in their lines and shattering one division after another to fragments, and sweeping every thing before it. The surviving Glandelinians still sweeping forward came upon general Evans' lines.

"Fire," "Hans' command; "Give those screeching demons all the hell they want."

And there came a withering flash all a, along the line, followed by a roar like a million cannon, and the whole gray surge at this point went to pieces, and then the christian machine guns let go with a crash and roar of pop-pop-pop-pop-pop-pop-pop and then as the foe line seemed to draw to wither, Glandelinians reinforced divisions under general James Jentons were seen advancing to the aid of the retreating Angelinians columns in that fiery inferno, and then all was a crash and uproar of a screaming thundering hell of damnation, and then the storm broke loose with irresistible fury.

A large division of Glandelinians under general James Samuel Paltze, made a fearful onrush charge, and received not only a frightful storm of bullets and shells, but also a tempest of canister and graped shot which wiped out this whole force, and which shivered and shredded the other columns coming in succession behind it, the whole gray surge ten million strong going to fragments with ten generals down killed, but now the firing suddenly broke ing loose with the roar of hell along general Jack Hanson's line was suddenly intensified as a Maurice Costello moved with his main divisions and soon as his line was wreathed in smoke and flame, he received a severe wound and was borne from the field of battle, and as Hanson's newly formed lines also soon became generally active the firing soon became intense that the very heavens seemed to be in a deafening uproar and extending to Jentons' lines, with seemingly preternatural fury, caused it to drown out every other sound even the roar of exploding shells, going off as incessantly as rain drops on a roof in a downpour, even drowning out the loud and reverberating roar of Baldwin's batteries, the crash and uproar being horrible, but still the galled and torn up Glandelinian surges continued the rush toward the christian line, and now a most indescribable discharge of fire arms broke loose along other portions of the rash rallied christian line the noise of the firing swelled to a deafening uproar heard at Norm.

Down went the gray coats by multitudes and general Paltze and Gainsbury, were riddled with bullets. In many places the dead and wounded were already lying in windrows, and the showers of shells and canister which incessantly came from the christian machine guns and batteries, crashed down the massive Glandelinian columns bearing with their explosions puffy clouds of smoke and causing along the whole entire line of Omarians and Gargolians such havoc and ruin, that divisions of Glandelinians with their uniforms torn in shreds by the tempest of explosions became confused while more and more of the retreating christian columns began to be fully reformed and obstructed the enemy's passage, and now as the whole of the christian line was being reinforced the firing of musketry increased to terrifying fury. Along the plains to Hanson's left the line of gray coats was terribly thinned and many of their nearest columns had received full fire of shells, which drove them into solid confused masses, but the main jagged columns under Shewman continued to advance suddenly and fearfully, and now to add to this frightful carnage general Hanson's who had rallied the remainder of the retreating christian columns, in Gertrude's lanes, and several cowardly divisions in a large orchard, to the right, but here they could not retain their position as the inferno and the impetuous advance of the Glandelinians disconcerted them, and the sudden collision into which they came was doubly terrible, and they fell back encountering more of the enemy thousands on their right hurrying toward them yelling like demons.

"Cover the retreat of the still confused Angelinians," was Hanson's order.

as the front column of his line was being driven into fragments and causing great confusion. Like titans the two monstrous armies now contended with each other, and these were soon firing at each other so terribly and so madly that the carnage was spread far and wide. The whole of Jennings' line was still shrouded in smoke but the enemy now advancing in serpentine formed lines rushed swiftly on like an avalanche, then came the awful roar of new christian batteries, while along the whole front of the enemy there now seemed to flash a stupendous sheet of flame and smoke while simultaneously along the whole main christian line as from the very jaws of hell with a continuous exploding roar like a million cannon blowing to pieces rushed all at once thousands of desolating volleys. The ground shook beneath the constant contestants from the concussion and everywhere now there was a terrific uproar that seemed to tear asunder the very battle field. Along the whole of Ettrabrooks line a simultaneous crash of musketry sounded and whole masses and columns of Glandelinians were being rapidly swept away.

Amid the appalling uproar the solid line of the enemy was fairly riven and indeed on the side of the Glandelinians men were falling in more frightful numbers, in fact the whole main Glandelinian surge was threatened with dissolution. Yet the boldness of their continued advance surprised general Hanson and as the war assailants reached General Jennings' Anderson's divisions next, the scene of carnage increased to tenfold fury, and again the enemy's columns melted away. Everywhere now there was seen by the christian generals that the whole enemy's line was shattered into many fragments. Yet the enemy continued to advance coming on like avalanches of human beings opening a roaring furnace fire themselves as they drew within range but though the murderous christian fire darkened for an instant the spaces where columns dissolved they were gray again. One of the largest columns was already upon Jennings' line, while already along the whole christian line the firing had become general making almost an unearthly uproar and thunderous crash that caused Hanson to instinctively turn toward the spot and he beheld with his staff, two monstrous columns of his monstrous army extending as far as eye could reach, dissolve into a shroud of smoke and flame, the lines reappearing seemed to surge backwards and for weeks several times, then the christian columns shattered to fragments and were first and then retired, and over seventy million Glandelinians poured over the works, and crashed upon the retreating christian columns while their awful devil yell increased to a continuous and awful uproar of cries, curses, blasphemies, imprecations, chants, and screams of the mightiness of which no language could describe, and on they poured like a mighty avalanche of men.

At the same time along the christian line as it fell back, volumes of white smoke gushed forth, then so thick became the clouds of smoke that everything was hidden from view and Hanson saying:

"Every man for him self now to those hold holding the second line of position rushed over to that section to try and rally them."

Desolation was everywhere, and a sea of dead fairly paved the ground, combed the lanes, and laid in windows seven feet high along the abandoned works, but three quarters of the fallen were Glandelinians.

The deep desperate courage of the Glandelinians who faced all the fury of the christian resistance was beautiful to behold and fate seemed to favor all the Glandelinians for their daring, though hundreds of thousands were defeated and blinded by the recent dreadful hellish uproar.

General Jennings' Anderson on the christian side had been wounded amid this frightful carnage and few of his staff were alive only three being left and they were more badly wounded than himself though of course he was unable to retain his command. The christian columns that still retained their ground poured in a storming fire that tore immense gaps in the advancing line of the foe and which was shivered badly thousands of shells exploded now among the christian line with the detonations of a violent volcanic eruption and threatening it with annihilation.

Heavy showers of canister was also poured into the ranks of the assailants which continually mowed them down by hundreds and crushing and maiming whole divisions. The path of the Angelinians retreating now was constantly impeded by the rain of shells everywhere, and they fairly grouped amid the frightful uproar, and continued to flee at length a large division of the enemy breaking through a part of the christian line still holding rushed full upon the fugitives with some violence throwing them into another panic. The roar of the cannonade along Hanson's right side increased with redoubled fury and as the mighty surge of grape shot poured the works there came a most fearful burst of musketry a fiercer uproar and a more louder crash of many millions of muskets. The christian soldiers spread along the fields millions upon millions and the fugitive Angelinians uncertain whether to fly were arrested by these immense divisions and though a portion of Hanson's center had retired from the Parolook lanes, the fleeing Angelinians were so terrified by the advance of the enemy, the gasping forms of the many thousands of mortally wounded and by the ear splitting detonations of the gang-gang shells that they were only rallied and reformed after much difficulty and work. The continual advance of the enemy presented a frightful aspect as they swarmed forward, and all the meadows, plains, and lanes for many miles displayed the havoc caused by the recent furious cannon fire of the Ange, Indian half breeds, and indeed the increasing of the carnage seemed not to shock the multitudes of gray coats at all, while thousands of Angelinians awed and breathless pleaded for aid. Never had the faces of men so mad and so haggard, the whole battle field being littered with dead and wounded, the whole christian line rallied still gave way in retreat as they fought. It was a regular advancing battle and as the enemy continually swarmed upon the central lines still holding its ground there was one blinding flash after another, which made the enemy's whole line shiver and waver, and the appalling cries thousands of men were torn by the balls and shell explosions and run and writhed in mortal agony. But still the main columns of the foe came on.

The clouds of smoke from burning houses was wafted far and wide the whole line of slow retreat was littered with dead and wounded of both sides and many of the prostrate bodies were christian officers. The whole battle field was gray with the dead and wounded Glandelinians also and almost half the assailants in front of Jennings' Anderson's fast firing line was dissolving before the fire of Baldwin's batteries that swept down very mass within its reach, but nevertheless hundreds of thousands upon hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians reached the christian lines and now the christians formerly under Anderson hearing that he was wounded were terrified and panic stricken and were forced to retreat before the pressure of the avalanche of Glandelinians. Amid the waiting cries of thousands of the fallen who did not escape the Glandelinians finally amid the dreadful carnage swept on like gray billows their lines blushing in an inferno of their own firing and whole masses of the Angelinians were mowed down in this path of ruin.

And yet the christian line being torn asunder wavered, hundreds of their officers going down before that merciless fire. Indeed the whole christian line had opened into wide gaps their lines or columns being also engulfed in a vortex of clouds and flashes of exploding shells, the Glandelinians now rushing down upon the retreating Angelinians whose lines were almost obscured in thick wreaths of smoke and which were pierced by flashes, and the whole line of christians though they were retreating slowly was fairly storming with the fury of their resistance, and now the huge columns of Glandelinians under Adele-De-Garbo, divided into brigades and fell upon the retreating columns under Jenson and Jendon, tearing up the entire line of christians, crashing upon the Angelinian columns, the furious Glandelinians gaining the mastery and sweeping all before them.

Indeed the impetuous advance of the Glandelinian foe was not checked and even to make matters worse the whole of Shoemans' columns came into view and advanced like a tidal wave of human beings. And to Hanson's amusement both Shoemans' columns, and Bicknells advanced toward the Angelinians and despite the fiercest resistance made these gray columns come on, and still the Angelinians continued to recede and poor Hanson's army like at Francis-Anne seemed to be cut up to pieces once again.

It was well that the christian divisions under general Jennings' Francis, began to retire for minutes by minutes the wreaths of smoke along Shoemans' line began to thicken, and picknells' columns was pushing toward him in overwhelming numbers and there was fearful peril of his men being cut off from escape and being surrounded, and annihilated. The fire along the whole christian line was most terrific more terrific than ever in the battle before, but nevertheless it appeared that all the christian divisions were falling back as far as they could and the great battle of Outrida or Illino was as it seemed being lost!

WERE VIOLET AND HER SISTERS REALLY DEAD? AND EVANS TOO?

Almost of the Glandelinians had heard to their greatest joy was that two of the little girls, Daisy and Nettie Vivian had with her dear little sisters died a few weeks after the mine explosion, in horrible torture and agony.

Thoughnot killed right away, Jennie, Joice, and Evangeline Vivian had lived longer than the others in lingering agony that was beyond their endurance but despite the care of John Evans & Jack Evans brother had finally died also in mortal agony. And their mother a prisoner in Julio Gallio had died in hysterical spasms from the treatment received there and their aunt had been almost prostrated. No one on the Glandelinian general heard to their joy was greater afflicted than Violet and Catherine. Almost left entirely alone with out parent and general John Evans they themselves died of sorrow and the Manleys declared;

"Hurray boys, our enemies in centepede nature are gone at last thanks to Germania Vivian. We will not be pestered by those horrible Godly saints again. I told you God could not protect them."

Had the Manleys only knew that there were false rumors and that the Vivian girls were really on the road of recovery he would not have felt so exultant over it. For many days since his first entry into Julio Gallio, Jack E. Evans had lain wounded in the Glandelinian hospital and all his thoughts were of the Vivian girls. Many a day he had prayed long and earnestly for their safety.

"OH PLEASED MY GOD AND BELOVED SON, DON'T LET IT BE." He had prayed over again and again. "IF I DO GET BACK TO THE CHRISTIAN LIVES SAFE AND SOUND LET ME ONCE SEE THOSE POOR LITTLE GIRLS SAFE AND WELL. ONCE MORE I DO NOT ALLOW THE ENJOY OF YOUR DEAR SON BE SATISFIED OVER THEIR WICKED DEED AND SAVE THE POOR LITTLE GIRLS FROM DISFIGUREMENT AND FROM BLINDNESS I PRAY. PLEASE HEAR MY PRAYER. THEY HAVE DONE SO MUCH FOR YOUR SAKE DEAR LORD, SO I PRAY TO YOU TO REWARD THEM FOR THEIR LOVELINESS TOWARD YOU IN ALL THEIR WAYS AND SAVE THEM FROM HIS THREATENING GLAMITY. AMEN"

Several days had passed when he was able to walk around again. All this while he was working over plan after plan of how to make his escape but for awhile could not think of anything. The thought of the little girls at times drove an irritable yearning into him to be back but then his thoughts were deterred to the little dear he was to rescue. If he could only escape with her but how! The night before the day he was to be taken on the train Evans slept more heavily than usual, and dreamed that he saw the little Vivian girls coming toward him, their little bodies all disfigured, their faces hardly recognizable and their eyes gone. He even dreamed that they were on wheelchairs, and in his agony he dreamed that in his agony he threw himself on the ground and wept like a lost soul. He dreamed that this was the first time in two years that he had met seen them and now they were horribly disfigured. But to complete his misery he dreamed that the little girls had lost all their friends, that their father and mother had been killed, and that at last they all died themselves. Violet being the only one left. He also dreamed that he alone remained loyal to her who had been more horribly disfigured than they, and that leaving her for a while he roamed the world with a band of fierce men hounding Germania like a wild rabbit and finally getting him tortured the rasoul to death, and then carried Violet off to keep her away from the cruel heartless world. So harrowing became the dream that if it awoke him. On awakening he realized that it was only a dream, but with his heart almost bursting out of his mouth he greatly feared that all this was true for rumors had been among the Glandelinians that such a fearful thing had happened. That day the soldiers who were to take him off to prison appeared. At first he decided to go willingly, never to set his foot in the path of the Vivian girls again, but then remembering what general Vivian had said; to him and of the broken hearted little Lil/illian he decided to make his escape as soon as opportunity presented itself.

To the station he went with the Glandelinians without a word, but while he stood there waiting for the south bound train of the Mc-Hollister and Evangeline St. Clare he could not keep his mind of the terrible dream.

"Could it be true?" He wondered to himself; "Could dear God have the heart to allow them all that torture and sorrow after all they went through especially for him. Oh if he could only lay his hands on Germania Vivian. I was he who had ordered the Glandelinians to blast the mines, and done such harm to the little girls and why didn't he punish him for this wicked deed. And he done it to his own sisters the heartless brute."

The thought of all this was maddening and he almost cried where he

he was standing and one of the Glandelinians noticing it said; "I'm sorry my lad, myself, but orders is orders, and it does you no good to feel so bad about it. If you had been wise you would have kept away from Julio Gallio."

Evans at first did not answer, but another of the Glandelinians said; "Cheer up lad. It will soon be over with. If we dared we would let you go free, but we dare not. But here come the train. We must hustle." In a few minutes the train steamed up and Evans was put on the soldiers not going with him as others were there on the train to take Evans to Manleys lines.

EVANS MAKES A DARING LEAP OUT OF THE TRAIN WHILE IT IS GOING SIXTY MILES AN HOUR AND ESCAPES.

Evans was seated close to one of the windows and one of the soldiers noticing his sober face laughed as he said;

"You soldier, a cry baby. MY. MY. I never saw an Angelinian soldier pig-dog or cry over being a prisoner before."

"T O HELL WITH YOU AND MY CRYING." Exclaimed Evans passionately. "I CAN TELL YOU IF I EVER LAY MY HANDS ON GERMANIA VIVIAN, HE WILL BE A DEAD ONE."

"Don't you dare threaten the good general." Said one of the men with a sneer. "I know what is wrong, for I recognize you as Jack Evans guardian of the Vivian girls. You are brooding over those stinking skunks called Violet and her sisters, who are supposed to be blind, disfigured, and orp cripple for life. Well it is a good thing those little devils are; for they are nothing but a bunch of gutter snipes.....centepedes.....and toads that wallow in dirt filth, and slummy grounds full of slop and every kind of filth a person can think of..... Instead of being disfigured.....they are dead, leaving their sister..... Violet..... alone in this world and if I was Satan and had my chance I'd bring those little centepedes down to hell.....if I had to kill every one in heaven to do it and besides put them in tortures among all the demons and!"

"That was all the further he got, for Evans snatching the gun from one of the hostlers of one of his guards, shot the insulting wretch dead, and hanging out the window of the coach, while the other guards and all in the coach were in a panic leaped out while the train was going over sixty five miles an hour. At first so flabbergasted were the enraged Glandelinians that none on board the train knew at first what to do, but one controlling himself, pulled the stop signal frantically. By the time the train slowed down far beyond the place at which he dived to, and the Glandelinians swarmed from the coaches Evans was nowhere in sight. They had expected to find him lying injured by the embankment but none worse than that, no matter where they looked they could find no trace of him.

"By gad he is worse than the demons in getting away." Gasped one of the Glandelinians. "We will have to telegraph every town in our possession to be on the lookout for him."

When he made that daring hazardous leap out of the window, Evans had landed into a clump of bushes and deep snow uninjured, had arose, and before the Glandelinians swarmed out of the coach coaches had dashed into the dark recesses of the woods. Three day had passed after his daring escape and learning that hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians were scouring the country for him he deemed it more wise just now, to return to Julio Gallio in a new disguise which he did. But this time he was armed to the teeth and felt and was more safe. He immediately went to the hospital where the doctor had told him to go, and finding that the Glandelinians needed a man to clean and take care of the main hall he accepted the job.

On the very first day, he found that the pretty little child was in room 120 on his floor, it being the fifth and decided to keep track of her and get off with her the first opportunity he got. One day when the little girl was wheeling around the floor in her new wheelchair while he was polishing it he stopped suddenly as if y to avoid running into her, but at the same time wh whispered to her;

"Have hope. I have escaped and will save you yet."

Just then several glandelinian officers came up and confronted Evans said;

"Say my lad, you don't happen to know anybody by the name of Jack Evans do you?"

Evans at first was so thunderstruck that he did not know what to say, but controlling himself he answered;

"Yes your excellency I have heard a lot about him. Do you also know him?"

"We more than know him." Retorted an other of the officers. "He is an escaped prisoner, a spy and the soldiers are scouring the country for him. I have heard that he was here somewhere."

"But how in the world can he get into the city?" Asked Evans seriously. "Your men are guarding so closely."

"He is in the city and no b doubts an about that." Said the first spokesman. "And he is in this very hospital in disguise, as a workman."

"Well maybe he is." Said Evans. But I never saw him around. Pray what kind of a chap is he?"

"You are asking too many questions." Retorted the officer. "Out of my way. We ourselves will go and search for him."

With this the officers passed through the hall way and took the elevator up to the sixth floor.

"Phew." But that was a narrow escape." Whistled Evans. "Here Francis you might as well come with me now. As I am in dange of being discovered at any moment, especially when they come back. I must be going, and if I am recovered or recaptured no there will never be any chances for your escape from these brutes."

With that he snatched her from the chair and was out of the hospital in no time. Reaching the outskirts of the city in two hours with a car he wrested from the glandelinians he was again stopped by the guards but immediately made short work of them, with his pistols and slipped away. Other Glandelinians, especially those he took the car from had raised a hue and cry, and soon the streets were full of them, and before long Evans found himself pursued by a howling mob in gray.

FRIGHTFUL CARNAGE AT WOTTRUBA OR FRAND FRANCE-ANNA.

The description of the efforts of the glandelinians under general Germania vivian to hold back Hanson's advance upon Wottruba or Francieanna is graphically told. The organization of the big glandelinian forces took four days, and the opposing forces did meet each other at Lincoln farm on January 12th in full sight of the hired hands and children working there, who were able to for the first time in their lives to see a real battle.

Though the check in the struggle was severe it came off as an advantage to the christian armies, and the big force of glandelinians had to make a hasty retreat. In this battle on the Lincoln Farm in which the christians were victorious the glandelinian forces suffered heavily in losses in soldiers weapons and arms. Over three million glandelinians and five million christian had fallen.

The retreat continued for a long distance lasting four days, from the farm after a having another severe action near the Lincoln asylum in which they temporarily reversed agl against the christians but not without horrible losses. A storm of counter attacks suddenly coming in the evening near the asylum caused the advance of the apparently victorious enemy to be checked and so the glandelinians being reinforced stood their ground stubbornly until night fall and then resumed their retreat, Hanson on account of his severe losses having been forced to discontinue his advance against Germania. Nevertheless a week after general Germania advancing through the same region moved against Germania and the glandelinians retreated through the pathways and park ways, threatening severe opposition several time finally halting the christians at Lincoln Run in which five more million fell on both sides. A couple of days after this the retreating Glandelinians destroyed everything of value to the christians and even in a dashing action at Whiteplains which lasted a day captured one of the main leading generals of the christian forces, but lost ten million in the battle to that of the christians sixteen hundred thousand. The foe though somewhat victorious during the action resumed the retreat. The christians enraged over the loss of one of their best generals and over the condition of the vivian girls followed the glandelinians hard that Germania finding himself seriously handicapped threw his army into position at Wottruba or Francieanna for a general stand on January the 27th. On the morrow after the christian forces in fearfully heavy numbers made a dashing onslaught and flank assault upon the left wing of the glandelinians carrying two lines of trenches forty miles long capturing all the tents, large supplies of ammunition, mingled with fire besides twenty flags and many cannon found that half of their number had fallen in the frightful battle storm.

A goodly portion of the left wing was thrown into confusion but the quick witted main leader managed to concentrate heavy forces upon the point of attack, with artillery in mass, and after a desperate struggle in which the Angelinians showed themselves to be persistently stubborn, the glandelinians slightly repulsed their desperate assaults and threw them back, but with frightful decimation of hundreds of the their own mightiest columns of men and with the loss of many prisoners. A counter assault was promptly made by the glandelinians which increased the battle to redoubled fury but the glandelinian forces as yet could not carry the positions as the Abbieannians coming up held them with great tenacity, and the assaults were repulsed with the annihilation of two sections of their assaulting columns. Ten to twenty times the desperate assaults were repeated with terrifying fury, but without success and twenty times the Abbieannians and Angelinians, counts charged with frightful violence, their cavalry forces riding furiously through the glandelinian columns like a wild tornado. Over through corn field slaughtering thousands of the glandelinians, and throwing the rest of the enemy's forces into confusion. Assaults were now directed in full force and fury of the general center of the massive Abbieannian line, while the left and right wings were fiercely cannonaded by many thousands of guns. The battle raged fiercely along the along the center and increased furiously for every assault, but through the persistency of the assault the center was badly smitten and cut up. General Rathana and Luis Burgas launched three hundred and thirty seven squadrons of christian horsemen against the assaulting Omarian surges pouring upon the glandelinians like a thunderous avalanche of hells demons and dragons combined, rolling over the whole section, screening hundreds of thousands of machine guns machine in infantry following and concealed also by thousands upon thousands of Concentinian squadrons who soon swept clean the Francie Anna plains with welting slaughter, these having been charged and counter charged with lance and sabre, and before they were stopped by the glandelinian cavalry they even rode down ninety eight glandelinian batteries of first artillery, sabring all the gunners and annihilating the whole corps defending the batteries. The christian artillery had blasted a great hole in the glandelinian front simultaneously and general Fredrick had shoved ninety divisions of cavalry through that hole and it was their work of demonical frenzied fury which for a time threw the glandelinians into general confusion. Heavy reinforcements mostly Glandelinian cavalry was rushed forward against the christian horsemen while fresh forces of infantry was hurled against the christian center and soon the christians were disconcerted and driven into confusion by an attack of overwhelming numbers, and they abandoned their works and fled in full haste to the second line, which they also failed to hold and the glandelinians whose assaults had been so persistent managed to crush the main center of of the christian line and rolled it up.

Both side sides in the engagement suffered heavy losses though just now the numbers were considered as fifteen million of the christian side and two million on the side of the glandelinians.

Thus it shows when aroused the glandelinians if drilled right can be equal or better than the Angelinians and Abbieannians no matter how extremely their wicked their cause may be, and in the first of the battle it was numbers that told on them and the fury of the attack on the flank of the left wing. The christian forces had also suffered the heaviest losses including five of their highest generals who were mortally wounded, while the Abbieannians also lost about ten generals while the glandelinians only lost two who were only slightly disabled.

The entire glandelinian losses was declared to be about five million in killed wounded, and prisoners six hundred thousand of whom were prisoners. While one million christians had been taken prisoners. The greatest losses the christians suffered was from their own onslaught they made and the furious counter charge of the enemy they repelled. The Angelinians had also lost twenty thousand units on account of an attack on their own flank of the left wing but in the melee of the final fight when the reinforcements for the enemy had arrived the Glandelinians had recovered a considerable number of their own men who had been taken prisoners by the christians, and for the christians the battle seemed to have terminated into a harrowing disaster. On the next day a fearful storm of carnage broke loose starting along the left wing of the christian line with terrible violence. General Broadway made a general assault. For a whole three hours there had continued a terrible roar of thunder from thousands of the mightiest cannons, a frightful crash. Resounding like a million cannon. The sagging christian line seemed to have been split asunder. A mighty mass of Glandelinians enveloped the christians, the battle line being enveloped in smoke smoke impenetrable as from a roaring forest fire, and like the avalanche of hell and all its frightful damnation. The Glandelinians hurled themselves victoriously forward. A few moments. The christian line on the left was almost annihilated, the main line was sagging crushed to fragments. and retreating crushed to fragments again and again, and in retreating left heaps of burning barrires and ruins of forests behind them, a vast sea of carnage.

On this storm more than 13,300,000 lives were fairly destroyed on the christian side, and the whole Glandelinian assault throwing the whole christian line into confusion by a vigorous turning movement, hammered goodly portions of the main line to pieces, and threatened to carry all before them.

It is probable that a serious disaster would have occurred had it not been for the arrival of general Francis army, which barred the advance of the enemy in that direction with a fearful fire of artillery and musketry, which galled their main line of assault to fragments and threw back the Glandelinians with the dead of one of their own main commanders, general Broadway. General Francis had also delivered thirty desperate tearing attacks on the christian center and general Beldon attacked the right, throwing his mightiest columns forward as in cessantly as the waves against a stranded ship in a cyclone, at sea only to see them come back in remnants.

The battle on that day was severe and sanguinary all along the line but the engagement with Francis and Broadway was the most ferocious of the battle. After the christian left had been cut to pieces and thrown into a pandemonium of panic and confusion, and while scores of generals fell dead, wounded or mangled and bleeding in trying to rally their divisions, Francis's forces arrived to the rescue and that storm of hell's slaughter and within an hour had barred the enemy's advance, and while the first line poured upon the Glandelinians a frightful desolating fire, which continued steadily for four hours, the main christian cavalry whirled upon the Glandelinians at such a gait, that the Glandelinians were throwing their guns away in their mad rush to escape. The main section of the Glandelinian attacking surge, was simultaneously counterattacked on the southeast, while other cavalry forces assailed them in overwhelming numbers from the west.

This engagement made a wild, mad shrieking hell and damnation of terrific slaughter hand to hand. An hour after one big section of the Glandelinian army was hemmed in with the Suphratians on the north, the Abbeannian artillery and infantry on the east and south and the cavalry on the west.

The position held by a screen of dominating cavalry seemed the easiest to break through, and the Glandelinian spent hours in fruitless bloody efforts, the cavalry always drove them back with frightful frightful loss. The surrounding army continually attacked from all sides with such fury that soon this body of Glandelinians met annihilation as none of them including general Hannonia Francis Smith and his staff would not surrender.

Broadway's main line during the frightful carnage was torn to many pieces but their shattered columns rallied again and again, and would have won the field had not general Broadway been shot to pieces by a christian galling gun, his horse having been simultaneously blown to atoms by the burst of a high explosive shell of a nine ton calibre.

Broadway's whole command with the loss of all their general officers was annihilated, the other main line of the foe was cut to pieces and routed, as if all the angels in heaven were after them and millions of Glandelinians fell into the hands of the christians as prisoners. The firing during the battle along the left was exceedingly severe and within an hour had spread desolation over a space of thirty miles worse than the fiercest Abbeannian typhoon could have done. Whole forests were laid low by the curtain storm of shell fire from the batteries of cannon on both sides, and the din of this battle could be heard and felt throughout the country of Calvernia for many hundreds of miles though the battle was fought fifty miles away from Julio Gallo, near Erminia gun.

The afternoon of the second day of this great battle was still more severe. It was the christian forces which attacked this time and they went at it with all the force they could muster. The desperate christian onslaughts were covered by all the available guns of the christian batteries which roared like a million volcanoes in simultaneous eruption, to which the enemy were not able to reply as they had been compelled to mass their own artillery on the christian assaults.

The Glandelinian cannon committed incapable damage among the surging christian lines, riving scores upon scores of christian divisions into flying confused fragments, mangled or wiped out whole armies and tore the main line through and through with a blasting artillery fire of the greatest intensity ever seen in general firing, but the first left grand division of Germanias army had been wiped out, a part of his main line was crushed to pieces and rolled up so far that the other portions was thrown into immediate conglutinate confusion and in one desperate dash in which hundreds of thousands fell on both sides in that roaring inferno the christians were in possession of the Glandelinian artillery.

Johnston when Francis, was killed as he tried to rally the Glandelinians and general Germanias army on account of the annihilation of general Henry Cavaras army had nevertheless held firm to cover Cannonias retreat, but Cannonias right and left had been annihilated his v center was turned burned and exposed to a blasting artillery inflame combined with a musketry storm on three sides, the remaining forces being crushed to pieces in that smoky whirlpool of battle and Cannonias had to withdraw his surviving columns being rolled up and almost dispersed.

The rest of the line then had to give way and general Thomas Francis Tamerline coming to the rescue did all in his power to stay the christian advance but also suffered dislusion, and in the seething storm of carnage general Thomas Phellinia Tamerline, also arriving at a desolating fire which severely wounded him, tore his own army to fragments and threatened it with annihilation.

The survivors retreated in panic.

Another section of his forces, the reserves not yet in the battle, made a desperate stand against thirteen roaring onslaughts a million falling on the Glandelinian side in every charge made by the christians until almost surrounded and sadly depleted, and after delivering a galling withering fire which roared horribly in the ears of all who heard it, these Glandelinians also finally gave way and retreated in confusion.

Even after these succession of defeats Germania did not seem to have enough, for realizing this was a punishment from god for his cruelty to Violet and her sisters and of their condition he caused, he cursed god and threatened him like a fiend incarnate and threw his main forces in bitter defiance of god and all in heaven, into the frightful turmoil of the Glandelinians sweeping forward in the meantime crash crushing the counter assaults, and attacking the enemy's main line and increasing the fury of battle tenfold. The Glandelinians despite the riving fury of thousands of christian guns which pounded seemingly every thing to pieces kept side by side in great masses only to melt away before their fire, the Angelinians themselves caring no more for the fire of the main line of the foe no more than if it had been showers of snow. Within an hour the christians after suffering stupendous losses were hurled back with a shattered columns, but whole lines rushed forward again and again only to die by thousands per minute. Suetonius stormed the Glandelinian center, but his force was swept to pieces. Boadicea followed was crushed down, then came Catus, but his columns were almost annihilated and the survivors routed. Gaul was almost successful but just as the moment of success was near, he was severely wounded and his fall threw the christian into confusion. Angles simultaneously threw his army against the Glandelinians but was repulsed. Other christian columns fought to the very last in that fiery battle storm falling in great numbers per volley.

Again and again the monstrous christian columns rushed upon the Glandelinians only to be vanquished with great slaughter. Even when millions of the Angelinian horsemen rode against the Glandelinians, the Glandelinian cannon and musketry moved men and horses down in such frightful numbers that they lay like monstrous windrows. Then the whole christian force started to give way, only a little while now the battle was so fierce fierce, that the very heavens seemed to burst into flame, and did a storm of horrible death and destruction descended in torrents upon the Glandelinians from the seemingly blazing ferment, the very atmosphere seemed to turn into fire and smoke, the hilltops hidden in clouds of smoke were in an uproar of a volcano of flame and din, the valleys seemed to be come channels of fire and smoke, the living garments of the earth seemed to wither and fly off in the fiery blast of cannon and exploding storm of shells of every calibre and so terrific was the din that scores of thousands of the soldiers went insane from it.

At the moment the Angelinians began to give way the Glandelinians began to press forward like a withering storm wave of men, but as the Angelinians reinforced by other portions of the main body turned to face the Glandelinians once more large bodies of Christian Cavalry by a hellish avalanche like charge, divided the entire line of pursuing Glandelinians from the rest, and thus all the foremost portion of Germanias Glandelinian army six sixteen million in number fell fighting bravely as none were spared, no surrendering being accepted.

In the meantime the surviving body of the Glandelinians though sadly depleted still remained firm headless of the battering storm of the Christian cannon which threatened them with annihilation and with their own cannon cut down the multitudes of Christians and as the harvester would do the wheat General Viviania after several hours further attacks pretended to be retreating, the eager Glandelinians following but the Christian arms only closed again and fell upon the Glandelinians with still greater slaughter. General Bicknell Tameline of the foe was slightly wounded, but his line held firmly until threatened with annihilation Germanias ordered it to withdraw. Germanias seeing that the rest of his remaining forces was threatened with annihilation before the fury of the general Christian attack tried to repel fifteen more desperate attacks only in vain until his remaining forces were crushed to fragments and having only a remnant of his army left, he being in the same condition as his father, General Viviania had been at Brigano, Germanias was compelled to retreat, at night time, leaving the bloody horrible battle field of massacre and hell's damnation, in the hands of the victors. In this battle the Glandelinian losses on the first day had been considered as near as 20,000,000, and the Christians fifteen to seventeen million, but the total losses of both sides in the battle was not given though General Francis Viviania had almost practically wiped out Germanias Vivian's army, and had there been another hour of daylight, he would have been enabled to capture or slay the rascally Glandelinian chieftain.

HOW EVANS ESCAPES WITH LITTLE FRANCIS.

Indeed to tell the truth Jack Evans was now determined to escape with little Francis Lillian at all cost whatever, and though hard pressed by his desperate pursuers, he was nevertheless bound to get away. He had despite being on foot gained a considerable distance on his frenzied pursuers, though they were on horseback, but nevertheless he realized that if he did not secure a horse somewhere he would not be able to get away at all.

Little Francis seeing the yelling graycoats coming and ploughing through the deep snow was frightened, but she clung to Evans bravely trusting that she could easily outdistance them. Evans however was a terrible fighter, when aroused and especially now when he thought of the condition of Violet and her sisters, and of the danger of poor little Francis he was furious and determined to show the Glandelinians who they were really persuading.

Fortunately for him just now the Glandelinians did not care to fire, for in their wicked intentions they wished to recapture and recapture little Francis Lillian alive and make her suffer the tortures planned out for her. But through the deep snow their horses made slower progress than Evans could on foot. They lashed their horses to the utmost but in vain. Evans was slowly gaining in the race with them and for the Glandelinians there seemed no hopes of them ever catching him at all. Finally Evans reached a river that proved to be the great Mc-Holleston Run, and at this point it was over three miles wide. At last the Glandelinians thought they had him and giving yells of triumph they dashed forward.

"What over you don't let go of me," Evans said to the little child. "I want you to cling tightly to my back for I am going to swim this stream at all cost. I'm not going to let them get us now."

"Is the water very cold?" Asked the child timidly.
"You won't feel it for I am going to wrap you up in this rubber blanket and strap you to my back," said Evans. "The water indeed is exceedingly cold and I want to keep it from you as it will make you catch cold if I allow the water to touch you."
"But we will drown," protested the child afraid as the water looked black and foreboding a mid all the whiteness and ice.

"There is no danger of drowning," said Evans strapping her to his back. "We have got to make it for that is all there is to it. Anyway cold water is better than those savage bloodthirsty Glandelinians!"

Without delay he plunged in finding to his surprise that the water was quite warm despite the wintry weather and cakes of ice floating in the river was continually melting. He immediately struck for the opposite shore swimming as hard as he could but indeed it was an hour before he again reached land the Glandelinians having followed him in the water on their horses, but being unable to overtake him.

Evans almost exhausted when he landed on the opposite bank but he dared not stop now as the cold atmosphere might take effect on both. He saw a farm house in the far distance and made for it at a run, having loosed the child from his back and wrapping her in some extra blankets he had rolled in extra rubber which kept them dry. Reaching the house he drew his pistols and knocked demanding entrance. To his surprise a middle aged woman came out followed by a little girl and a boy.

At first at the sight of his drawn pistols and his Glandelinian uniform the poor woman gave a cry of dismay for she thought sure a Glandelinian had come to seize her only children.
"Pardon me my good woman," exclaimed Evans putting away his pistols and bowing profoundly as was the custom of an Angelinian in saluting a lady. "I'm really taking no chances and pursued hotly by the Glandelinian soldiers I had with this little girl in disguise crossed the river yonder with out boats or bridges and am quite drenched. So I came to ask you if you have any dry clothes for me, and also would like to know the nearest way to the Christian lines. I do not know which side you are on my good lady and so will have to force it from you if you do not like to give me the information. My name is Jack Evans, Colonel Jack Evans of the twenty ninth Centurian corps. Mostly all even my enemies know me of my desperation when pursued. I mean to only ask this favor of you but if you refuse I will on account of this child here have to force submission as I am not going to allow myself to be taken again."

The woman was thus struck for she had heard a good deal about Colonel Jack Evans. She readily gave him the needed supplies and he took off his wet clothes having had two uniforms on the ground, and the purple. The two children at first on account of seeing him in the gray uniform were afraid to go near him, but the sight of his violet uniform was enough, and they feared him no longer, the mother readily convincing him that she was an Abbianian. The little boy was over the age of nine the little girl being six years old and both were beautiful children.

While he waited for the clothes to dry he put on the clothing offered to him, the lady herself taking care of little Lillian. Evans told her all about his experience, how he rescued little Lillian and of his daring swim across the wide Mc-Holleston Mc-Holleston River.

"Knowing who I am the Glandelinians are now scouring and scouring the country for me," he said. "I'm the guardian of the daughters of General Viviania. To my sorrow all of them are dead except one and the other horribly disfigured for life, which makes me feel so bad that now I can hardly care what happens to me. If it was not for the remaining little girl and this poor child I rescued I would sooner have remained a prisoner. How has it come that no Glandelinians have ever molested you?"

"Christian troops have been around here too frequently," answered the woman. "In fact I have never seen a real Glandelinian yet, though I have heard of them and of their horrible barbarism. My husband is in General Viviania's army leading at his right hand one of the greatest commanders next to Zimmermann. But who are the little Viviania girls who are dead?"

"I heard that they are all of them except Violet," said Evans bitterly and with tears in his eyes. "Their brother Germania Viviania agreed Glandelinian general is their murderer."

The woman gave an exclamation.
"I doubt if they are dead though," said Evans hopefully. "I'm sure the good God would not take them away from her other two poor sisters after all she suffered for his sake."

"There is a plot in it somewhere," said the woman. "I met two Christian soldiers only yesterday, the very ones who had buried the little girls."

477

But the soldiers told me that though they said nothing to general Vivian that nevertheless the six little girls could not have died that quickly and that a not only this, but that they had been on the road of rapid recovery and neither could they have been instantly killed, for that night he happened to be in the room they lay and they were missing. Later when they returned they found three dead children badly disfigured and banished up in their beds and several glandelinians sneaking out one by one out of a window. They told me that they fired at the escaping fugitives and even pursued and captured them but all they could force out of them was that they murdered the six vivian girls and placed them back into the beds after strangling them. But they told me they examined the dead children, and found that though though indeed they were disfigured beyond recognition, there was no broken limbs about them and that they lacked injuries on the head, which the Vivian girls had received. They are positively positively sure they are, that those little girls are prisoners somewhere either in rulo Callio or Francis Atlanta. They were trying to find you, hearing that you had escaped from rulo Callio with your little friend Francis.

Evans was labored at this story, every word of it being true. "Say Miss if you think you are able to will you take this little girl to the christian lines?" Asked Evans. "Anyhow you might as well beat it there as being after me the pursuing glandelinians will be here soon and kill your children. As for me I'm head back for rulo Callio."

"To rulo Callio?" "Cried the woman. "Why my dear boy I am sure they are not there. Try Francis Atlanta first. You may have a good chance in getting to the christian lines too, for several christian armies are in action near that place."

"To Francis Atlanta it is I then." Said Evans hurrying on his gray uniform. "I'll get those vivian girls all right or my name is mud. As for you you, had better hurry to the christian lines before the glandelinians get here. They are bound to come looking for me."

Indeed the lady did not take long in dressing herself and the three children and after a hearty good bye they were off each in a separate direction. Evans had only gone a short distance when to his surprise he saw a large swarm of glandelinian horsemen tearing after him, all being Gargolian Curdes.

However this time he happened to be on a horse himself and off he sprinted after delivering a withering fire which threw the glandelinian column into confusion. However recovering the continued the pursuit racing after after Evans as fast as they could get their horses to go.

The glandelinians were yelling and firing and seeing that they were gaining on him Evans once more turned his horse and dashed straight for a low branch or bridge, meaning crossing the Mo-Whirther run. Under the weight of the boy and his horse and the glandelinian horse men which dashed onto the bridge on the two ends simultaneously the frail structure gave way with a rending shocking crash of timbers and threw them all sprawling into the icy water. Evans alone kept cool under this emergency and by the time the glandelinians got out with their horses shivering and with their teeth clattering Evans was heading for down the stream taunting the glandelinians (who were cursing and swearing) and swearing to their utmost with a wet handkerchief.

Despite this exceedingly cold bath the ardour of the Glandelinians was not cooled and determined to capture Evans at all costs they dashed down both banks of the river, some of the boldest remaining in the river and urging their horsemen after him. It was evident that they knew Evans purpose for he was heading for Francis Atlanta and feeling that they were really unable to overtake him several of the glandelinians raced off for the city to have the vivian girls removed before he got there. By his desperation indeed Evans easily eluded his half frozen pursuers who had given up the chase to get dry uniforms and knowing the direction the other glandelinians took he dashed off swiftly to intercept them in his endeavor to prevent them from rushing off to warn those in Francis Atlanta.

He soon came within sight of them, there being three of them, no five of the glandelinians, and though outnumbered five to one Evans was determined to get them and soon a desperate race was on the glandelinians dashing on madly to elude him, and Evans dashed frantically after them firing furiously. At last he brought down one man, who had been trying desperately to get him, and even his horse, and seeing themselves had handicapped the other glandelinians halted to offer resistance. And for almost fifteen minutes there was the most spectacular pistol duel that any one could have ever witnessed. Evans however proved his excellent marksmanship and soon three of them were shot down, the other glandelinian suddenly dashing dashing out and upon him with saw sabre drawn. Evans was prepared for just the very thing, and before one of these new glandelinians could strike a blow

7-177

478

Evans fired his pistol the bullet hitting the glandelinian soldier in the throat. He reeled from his saddle, the horse dashing on madly, the glandelinian soldiers foot catching in the stirrups and being dragged along the rear road. Evans had now cleared the way after shooting down the rest exposed to him, but nevertheless he feared that his former pursuers would would go at once to Francis Atlanta, and so muttering a prayer for their safety Evans urged on his horse for the nearest railroad station. In half an hour he reached it and dismounting found that the train was already pulling out. Quickly buying the ticket he leaped on the horse and raced after the train. It was another mad race, but he finally caught up with it and watching his chance he caught the railing of the view car nearest to the steps and in a moment more was on. The conductor was surprised over the daring feat, but noticing his glandelinian uniform suspected him as an enemy enemy and said:

"Glandelinian soldiers are forbidden to ride on this train on the Abbieannian railroad line. So despite your desperation in catching it and all your trouble you will have to get off, even while the train is in motion, for I will not stop it and waste time for you."

"TO ONE SIDE!" Throated Evans. And in his excitement of the race Evans had brought on the coach saddle bridle and at Evans proving by his tone and voice to be a very powerful and pugnacious fellow the conductor did not dare make trouble with him, but nevertheless protested his rude entrance saying that it was strictly against the rules for glandelinians to ride on Angelinian child refuge trains, and also that it was against the rules to bring a saddle on the train. But all Evans said in answer was:

"How many child refugees are on this train and who are the children he re?" "He cried. "Speak up or I'll blow your brains out." And he leveled a pistol at the conductor.

Three thousand children taken from the path of your glandelinian army to be saved from your clutches." Answered the conductor while Evans looking into the coach coach saw frightened children staring in terror at him. "You are as I thought a glandelinian spy and who came only to find out the poor children and cause them to be captured."

"Well this train is going to make its first stop at Francis Atlanta then." Said Evans. "And I'll tell you who I am. I'm Jack Evans guardian of the Vivian girls and your nasty suspicions of my being a Glandelinian has made me use you quite harshly, especially when to attempted to put me off this train. All of those vivian girls are prisoners except one in the city of Francis Atlanta, and if you mean with the help of the christian guards christian guards on this train to save these children here I also mean to rescue the Vivian girls, who are more important than these children here and come first before anything else. This train is not to stop at any of the towns but Francis Atlanta, and all the speed the engineer can put on depends on my getting there first. Have this done conductor and you will be rescuing or helping me to rescue the little Vivian girls, and helping me to get away from the glandelinians at the same time. They are securing the country for me."

"Congratulations a hundred times give me your hand, but you are a brave lad." Said the conductor. "You bet your boots I'll do so. I'm glad you got away from those savages in your disguise and forgive me for mistaking you for your Glandelinian as your uniform deceived me. I'll tell the engine engineer, and he surely will do what you wish."

In a jiffy the conductor culled the full speed signal, and then went to speak to the engineer, Evans guarding the coach until his return. The little children on the coach Evans was on were indeed alarmed at the sight of his gray uniform for he had all the appearance of a glandelinian officer who had purposely boarded the train to find out where the train was heading for, so that he could bring up a force of glandelinians and stop their getting away. Most of the coaches it is true seemed heavily guarded by christian soldiers, but instead of arresting him those on the coach he had boarded only help a low friendly conversation with him. In fact despite his disguise they recognized him as Jack Evans and they finally told the frightened kiddies that he was only a christian soldier in disguise and who was going to Francis Atlanta to rescue some pretty child friends of his own.

Soon the conductor came back and in a little while the train was running at a most terrific speed, a speed which it had never run, during its starting trip, and the child refugees wondered what was up. Just around the curve on the same track Evans was startled to see a long freight train approaching loaded with glandelinian soldiers in pursuit of the refugee train. The children also saw them and which at first seems almost convinced them that Evans was really an enemy after all and that he had caused them to come.

474

The poor conductor himself was demoralized and did not know what to do. But quick witted Evans did.

"Tell me the engineer of the danger and have him run our train like the horses, as the persuaire intends to run us." Evans almost shouted; "And if those glandelinians do gain on us or threaten to, I'll try and find a way to wreck their train. In the meantime I'll warn the guards." The conductor immediately went off to do his bidding, while Evans attracted the guards to the approaching glandelinian train which was snorting and puffing its very insides out by firing pistol shots at the glandelinians who were exposed bringing down several of them. The guards were with him in a moment and started firing also while Evans said;

"We must find some way to stop them. But how?" "We have an empty car ahead, and we can empty this one into that coach and stop them by wrecking this car we are on in their path." Said one of the guards suddenly. "It is the only way. We can uncouple it and throw something on the track which will stop this car immediately. Their train will have into it and be wrecked."

"Good we will do that." Exclaimed Evans. "Off with the kiddies as fast as you can get them, while I'll keep the Glandelinians occupied. Signal me when you are ready."

The guards immediately started to work and while the children were being quickly run into the empty coach ahead, Evans watched the fast approaching train, loaded with Glandelinians and waited his chance to resume his firing again. However the glandelinians suspected his purpose and did not readily exposed themselves, though they won't wonder exceedingly enough indeed why that view car was being rapidly emptied of its passengers.

In about twenty minutes the last child was off and Evans hearing the signal sped to the front platform, where he met the guards and the conductor.

"We can uncouple this car." Said the conductor. "And it will bar their way long enough to delay them, at least you see what I mean?"

"I'll do it." Said Evans. "Their train will collide into the coach."

"Exactly and the collision wrecking their train, will render it impossible for them to continue the pursuit."

At once the work of uncoupling the coach was commenced, and in a few moments the coach was detached, and Evans having potten off hurled a heavy implement across the track which bedragged from the other coach which immediately stopped the pullman detached from the train. With a tremendous crash heard for a mile the engine of the freight rammed the coach, and four of the box cars of the freight train telescoped one another, and sending themselves into splinters, amid the howls, yells, and screams of rage, pain, and disappointment, scores of glandelinians being killed at the shock.

The coach being a heavy steel pullman was only knocked partly off the track by the impact of the collision, and the only severe damage done was to the rear platform, and of most of the windows which were shattered.

The surviving Glandelinians were wild with rage over this ruse and they set up a noise which sounded like demons coming up from the infernal regions. The train loaded with its refugees continued on its journey having left the scene of the wreck far behind by this time, but most of the glandelinians had recovered from their experience, and one of them telegraphed to the next town the train was heading for to stop it and arrest all on board, declaring personally that they wanted ahead by the name of Jack Evans who was wanted on a warrant of being an escaping christian spy. In fact the town the train was to arrive at was in possession of the Glandelinians, and indeed the wise engineer had no intention to run through this town at all and soon was running on the Mc-Hollester and Sendon railroad line going straight southward.

Evans however knew that the danger was not as yet over for in time the glandelinians would learn that the train did not pass through that town, and that a vigorous pursuit would be attempted on the other route they were on now. It was true also that the Mc-Hollester Run route was dangerously infected by the Glandelinians who if they could not stop the train would at least attempt to wreck it.....by blowing up the tracks or something of the very sort.

So Evans kept a good lookout in the front while the guards kept their eyes peeled in every direction. While after while passed by however, and for a while nothing happened. However as they were reaching the big city of Pandora Evans felt suspicions coming over him over him and quickly ordered the engineer to turn on another route, as glandelinians were seen warning among the tracks and that they were acting suspiciously. The engineer did so the switchman switching them on the Evanpeline St. Clare railroad.

No sooner had they passed the junction of the railroads than there was the roar of a mighty explosion that rocked the ground, and an eruption of debris ascended high in to the air. The Glandelinians had blown up the tracks and the fast fugitive train had switched onto the other line just in time, or otherwise there would have been a disastrous wreck and many of the poor children would have been killed or captured, including Evans among them. The train was now entering the city of Pandora which really for the full duration of the war was always in full possession of the christians the enemy never having dared to try and capture the mighty fortresses of that Calvinian city as yet.

7-176

475

THE SECOND ATTEMPT TO BLOW UP THE TRAIN.

It was already drawing toward night and as the train rushed on Evans could see the red glowing lights from the christian ammunition factories which on of the wars running in full force night and day, and the flames were spouting from the tall and smokestacks, the red lights flaring and flashing through the heavens. Far down the tracks of the converging lines the great glowing headlights of the many engines drawing the ammunition trains to the christian lines besieging Francis Atlanta the lights too big looking like fiery eyes of many great monsters trying to pierce the darkness to see that all was safe on the tracks ahead.

Indeed it was great excitement for the children watching these trains from the windows of their coaches. They would even shout and wave a greeting as the great passenger trains loaded with christian soldiers came thundering along and the soldiers would lean far out and wave to the little children and bless them hoping them safely on their journey to Abbeysinnia.

They were also interested in the great freight trains as they came lumbering along over these intersection of tracks. Some of these heavy trains had to have two or three engines to pull them for some of them carried such heavy cargoes, long cars filled with shells, or loaded with artillery and others had carloads of all kinds of ammunition from the great steel plants to be rushed with all speed to the christian lines. One of the children a bright little girl, happened to be leaning far out of the window of the coach when she looked far down on the track where it crossed a bridge running across the Mc-Whirther River. What was that tiny light, which was sputtering at the edge of the bridge? It indeed seemed to be creeping along and she made her think of the fire crackers she played with long ago.

Evans who saw it also realized what it meant, but also he could see one of the soldiers guarding the bridge run forward as fast as he could and the soldier in the darkness saw a large package of dynamite which had just been placed at the edge of the bridge, and directly in the pathway of the refugee train on which Evans was riding. The engineer saw the soldier running toward them down the track. He rang his bell and gave a toot of warning upon his whistle, and then with steam hissing in a deafening manner and a sudden putting on of brakes he began to slow down his long train.

The red flame was creeping closer to the dark package as the brave soldier ran toward it, but without a thought of danger to himself the brave man threw down his gun, and seizing the package of destruction destruction in his strong young arms he hurled it far out into the river. With a deafening ear-splitting roar that shook the earth, the dynamite exploded with such force, that the rocks below were hurled in all directions, while the terrible thundering noise of the explosion echoed and reached seemingly throughout the whole city making all the buildings nearest to the scene tremble, the windows leaping against their casements, the dishes rattle in the pantries, and the chairs beds and tables leap a foot from the floor.

The soldier was thrown to the ground directly in front of the train by the concussion and force of the explosion, but the train had stopped, and the train crew including the guards and Evans and even the children all of them came running forward excited, the men and soldiers having their lanterns.

"What was it? Dynamite? Did the munitions explode?" "What happened?" "Questioned the guards and train crew. The soldier sprang to his feet and seizing his gun he shouted:

"DYNAMITE ON THE TRACK-----I DROVE IT INTO THE RIVER-----"

"-----QUICK-----FIND THE MAN WHO DID THE JOB-----HE MUST BE NEAR FOR THE FUSE WAS JUST LIGHTED."

In a moment the soldiers and guards and train crew ran up and down searching for the glandelinians.

Evans went down the track with the brakeman to examine his train and as the brakeman flashed his lantern about, Evans saw several dark gray forms huddled between the cars. It was the Glandelinians, and instantly the young soldier sprang upon them, with leveled guns and while he recovered the brakeman dragged them out and placed them under arrest. The Glandelinians had timed the explosion to wreck the bridge, and train, and they would have succeeded but for that brave guard on the bridge. After the excitement was all over Evans and the rest went back onto the train which proceeded on its way again. It was the second attempt made by the Glandelinians to wreck the train in their desperate attempts to either catch Evans, intercept him in his purpose or kill him one or the other. Indeed this was getting on his nerves and now as Francis Atlanta was the next stop though fifty eight miles away, he believed that the peril would be increased immensely.

A MYSTERIOUS SOUND. A STRANGE GLOWING GLOW.

The train was now running fast again and within an hour more had left the city of Pandora far behind. More vigilant watching was now needed, on account of the darkness, for more greater dangers had threatened in the dark than during the day. On account of the Glandelinians, whom in fact when as he knew so many of the Glandelinians were prowling about. The train was running full speed now and Evans being on the front coach again signalled the engineer to be cautious and careful for he saw suspicious lights far ahead. Signals were also going back and forth among the guards which showed that they had seen the strange lights far ahead also. The train was now slowing down considerably and rapidly, while the guards drew their guns being ready for what might ever come. Mile after mile flew past slowly and though the lights grew more numerous they seemed like the action of thousands of large fire flares, or the will-o-the-wisp, going out and reappearing.

"Maybe they are turning shells," whispered Evans to himself. "We must be drawing nigh to the city of Francis Atlanta." The train was now speeding up again when Evans straining his eyes became more suspicious. He spoke excitedly to one of the guards declaring that they were surely running into some mysterious danger. He wanted to fire at the moving lights but the guards would not let him saying that it was only rashness. Suddenly all the lights disappeared and everything was again in total darkness. The engineer however did not slacken his speed but increased it, keeping a vigilant watch ahead.

"I wonder what it could mean?" Evans inquired. "Sh-h-h-h," warned the guard. "I hear suspicious noises." The roaring sound of the running train, they all heard queer noises which even reached the ears of the children, who as any one may know most of them being terribly sensitive to the dark and so became terrified and could not be quieted. Evans listened quietly with his guns in readiness. What the sounds were like he could not ascertain. It was not the rustling of the leaves or the sighing of the wind, but a strange roaring that was very much unlike the rattling roar of the trucks of the coaches.

There seemed to be strange voices in the roaring noise, and weird yells and screams but what it was they could not ascertain. They believed that it was probably some distant battle raging so confident with those thoughts they did not pay any more attention to it. However the children felt uneasy and some of them begged Evans and the guards to stay closer to them. Evans to soothe their fears went to them and had just seated a little boy and girl on his lap when he heard one of the guards shout:

"Hark what is that?" Evans listened instinctively while one of the other guards said: "Maybe it is the grinding noise of the trucks." "No it is wind moaning," said another. "Don't you notice how it is blowing now?"

"Goodness come here Evans," said another one of the guards. "Do you hear what that is 'Hark'?"

"A wild shrieking roar came peeling from the distant horizon, a sound which almost froze the blood in Evans veins, as the very fearful unearthly screaming seemed to be shrieked in his very ears. In the far distance there had arisen sullenly against the sky a bright red glow extending along a good portion of the horizon line.

1-199

To mingle with the shrieking roar a simultaneous crashing noise was continuous and prolonged, sounding like hundreds of millions of heavy ordnances. "It's a battle sure enough," said one of the guards.

At this moment the din broke loose. A wild irresistible fury the glow grew in intensity and a noise of exceedingly great violence trailed along the horizon, but as the train passed on further it gradually subsided, though the glow seemed brighter than ever. Whatever it was one could hear on board the train knew, for they could not witness the scene clearly on account of the thick woods through which the glow pierced. Fully three hours passed of slow riding, the children or no one being able to slip sleep from their apprehensions, and then Evans and the rest saw something that resembled a sudden explosion, shooting flame and glowing debris to the height of thousands of feet above the horizon line of trees, mingled with millions of those same suspicious lights, there was a simultaneous horrible roar that made the moving train rock and away threateningly and then came silence and utter darkness.

"What could it mean?" They wondered. "All were spellbound with horror, and for a long time no one spoke a single word. All the while they wondered if it had been the work of the Glandelinians for now they believed sure it was not from any battle and even now the glow had reappeared with ten fold brilliancy and the atmosphere was becoming thick with a peculiar vapor which was sulphurous in smell. They were now nearing the region of the city of Francis Atlanta and had come within a mile of the outskirts when a large body of Christian troops came rushing up. There was a cry of excitement everywhere and to make matters more strange it was raining war water, in spite of the cold weather, and the ground was covered with gray cinders and mysterious looking debris to the depth of a foot, which made it impossible for the train to proceed any further in that direction. Evans at once believed, he understood the mystery but how his heart sank as the men cried to the engineer:

"You can't proceed any further as it is impossible to pass through Francis Atlanta which is in flames. Terrible devastation is wrought. Hundreds of miles of forests are blazing. Francis Atlanta is a devastated. Hundreds of thousands of the besieged Glandelinians have blown the city into ruins, and mostly all their captives have perished. We had a terrible battle with them but they drove us back. They have even made Mount Calverine go into eruption."

"Oh my God the Vivian girls," cried Evans. "They have perished." He felt sure that he had been unsuccessful when suddenly one of the men cried to Evans:

"Violet and her sisters are safe within the Christian lines. They were secured from the Glandelinians during this night's battle here."

Evans could hardly believe this news, but nevertheless headed straight for the Christian lines after leaving the train, the Angelinian soldiers who swarmed forward taking care of the children left in the train. Evans was surprised to see the large numbers of the Christian soldiers from whom he learned the real cause of the scene he witnessed that night. The enemy had assaulted the Christian lines with frightful fury, while those inside the city had set thousands of mines in the streets of the city which was already in flames and then blew up many of the buildings. The scene indeed had been like some great eruption and at first many of the Angelinians on the train, had thought that Mt Calverine had broken into action once more.

Evans found that the soldiers lying a foot deep in places had been blown there from the wreckage of charred buildings and that the thick pungent haze was from the burning forests and city in the distance. However he could not learn anything more about the Vivian girls as these Angelinians knew them not. It was over half an hour before he reached the main Christian lines and then leaving this part he went forward inquiring where general Vivian's headquarters were. Evans was told that this was not general Vivian's army, that the nearest army the Vivian girls were in were Vivianians at Francis Anna six miles from Francis Atlanta, but was also told that general Vivian had heard that general Germanias Glandelinian army had been almost annihilated at Francis Anna. That general Vivian having rescued the Vivian girls had retained them within his own lines and that if he goes there he will surely find them. After three days frantic searching Evans coming to a deeply wooded region with a trainload of men had waited until the train slowed down and then Evans sticking his head out of the window fancied indeed that he heard the screams of many children and this filled him with a strange creepy feeling. It was nothing however but the wailing of the wind through the trees.

A GREAT MASSACRE OF CHILDREN! AND THE BEGINNING OF THE BATTLE OF NORMAN RUN. CONCLUSION OF BATTLE.

One day Evans desired to see what was occurring, and so decided to go out on a scouting tour with a party of men. He with his party soon approached a large glen where a bright ruddy glow of fire came from, and saw a sight that made his heart leap with horror and emotion....! Frightfully mangled corpses of thousands of children lay strewn all over the ground while fastened to the trunks of trees were thousands of other children, awaiting indeed their turn for death in its most shocking form. His scene was worse than any Violet and her sisters had ever seen, to there being so terribly more victims, whose bodies like in many other great massacres had been frightfully hacked like calves in a butcher shop, having been completely cleaned, out of them, and literally hung on the branches of the trees. There were about ten thousand more children to be butchered, the number of the furious glandelinians appearing to be about three thousand three hundred fit fifty in number, and every one of the glandelinians were so drunk that they staggered around almost falling over each other. Hardly any man was doing any bloody work just now, there appearing to be a lull, but many who had not as yet been engaged in the terrific massacre seemed to be standing on guard. The glandelinians were fierce looking men, being literally crazed by the drink, flailing their knives at the children in a horrible manner while many of the officers whose uniforms were besmeared with blood were standing close by with their sabres drawn, and so thickly covered with gore that Evans was horrified, and wondered if it would be a sin to destroy such murderers.

Indeed the poor children were pleading and screaming, but despite this the furious glandelinians probably in their terrific frenzy from drink and sight of blood were so ferocious, the glandelinians at the beginning of the massacre having tried with the fury of extreme desperation to make their helpless victims slay each other. In fact the frightful details of this slaughter before Evans arrived can only be imagined. The brutal glandelinians had grasped many of the little girls and boys by their throats and flailing their daggers and strove to cut out their hearts despite their vehement struggles, and indeed the poor little children in the grasp of the ferocious drunken fools, had struggled as best as they could and screamed pitously and who could have witnessed the scene without trying to save them. The struggling victims had kicked and beat at their tormentors with their feet and fists, and the wicked glandelinians trying to gain a choking grasp on their throats was the only means of causing the children to bite them and the glandelinians in their desperation had then cut them to death. Simultaneously other glandelinians put their points of their knives to the middle of the children's bodies and opened them while they were still alive and a shrill scream had wailed up from the other children. At this horrible sight the glandelinians had only la roared with laughter.

Evans at the scene he witnessed was overwhelmed with unbelievable horror and falling on his knees he aimed his pistol at one of the murderers but to his surprise it was not loaded, as he had forgotten the cartridges. Now was he to rescue the poor victims, who still survived the horrible massacre without running himself into the same danger. His eyes flashed viciously as he fancied the recent scene, when hundreds of little children pleading for their lives, in such a way as to melt hearts of stone had been dragged up to the butchers and out to death. There had been no strangling in this massacre only cutting. He knew that these furious glandelinians were crazed from drink and in fact those children had done those a brutal harm whatever, and yet these rascally glandelinians seized them to murder in such a horrible fashion.

He decided to go and kill those brutes who had murdered one little child already before his eyes, especially by cutting her body open. He knew it was a desperate attempt, but knowing his strength he decided to try it at any risk, so he stole off cautiously to the scene and in three minutes was along side of one of the glandelinians and suddenly plunged his sabre into one of the brutal glandelinians sticking him through the back, and before two others could make a dash at him, he managed to withdraw the weapon out of the dead man's body and stab another. He also stabbed a third man and then quickly stole away though he was conscious of a storm of bullets flying over his head.

479
However these rascals were too eager for their bloody work to follow or pursue their mysterious assailant, and Evans got away starting off to get his ammunition and giving orders to the men to do all they can to prevent the massacre from proceeding any further, and that he himself would even arouse the whole whole camp of christians who will come and put an end to this massacre if they failed.

Before Evans had arrived to the scene the massacre had been terrible and even now the glandelinians over the slaying of their wicked comrades were at stricken with inconceivable fury and poor little Eva who witnessed the scene at another quarter felt sorry for the poor children, and decided to risk he left by hindering the massacre as long as possible. The poor little victims were indeed trembling with fear and crying out for mercy but the infuriated glandelinians were only laughing and cursing. Eva St. Clare was about near as bold as the ivian girls were, and indeed so bold that she like them would risk her life for any helpless helpless victim and she decided to hinder the massacre at any cost, and so she crawled toward the unsuspecting glandelinians, even as cautiously as a savage would a well armed fort or solatockade but more quicker, deciding to make an attack before they killed another child.

All this while over the attack made by Evans the glandelinians were in an uproar, and now one of them was dragging a little boy to another fierce glandelinian, but brave little Eva suddenly sprang at him and ran him through the back with a broken bayonet she had found. A howl of rage went up from the other furious glandelinians, while a score rushed up threatening at her with their bayonets, the other picking up the little boy, but Eva had got on away from the other glandelinians who had been trying to bayonet her, and stabbed this rascal in the heart with the bayonet and as he sank to the ground Eva wrenched the child from him, and despite a tumult of bayonets which surrounded her she nimbly as a cat pushed her way between of the men's legs throwing him to the ground and getting away, but throughout frightened over the daring feat she made she felt as exhausted as she got to a safe place with the little boy. These sort of deeds by Eva enraged the glandelinians so far that horrible at tortures were planned on the other children, for near this slaughter go ground piles of wood and debris and coal took from burning freight cars had been smouldering for days being a literal slow burning inferno, and the glandelinians decided to throw many of the child children onto this.

"Oh Merciful God," cried poor Eva. "As she heard the frightful devil yell of the glandelinians, 'I know they are going to throw those children into those awful fires, and kill them with that awful pain. I must stop them at all costs.'"

"We will all go and rescue them," hissed one of the Angelinians who had lain in hiding. "But you can't go over there again." He added suddenly grabbing her. "But they mustn't throw them on that awful fire." Wailed

Eva. "Please let me go." "No I won't said the soldier. "My comrades will put a stop to it now fear."

In the meantime the glandelinians had without mercy lifted a score of the struggling children by their throats and started to carry them toward that horrible mountain of fiery debris, and coals, and while poor little Eva was appalled beyond description at the deafening screams of the struggling children, and as she placed her hands tightly on her ears the Angelinians had worked themselves close to the point, there was a horrible crash of musketry, the glandelinians went down there was a rush of dark figures and the children disappeared into the darkness saved.

"Dam them," cried one of the Angelinians in a rage as he shot down another glandelinian who rushed him. "Dam them I say and damn them again." That glandelinians of such nature that have no mercy on children at all ought to be roasted in that fear for hours before dying. And at the children's screams the glandelinians skunk only laugh, even at the death agonies, and no doubt the scores of roasted bodies would be a great pleasure to them, but nevertheless let them try that again and let make their yell of derision turn to a struggle and writhes of mortal agony the dirty glandelinian butchers.

Poor little Eva indeed felt like fainting at the sight of this horrible attempted deed stopped by the christians in time, but when twenty others were being dragged toward the heaps of burning coals she felt an indescribable terror seize her. Under the rascally glandelinians too great pleasure in witnessing children dying from strangulation, but they did not get a chance to even do this, for they also dropped and the children knowing where the shots came from ran to their rescuers who secured them in time.

497

"We surely are in for it now," said Evans. "And it is all lucky for us men that we have a good supply of bullets for I believe those glandelinians will send twenty more to proceed with the murder while the rest will be sent to hinder our further chances or rescuing them and that they will probably make a vigorous attack on our position."

Evans' prediction indeed was right, excepting that fourty men were sent to continue the horrible murder, while the rest scattering several yards apart, delivered a general fusillade, and several of the christians were struck. All of the christian soldiers after a short debatement, had agreed to pick off the assailants, while Evans and many others worked themselves to within a better range of the murderers, and when they had got within better range they saw to their horror that the rascally glandelinians were proceeding to stick a red hot file down the throats of the children, and also preparing to slash the insides of their throats with a sharp knife and then to finish the torture by a horrible choking. Indeed the look in the faces of the children told plainly of their horror of this coming torture but in fact the glandelinians did not really do this any way but Evans and the others blazed away, the bodies but passing through the bodies of the rascals and lodging into the hearts of other glandelinians coming up instantly killing all of them simultaneously. Thus the children were saved the Angelinians grasping them before the other glandelinians came up in time to seize them. Some of the children had been shot accidentally by the christians but nevertheless it was best for them anyway as it ended their misery.

1-202

As they were reloading their rifles, Evans saw one of the men free a little child from the nearest tree already dead from a more cruel fate than the other children who had died before he came, the rascal immediately drawing a sharp knife, and slashing his body open to ribs and all, when a well aimed shot from the gun of one of the christian soldiers tore through the scoundrel's head, and he went sprawling from the shock of the bullet, the mangled gory body falling on top of him covering him with blood. Evans sickened at this sight, but watched the soldiers who were shooting the other glandelinians before their victims died of torture. In the meantime the attack on the christian soldiers had been made with the fury of desperation, but indeed the glandelinians soon realized the accuracy of the aim of their enemies, and though thirty to fifty of the glandelinians had succeeded in climbing to the position the christians held against them, they were soon lying on a top of one another dead.

Two hundred of the glandelinians had already been killed, and fifty were wounded, but the desperate survivors were still keeping up the attack, but were forced back in confusion.

"Thank god Violet and her sisters are not in the hands of these bloodthirsty glandelinians," thought Evans to himself. "If they were I'm afraid the desperate Angelinian sharpshooters could not save them, for now the way those skunks are attacking I fear the christians will be worsted and so I can thank god that they are safe the poor things, things."

"And they call us the dirty Angelinian dogs," retorted another christian soldier. "Well we will show these butchers right now that we will live up to the name and are indeed butchers ourselves."

Indeed the christians were so great at firing that the glandelinians finally retreated abandoning the children to the victorious christians, but not satisfied, and horrified by the mangled bodies of children already slain the Angelinians pursued shooting all the rascals down committing a massacre of their own, and even torturing the wounded glandelinians in a worse manner than the slain children had been tortured.

WERE VIOLET AND HER SISTERS REWARDED FOR THEIR PATIENT SUFFERING FOR OUR LORD AND SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST?

After many weary days had been passed Evans travelling through country after country and pursued a hundred times in three weeks by glandelinians and strange christians and the like, and worn and four times finally reached the region of Jennie Vivian, where that great battle had raged, and coming upon a great christian camp and not being disguised this time and being known by the guards who allowed him to pass in he inquired where general Vivian was.

Evans was told that general Vivian was in the center of the christian line about twelve miles away, so he immediately went there arriving in the vicinity within an hour. As he proceeded on he saw sitting on the porch of one of the christian general's headquarters four fair little girls, really ten times more than the Vivian girls could ever have been and whom he had never seen for months after the Brigano affair. Then he paused in overpowering emotion and awe for from these pretty children a strange fragrance as of the most sweetest flowers, a strange odor that was completely divine, that filled their, and as he gazed at them he discovered that they were ethereally beautiful and wore the most beautiful white gossamer dresses, whiter than the most great white whiteness could ever be dreamed of, while the strong moonlight surrounded them with a soft radiance.

"Angels indeed," he thought to himself looking upon them with a feeling of awe. They did seem to be in distress and Evans felt a lump rise in his throat as he slowly approached them. He wondered if God had brought them here, or at least general Vivian, with that eye evident purpose to see if he would abandon the Vivian girls for them. Then with a pang he said to himself;

"No they are exceedingly beautiful but to me the Vivian girls are first."

"He was about to name on when he was suddenly startled by an unusual sound, the sound of the children calling to him distinctly by his name which seemed strange to him. The voice of the little girls seemed strangely familiar, and indeed there was no mistaking that soft old faint plaint of woe and sorrow, and deep distresses in those voices. Though thinking at first of the Vivian Girls, he could not have the heart to pass these little girls by who in distress, though they were strangers to him, and he alighted onto the porch or veranda and slowly approached them."

"Don't cry dear little girls," he said bending over them, and then fondling the fair hair of the prettiest of the little girls. "Don't cry little girls, and tell me why you are here."

"My but they are ethereally beautiful," he thought to himself. "I wish they were the Vivian Girls."

He the little girl whose hair he was fondling suddenly gave a cry; so bad because we have heard that you had been killed. We are your beautiful friends called the "Vivian girls" and we have recovered from recovered from the mine explosion, and are not disfigured, blind or crippled at all as what was feared. Oh Evans you promised you would not go to Julio Calilo and you did." But oh Evans please do keep us company now, for we feel lonesome here without you. Do not go away from us any more."

Evans was paralyzed with amazement for he did not know what to make of it. But in a moment he had Violet and Jennie both in his arms hugging them tight.

"You poor little things," said Evans as he held them tightly. "A piteous incident indeed. I'd give anything if you little girls had not been in this horrible accident, and if the identification had been only a mistake instead of a fact."

"Why Evans what do you mean?" cried Joice.

"Ain't your sisters dead?"

"Our sisters Catherine and Hettie and Daisy and the others, are not dead at all," said Jennie. "And there with papa now."

"Oh ain't I glad," said Evans. "And how do we thank God for his good blessings on you little girls. And how did you little girls get away from the city of Julio Calilo?"

"We were not there," said Violet. "We were at Francis Atlanta."

"And you were at Julio Calilo," said Joice. "How did you get away from that horrible place?"

"Our Blue Blessed Queen, the Blessed Virgin Mary helped me," said Evans. "And poor little Francis-Millian is safely within the Christian lines by now. I succeeded in rescuing her and also have found out that Norma's Run is not so strongly fortified as believed. When that is forced and the enemy routed, then Julio Calilo and Norma's will be captured. And you dear pretty little innocents as you are," he added hugging these closer. "You are the very little girls who haven't seen anything but a world of woe and I mean to see right now that all your sorrows will end as soon as possible. I'd even sooner cut my heart out than see you come to further harm. As soon as the cruel war is over I intend to go back to dear old Abbeville, where there are no Glandelinian savages, and have you little girls back in that same beautiful garden you were in those happy days." And as the four little girls turned eyes of appealing wistfulness upon him he was touched and drew them all to him.

"Furnish me you little girls will not cry any more, as I'll not leave you again," said Evans.

T

"Oh no inn indeed we will not cry again. We were only crying because we felt sad, oh so sad without you, and now you come back to comfort us, and now we are happy and will do all we can do to thank God for his goodness."

"God Bless you dear little girls," said Evans as that stange sweet odor odor more fragrant and delicious, than the smell of incense or flow-ers came to him. Again a feeling of great awe came over him over him an overpowering sense of being in the presence of celestial children. "Divinely beautiful," he thought as he helped the one by one back into the room for they still used crutches crutches crutches. "Surely there is no other like this in this world."

Thus it really proved to the gallant guardian of Violet and her sisters that the wicked triumphant not over his fair charges. All the attempts of the most desperate Glandelinian generals to put Violet and her sisters out of the way had completely failed and he knew it with joy and pleasure and great satisfaction.

But all this had not cooled Evans. He remembered how the poor little girls had suffered after the tragedy of the mine explosion, caused by the wicked command of general Germania Vivian, their wicked wayward brother, and so Evans was determined to pay him back dearly for it.

Evans would get enraged. Evans would go so enraged at times when he would remember the scenes of their awful suffering, that he would literally chew his wrists to satisfy his feelings of hatred and anger.

Revengeful as he was Evans decided to wait until Germanai would get into battle with his father, general Vivian, and when opportunity or presented itself he would shoot, or cut Germanai down like a dog. But yet he did not intend to do so, until he allowed the Vivian girls to know it, and if they forbade him, and forgave their wayward brother, then he would allow it to go at that.

The next day when sitting among all seven of the little little girls/ Evans spoke up saying;

"It was a great, a very great sacrilege for that Glandelinian general Germania Vivian, to have his men mine you little girls and cause you all the suffering and sorrow you went through, especially in that massacre of children you told me about yesterday evening before you went to bed. It is my intention to pay him very dearly for it but I also decided to consult you little girls about it first. He deserves what I intend to do to him for it, but if you little girls forgive him why I will have to follow in your footsteps."

"Evans dear, surely you don't mean it! What are you going to do to him?" cried Violet and her sisters all in amazement.

"Shoot him or something," said Evans.

Violet looked reproachfully at him and said;

"Evans dear, you are running yourself into great peril by doing it. If you kill him one of the best friends of general Johnson Jackson Manley the Glandelinians will not rest until they get you, even when the war is over. Of course we do forgive him with all our hearts, but then he deserves a deserved punishment you intend to give him, and we would be fools Evans dear to advise you not to punish him, but it is the peril you will run yourself into, we are thinking of. And if we cannot change you under this condition how are you going to get him? Surely you are not going within his lines!"

Evans laughed.

"You don't think my dear dear little Violet, that I would be that much of a fool," he answered. "Why I would never a scapace after killing him. What my intentions is, I was to bring him down wounded during a battle with his army, still at large, a battle which he would probably have with his father and yours, and before any of the nearest Glandelinians could rush into rescue him, I would order my cavalry to charge, rout his rescuers, take him prisoner, and bring the word before general Vivian. I had not intended to really kill him for anyway he ain't the worth the death of a maddog. What he deserves in a life term in one of the island prisons."

"But what if he repents of his wicked deeds?" asked Jennie. "Even the worse of the wicked, have a soft spot in their hearts somewhere."

"I'll do it anyway," answered Evans grimly. "I'll see to it that it'll be a good penance for his wickedness. For what he has done to you little girls, does not let him out, whether he repents or not. He is the wickedest of all the Glandelinian generals anyway. Federal is bad enough, but not as bad as Germania."

"We don't care what you do as long as you don't run yourself into needless peril," said Joice. "Those Glandelinians under his command, and those at Norma's Run are worse than ever now since they are hard pressed, and once they are after any one in earnest they are surely bound to catch him."

Evans decided to take the advice of the little girls and be careful when he makes the attempt. He hoped that general Vivian would make a move upon Germania soon before he repaid a new army to place the one wiped out by Vivian, since it was reported that the two Manleys had been crushed at Little Francis Giorinia, and other places forcing them to retreat, and Hanson also being victorious at Vottruba, capturing general Bernardeons army made him hope more stronger. Evans never realized what a furious battle was coming at Norma's Run, and at Francis Atlanta. He also knew that the other Christian armies up north had also concentrated their main strength upon Vivian Wickey, and capturing without a battle most of the fortifications not far from Logan Zoo's Run, and that a severe battle was progressing at some point near that location. Three of the best and biggest Glandelinian armies had already been evicted from Calvernia, and that one of the Calvernia armies had fallen without a battle.

